

ACORN

1988 Issue No 1
(Formerly Issue A)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Why Acorn?		Page 2
The Newsletter		Page 3
Meeting		Page 4
Subscription		Page 4

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Thank you for your subscription to Acorn and welcome to the first issue of the Newsletter.

Forum readers will have noticed that the foreskin and arguments for and against circumcision are topics which come up frequently in letters and contributions. So in March 1987 a Forum group for those of us who share this interest was suggested. Several people replied, and in October Stan in Essex offered to start the Group, only to find soon afterwards that he could not do so after all.

My name is Tony, and I have agreed to try and run the Group. I'm starting with this Newsletter, and I hope to be able to produce three or four issues in 1988. But everything depends on Group members: if you send in contributions, we can get the Group going, and we can use the Newsletter to keep in contact. If you have suggestions for other activities, let's have them. So long as they are not illegal, I'll publish them, and at last you will have a means of learning more about something which fascinates a surprisingly large number of men and women, and have a way of contacting others who share this fascination. I'll only publish a name and address if you make it clear that you want me to; otherwise just initials or a first name.

Tony Acorn

Why Acorn?

The group was originally advertised as 'for foreskin/circumcision fetishists'. That may be a sociological description, but it is not a very convenient flag to sail under. I'd prefer to describe the group as 'for people interested in foreskins and circumcision'. One member summed up-our aims as being 'for everyone interested in getting the cock into the best possible shape'. Another version of our aims would be to serve as the means of exchanging '101 ideas for things to do with a foreskin'. Various names for the Group were suggested, including 'Cavaliers and Round-heads', 'To cut or not to cut', 'the cock-cut club', etc. But we decided on Acorn. At a glance, it is short, uncomplicated, fairly general, and could apply to a Group interested in anything from computing to naval history ('Hearts of Oak' and all that). But if you look in a dictionary, you will find that the Latin for Acorn is glans, 2nd of course if you look at an Acorn you will immediately see the point. Also, it applies equally well to both cavaliers and round-heads. So I hope you agree that the name is appropriate: outsiders won't know, insiders will.

The Newsletter

All contributions to the Newsletter will be welcome, but here are some questions which you may especially like to write about.

- ☛ Do men take enough trouble to keep clean under their foreskins?
- ☛ How should parents establish hygienic habits in their sons?
- ☛ Should boys and men always pull their foreskins back before urinating?
- ☛ Can a woman tell whether a man has a foreskin or is circumcised by looking, or from differences of feeling during sex?
- ☛ How does circumcision affect sexual performance?
- ☛ Does circumcision discourage masturbation, and is that good or bad?
- ☛ How frequent is circumcision these days, and why is it less popular than it was?
- ☛ It is said that Prince Charles is a roundhead but his sons William and Harry are cavaliers: was circumcision more common among the upper classes, and has this changed?
- ☛ Why is circumcision discouraged by most doctors in Britain, but encouraged in the USA?
- ☛ Should a man have the right to choose circumcision (provided he is prepared to pay), or should a doctor only agree to circumcision if there are 'good medical reasons', and what are these?
- ☛ Should a parent have a son circumcised, and if so, which age is best?
- ☛ If you are unhappy about having been circumcised, how can you learn to live with the fact?
- ☛ How often should a parent check that a son's foreskin is developing correctly and not becoming a cause of trouble?
- ☛ Ritual female 'circumcision' (in fact, the clitoris and often most of the labia are cut away) is practised in some parts of Africa and the Middle East, and is condemned everywhere else; but is there sometimes a case for a minor operation to expose the clitoris to direct stimulation?

Many of these are matters of opinion, and replies from Group members in opposition or support will also be welcome. But we'll also aim to answer any factual questions. Please keep letters for publications short and to the point.

Most Forum letters on Acorn topics are from men, so it would be especially interesting to have women's views. Many of the Forum letters about circumcision are in favour: let's hear both sides, and let's hear more from the medical profession. Let's also hear what your parents taught about hygiene of the penis, and what you think children should be taught now. And let's hear whether you think a foreskin is a help or a hindrance to a successful sex-life.

Meeting

If there is enough interest, we may be able to arrange a Group meeting. Can anyone offer a secure venue? And what form would you want a meeting to take?

Subscription

Your subscription helps cover costs of photocopying, envelopes and postage. This entitles you to all the issues of Acorn Newsletter published in 1988.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 2

(Formerly Issue B)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Acorn		Page 2
Anonymity		Page 2
Foreskins – Variations On A Theme	T.A.	Page 2
Roundheads And Cavaliers	T.A.	Page 4
Correspondence		Page 5
Comments on Issue 1	Brian	Page 6
Contact		Page 7
Circumcision: An Ethnomedical Study		Page 7
For Sale		Page 8

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the second issue of Acorn. Issue 1 went out in January and this Issue 2 goes out for the beginning of March.

We already have 23 paid-up members, mainly from southern England and South Wales but also from Scotland, Ireland, Norway and Finland. This issue is being sent only to those who have paid the £5 subscription, receipt of which is acknowledged with thanks. If your friends would like to subscribe, they should send a £5 postal order for the 1988 subscription, which covers costs of production, copying, envelopes and postage. They'll be sent all the 1988 issues. The good response so far means that I hope to publish six issues rather than the four originally promised, in January, March, May, etc. Please remember that, to be successful and to reflect your interests, the Newsletter needs your contributions. I have saved some for the next Issue, but more are still needed. Please send contributions by mid-April for publication in Issue 3, on the theme of 'What proportion of men are circumcised in Britain today?' But contributions on other Acorn topics will also be very welcome.

T.A.

Acorn

As explained in Acorn 1, the name chosen for the group allows for some useful anonymity, while being fairly explicit as soon as its origin is explained. Some of the other suggested names for the Group were: the Cut Society; the Clipped Society; Roundhead vs Cavalier; A cut above?; To cut or not to cut, that is the question; The ring of confidence; The foreskin issue; The elephant's trunk; The knob of the issue; The cock cut club.

Anonymity

Your name and address will be published only if you explicitly ask, for example in a contact advert. Otherwise anonymity will always be maintained, with contributions acknowledged by two initials or a pen-name.

Foreskins – Variations On A Theme

Some men have thin foreskins, so that the glans rim can clearly be seen – other men have thick wrinkled foreskins. Sometimes the opening is wide and loose, and sometimes it is small and tight. Sometimes the foreskin is so tight that to pull it back to expose the glans is difficult or painful or impossible. But some men can keep their foreskin behind the glans rim most or all of the time: this may become easier to do when the penis develops at puberty.

The length of the foreskin may vary greatly. Young boys usually have a long foreskin which forms a wrinkled bunch beyond the end of the glans, making the penis look like an elephant's trunk. As the penis grows during puberty, a tight foreskin may expand with it, while a looser foreskin may slip back to reveal the tip of the glans some or all of the time. A lad may find that when his penis grows to adult size, the foreskin is loose enough to slip easily over the glans, so it grows less: some are even fortunate enough to be able to keep the foreskin back permanently. Sometimes a short foreskin leaves some or all of the glans bare even when the penis is not erect. There is some variation with race: Negroes tend to have rather long foreskins and Chinese and Japanese very short ones. Japanese boys train their foreskin to stay behind the rim of the glans, and a boy without a bare glans is very odd. But Europeans have a foreskin that is usually more than long enough to cover the glans and to form a wrinkled bunch beyond the end. They tend to keep the juvenile "elephant's trunk" type of foreskin, and are especially likely to suffer from the problems associated with it.

A study by Dr John Smith found the following frequency of coverage of the glans of adult European uncircumcised men: glans completely covered: 45%; glans partly covered: 32%; glans completely uncovered: 23%. It would be interesting to hear whether other observations agree with these figures.

When the penis is fully erect, the foreskin should slide easily back behind the glans rim on its own. But many lads and men find that their foreskin still covers part or all of the glans. This hinders effective sexual performance. It prevents sexual contact with the glans and its rim and really spoils or reduces the pleasures of sex. A foreskin which does not easily slide back clearly indicates a need for circumcision. A long foreskin may also retain a drip of urine and become red, sore and inflamed. It is almost impossible to keep clean, and smells stale and unpleasant, even not long after it has been washed. This can lead to inflammation, the cure or prevention of which is another frequent reason for seeking circumcision.

You might expect that if a tight foreskin gives problems, a loose one would be an advantage. A short loose foreskin usually causes no trouble during sex, but it may ride to and fro during everyday activities trapping pubic hairs uncomfortably. A long loose foreskin may cover the glans during sex, so both partners get much less stimulation than if the glans was uncovered.

Against circumcision it is sometimes said that cleanliness is no argument for surgery; otherwise we would have our ears cut off rather than bothering to clean them. But this argument is mistaken on two counts. First, the ear has an obvious function to catch sounds, while the function of the foreskin (at least after a boy no longer needs nappies) is far from obvious. Secondly, social pressure can encourage us to look clean, but it is surprising how little soap and water reaches the parts that are not seen. One survey showed that 96% of German men do not wash below the waist every day (and Germans are usually thought of as clean, with one of the highest figures in the world for sales of soap). Similarly, a London social worker found that of 190 boys aged 9-18, about  $\frac{1}{4}$  were circumcised (80% as babies, the rest when aged 5-13). The standard of cleanliness of the uncircumcised boys was particularly suspect: many of the younger ones had no idea that it was even possible to pull back the foreskin, let alone wash it. Probably very few boys or men wash under their foreskins frequently or at all.

Hygiene is especially important for adolescents. The glands in the sulcus (the dip behind the glans rim) make a cheese-like white material called smegma, at a much more rapid rate than before: this should be washed away regularly every day. Smegma smells characteristically stale and can serve as a breeding-ground for bacteria, viruses and fungus infections. So it is essential to pull the foreskin right back to bare the whole glans and to wash especially at the glans rim very thoroughly at least once every day. It should be possible to do this without pain or physical difficulty. If there is any problem doing so, or any soreness or inflammation of the foreskin, circumcision should be seriously considered. It is much better for a problem foreskin to be dealt with at this stage than later, perhaps after it has become the cause of difficulties in a sexual relationship.

Tony Acorn

Roundheads And Cavaliers

Can you always tell the difference between a circumcised and an uncircumcised lad? No – quite often not. If an uncircumcised man with a short foreskin has pulled it right back behind the glans and left it there, it can be quite difficult to tell whether or not he has been circumcised. But if the rim of the glans is covered by 1cm or more of skin from the shaft, he is probably uncircumcised. On a circumcised penis any loose skin is almost always all behind the glans rim, and there is usually a narrow strip of the lighter-coloured inner layer of foreskin bordering the glans rim. Sometimes rather little skin may be removed at circumcision, but generally the skin on the shaft is tighter and less wrinkled on a circumcised penis. Most uncircumcised men don't like to be seen with their foreskin back, but many pull it back to urinate or in the shower, and sometimes they do not pull it forward again. The only certain test, however, is whether the line of circumcision scar can be seen. If he was circumcised as an baby the scar line can be an almost invisible pale line which may only be seen on close examination in good light. More usually, though, the scar is quite obvious.

Especially when it is partly or fully erect it may be very difficult to tell for certain whether a penis is circumcised or uncircumcised. Medical surveys have shown that wives may often not know reliably whether their husbands are circumcised or not. But the resemblance of a circumcised penis to an erect one may be one reason why circumcision has been such a widespread custom for many thousands of years and has been such a source of fascination.

Tony Acorn.

Correspondence

“It seems puzzling how a man with a very tight foreskin (phimosis) manages successfully to father children: one would think that the discomfort must be intense. Any comments? I would be interested in attending a group meeting. Perhaps a doctor could give a talk on the different techniques of circumcision and stretching the foreskin, followed by an interesting question and answer session.”

Bill – Surrey.

“I was circumcised as a baby and found it to be a great source of pleasure to myself and others over the years. I am now 37. I have worn a stainless steel ring behind the head of my penis for some 20 years.”

R.R. – Truro

“Most of the men interested in circumcision are totally heterosexual, but simply interested in one aspect of another male's anatomy: the presence or absence of a foreskin. There are, though, a few gay males who prefer circumcised partners. My feeling is that they would not be welcome in the Group. This is simply because the interest lies in circumcision, for or against.”

Andy – London

“I have a friend who is keen to be circumcised. I believe it can be done under local anaesthetic. Can anyone give names and addresses of doctors/surgeons who do circumcisions. Also an idea of the cost would help.

Do men keep clean under their foreskins? From experience in showers after football, very few appear to take enough trouble. I can think of only one person who openly washes properly by retracting his foreskin (publicly, anyway). That is about one in 30, of whom about  $\frac{2}{3}$  are uncircumcised. That is equivalent to 5 per cent.”

D.D. – London

Comments On Issue 1

As a convert to the roundheads at the age of 26, just over 10 years ago, through personal request and in the private sector, I can offer a few comments on some of the points mentioned in Issue 1.

1. With experience both with and without a foreskin, I can honestly say that circumcision in no way inhibits masturbation, though I do retain my frenulum and the pleasurable feelings around it upon erection. Has anyone experience of circumcision plus excision of the frenulum? Certainly I would not advocate circumcision as an aid to eradicate masturbation: it won't, and it shouldn't.
2. It is difficult to quantify how frequently the operation is performed nowadays but thinking about the incidence among a class I was in, at the age of 12 in 1962, there were 8 circumcised out of 24 in the class (three of whom had been done for religious reasons, all Jews). Today I suspect that 34% would be down to 10% or less, which if true would lead one to suspect that parents, or rather fathers, circumcised as children in the late 1940s/early 1950s are not having their sons circumcised, or rather did not in the 1970s. That may, of course, be nothing to do with their preference or wishes, but just because it appears hard nowadays to get doctors to perform the operation as routine on infants. Not having any sons I pass this over to others to continue the debate.
3. As to the Royal Family, there seems to be some doubt whether Princes Willy and Harry are roundheads or cavaliers: will we ever know the truth? I for one would like to know what has persuaded the Royal Family not to have them circumcised (if that is the case), breaking what appears to be a long-standing tradition.
4. A man, in my opinion, certainly has the right to choose to be circumcised if he is prepared to pay. There are many other cosmetic operations carried out (eg nose jobs) which surely can be considered as perhaps more drastic than becoming a roundhead. Any man who is prepared to pay for the operation has surely given the matter considerable thought, and in most cases will surely have discussed the matter fully with the surgeon prior to the operation. I was put in touch by Forum with a doctor who was prepared to circumcise me, after I had given the matter a great deal of thought.

I do agree that under the NHS the doctors perform the operation only when it is medically necessary, but there should be easier recourse to clinics/surgeons who will perform the operation for a fee. Let's not overburden the NHS, but let's have some doctors in a position to perform circumcisions on personal request at a price.

5. I am sure that we all realise that no two circumcisions are exactly the same, the greatest difference being the amount of foreskin removed.

I would be interested to hear views on how much foreskin should be removed. Personally my knob is exposed permanently, but I still have reasonably loose skin on the penis shaft which can lead to bunching under the glans rim. Has anyone any experience of drum-tight skin on the shaft after an operation? Or the experience of a second circumcision to make the skin drum-tight and the glans really prominent?"

Brian from the West Country.

Contact

I am a 37-year old accountant, single, heterosexual, fit, healthy, and in my opinion reasonably attractive and easy to get on with. Since the age of eight I have been fascinated with the subject of circumcision ever since I discovered my best friend was a roundhead. I have maintained a keen interest ever since. I was voluntarily circumcised four years ago and have been pleased with the result and performance in my relations with females. I would like to meet other members, roundhead or cavalier, interested in the subject and to share experiences. Although heterosexual, I would probably enjoy comparisons, DIY, mutual masturbation, voyeurism and exhibitionism with other males, but although pleased to meet gays I would not wish to participate in any more physical contact than described above. I would also be pleased to meet females/couples interested in the subject. I am fairly free to travel and look forward to your contacting me by letter or phone.

J.S. – Hants.

Circumcision: An Ethnomedical Study

Are you fascinated by personal accounts of the effects of circumcision, the different techniques by which it is done and their varied results, and the tribal initiation customs of Africa, Australia and the Pacific? Have you ever wondered whether circumcision is for you or your son? Then this book will answer more questions than you ever thought of asking, now in a new edition, revised and expanded to over 200 pages and extensively illustrated with drawings, pictures and statistical tables. Send £20 cheque or postal order (blank payee) to cover production cost, postage and secure packaging, to Alan Acorn, addressed as for other replies.

For Sale

A copy of Hautlos: Der total sex-report uber Boys, Menner und Beschneidung, edited by Max Snyder (Copenhagen: COQ International, ?1986). 94 pages, including 30 photographs and 3 sets of line drawings plus text in German discussing the case for circumcision, plus several biographical accounts. Good value anyway, and even better if you read German. Send £10 cash or postal order (payee blank) to Tony Acorn, addressed as for other replies.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 3

(Formerly Issue C)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Ritual Circumcision	David	Page 2
The Incidence Of Circumcision In The UK And USA	Anthony	Page 2
Tight As A Drum-Skin	Paul D.	Page 7
Pull-Over	Bill M.	Page 7
Hygiene	A.M.	Page 8
Not Soon Enough	S.W.	Page 8
Experience Before And After	Bill	Page 9
Social Class And Circumcision	R.	Page 10
Dear Tony	Warren	Page 12

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the third issue of our newsletter. The theme of this issue is the incidence and frequency of circumcision. The response of readers (British, Scandinavian, American, and Irish) to the last two issues was excellent – so good that we are managing an issue a month, and have had to hold some material over to Issue 4. This issue ends with a contribution from a US reader. Let's have plenty more contributions, including ones from cavaliers, from women, and from the medical profession. Let's have more on the ideal penis, with your observations and your fantasies as well as your personal accounts and your comments on the letters published here.

T.A.

Ritual Circumcision

Dear Tony: I would be interested in hearing members' views on two topics. The first is that of ritual circumcision worldwide. The second is how we can redress the balance, which has swung too far, so that doctors who were often circumcised as children themselves now put difficulties in the way of those who quite rightly wish to have the benefits of circumcision for their sons.

David.

The Incidence Of Circumcision In The UK and USA

In the UK the circumcision rate has declined from 25-33% between the Wars to 17% after the formation of the NHS, falling steadily to 5% by 1970, but recovering to 6.2% in 1980. In 1973 there were still 21,920 circumcisions, but the non-ritual neonatal component was only a small proportion of this, i.e. 1,857 (0.41%) in 1972 and 3,850 (1%) in 1986.

Across the Atlantic in the USA, the rate was just over half that of the UK in 1930 but had soared to a very high 90% by 1960. Most surgery is performed in the first few days of life, After an injection of vitamin K, but usually without anaesthetic, the boy is strapped to a specially shaped board and the operation is often done using the Gomco clamp or the Plastibell, which simultaneously remove both preputial layers almost bloodlessly and without the need for sutures. Of the 1,608,329 male births in 1973, 1,287,000 were circumcised. The graphs on pages 4 & 5 illustrate these changes.

The present near elimination of non-ritual neonatal circumcision in the UK has reduced the overall rate remarkably, and most circumcisions of children are now done around the age of five. By the age of 4, 90% of foreskins are fully mobile, and retraction under anaesthesia can successfully free 85% of the remainder, reducing the necessity for circumcision to 1.5% of the total. The actual rate is currently four times this figure, at about 6%.

USA Estimated Male Birth and Circumcision Rates

UK Circumcision Operations

UK Live Male Birthrate

Circumcision Rate

UK/USA Preputial retractability with age

At Western Infirmary, Glasgow, 91 boys, mean age  $4\frac{3}{4}$ , with non-retractable prepuce, had therapeutic retraction with 85% success. Only 12 were later circumcised

With a circumcision rate of 17.6% for the generation of the 1940s, my selective secondary school class was 45% circumcised, but a similar one of 1980 could only muster 9%. Until recently, most UK operations involved excising the outer skin and the remaining inner membrane separately. The edges were then approximated and sutured, resulting in irregularities such as untidy skin tags, suture site lumps, twisting the inner membrane to form folds in the sulcus, or folds of skin over membrane or membrane over skin.

Since the Victorian era it is said to have been the practice of the Royal Family to make use of a Jewish mohel for the baby princes, as did Princess Elizabeth for Charles. The Jewish method of circumcision retains the frenulum, and less skin is removed underneath and at the sides than on top. I suspect that the statement of dissimilarity between Charles and the latest generation is incorrect. Shortly before her marriage Lady Diana was given charge of an American baby, and presumably this acquainted her visually with a healing infant circumcision. I also read that a rabbi visited the residence within days of each birth.

Foreskin length is variable, from constant coverage of the glans to complete exposure, while circumcision can leave the glans partially or fully exposed, so confirmation of circumcision depends on the presence of a scar-line. Close examination may give a clue to the technique of circumcision used, whether freehand, clamp, Jewish or Muslim, depending on whether the scar is close to the glans rim or mid-way down the shaft. The most aesthetic result is obtained using a clamp or bell without suturing, especially where only enough prepuce is excised to ensure that the glans is easily kept clean. The minority circumcised state would not be instantly visually obvious and this outcome would eliminate most dissatisfaction with uglier or more stark forms of the operation. Necessity, whim or parental decree should never lead to embarrassing mutilation.

The majority of non-ritual infant circumcisions, not necessarily in the first months of life, are due to difficult access to the glans, seldom seen phimosis, or clumsy retraction leading to phimosis, by self or a parent. Adhesions may be strained to the point of bleeding in search of the arch-enemy, smegma, years before its production actually begins, usually between 7 and the teenage years. No comparable mischief befalls the baby girl's clitoris, despite similar secretions. Developing erogenous zones in both boys and girls should be equally respected, allowing elective surgery later if required.

Anthony.

[Thanks, Anthony, I wonder where you got your figures from? It is always useful to be able to refer to the sources of such information to compare them for dates, social class, etc. Your concluding remark assumes that a boy knows about the advantages of circumcision, and can have it done if and when he decides it is required. — Tony Acorn.]

Tight As A Drum-Skin

Dear Acorn Editor: Congratulations on Issue 2. I was stimulated by 'Brian from the West Country' to offer the following personal experience. I have circumcised myself three times, successively removing more of my inner foreskin so that now only  $\frac{1}{4}$ " remains, and my skin is 'drum-tight' when erect. Quality of intercourse improved at each stage, at first because of the exposure of the glans rim on the 'outstroke', and latterly because there is now no loose skin to slide up and down over the shaft. The whole length of my penis slides fully against my partner's vaginal walls. Since my last circumcision (which left  $\frac{1}{4}$ " of frenulum) I have removed the last bit of frenulum, and can say that the heightened sensations in the area are still there, but slightly dulled. Most of the sensation must be under the surface skin. I would be willing to provide details of my self circumcision technique to Acorn or privately. Masturbation technique has had to change radically, as there is now no loose skin on my shaft. The best for me is to make thumb and forefinger into a firm ring just behind the glans rim and to oscillate 1-2 mm, keeping contact with the glans.

Paul D.

Pull-Overs

What proportion of men are circumcised in Britain today? At the age of eight in 1947 I went to a small boys' boarding school. Half were roundheads and half cavaliers, and for some time we all thought that it was due to nature whether one was born with a foreskin or not. For unofficial games we quickly organised ourselves into roundheads and cavaliers. There was one youngster who was not sure and so he was always the referee. Foreskins were always known as 'pull-overs'.

At the beginning of one term a youngster returned without his 'pull-over'. All was made clear when he told us of his experience. It turned out that his 'pull-over' had become stuck when retracted. His cock swelled up like 'a balloon', and urgent action was needed to deal with the matter. At communal bath-time, I never remember anyone washing underneath their foreskin. It is embarrassing to retract one's foreskin when others are watching. If parents send their sons to boarding school, then circumcision should seriously be considered.

I did read that on average about 20% of males in Britain are circumcised: this can only be a guess. With fewer circumcisions being carried out, it must mean that there are more circumcised older men than younger men and boys, and the average must be dropping. I was interested to read in the Acorn Newsletter the comments about the different types of circumcision and that no two circumcisions are the same (Brian in the West Country). When I saw the surgeon about being circumcised, I did enquire about only having part of the foreskin removed. I had an "elephant's trunk" even as an adult.

The surgeon told me that it was important to remove all the foreskin: leaving a scarred foreskin is usually uncomfortable and unsightly, and this can cause more problems than it seeks to solve. Now with hindsight, I am glad that this was done.

Bill M.

Hygiene

Dear Tony: Congratulations on getting the Acorn group off the ground and on the selection of an appropriate name. Issue 2 was most interesting and I have a few comments to make. The section entitled 'Roundheads and Cavaliers' was particularly interesting. Not having seen a circumcised penis close up I was not aware that some circumcised men had loose skin behind the glans rim. I always thought that this was cut away. I am uncircumcised, with what must be a fairly short foreskin and I keep this pulled right back behind the glans. Thus to the unenlightened, this must look like a circumcision, something I had not considered as I assumed the presence of some skin was a give-away.

In response to the question of hygiene, I imagine the circumcised penis to be much cleaner although personally I maintain my penis scrupulously clean by vigorously soaping the glans and skin in the shower. This gives me great pleasure and is recommended to any man.

Something I would like to hear about is masturbation and circumcision. I am an avid DIY enthusiast and although I find wanking with my foreskin retracted fairly pleasurable, I find it necessary to resort to using the full length of skin over the glans for the final stages leading up to the climax. This seems to give me far more pleasure. Can we hear from men who have experience before and after circumcision?

With regard to a group meeting, I think this an excellent idea. What about a weekend away somewhere? Looking forward to the next issue.

A.M.

Not Soon Enough

I was circumcised ten years ago last July at the age of 44 and my only regret is that I did not have it done 25 years before. For about 12 years before being done I had trained my foreskin to remain retracted at all times, in fact on the rare occasion when it slipped forward over the glans it felt uncomfortable.

The operation was done under a local anaesthetic, the first two injections on either side at the base of the penis, then while these were taking effect a line was drawn round at the level of the corona. The foreskin was then pulled back and another line was drawn round the maximum diameter of the inner fold. I asked why it was so far back from the glans but was told that it would have caused problems when it came to sewing up afterwards if it was placed further forward. He then gave me about a dozen jabs round the external line. In addition to the anaesthetic these jabs had a brown substance 'to control the bleeding'. Then foreskin back and another series of jabs around the inner line, following which foreskin forward for the last time and a few minutes wait for the jabs to take effect. The doctor then clipped the tip of the dorsal surface with a pair of locking forceps and slit the dorsal surface to about  $\frac{1}{8}$ " of the line marked externally at the corona level with a pair of scissors. The cut was then continued right round, about  $\frac{1}{8}$ " from the marked line. He then trimmed about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " all around from the outer skin, followed by  $\frac{1}{8}$ " from the inner skin. This was followed by 13 sutures to join the inner and outer skin. The doctor told me that the stitches were a synthetic material which would be absorbed so I should cut the knots off after about ten days. I left them for a few days longer than this, then cut one side while holding the knot in a pair of forceps and pulled them out. It was completely painless except for the first two injections and the last three which were on the dorsal surface near the corona. The cut line felt a little bit sore when the anaesthetic wore off after about ten hours.

I found a great improvement sexually: before, the foreskin used to roll forward on the withdrawal strokes, completely masking the corona; now the corona is in contact with the vagina all the time and consequently receives the maximum stimulation. The only regrets I have are (1) I wish more had been removed. The scar line is about  $\frac{5}{8}$ " from the glans and when flaccid I still have the original fold. I would have preferred the scar to have been a maximum of  $\frac{1}{8}$ " from the glans. (2) The doctor started the sewing together from the wrong place. He started on the dorsal side and as a result the median raphe is displaced  $\frac{3}{8}$ " to the left on the scar line at the frenulum. I believe that circumcision should be universal and always 100 per cent, i.e. with the scar line as close as possible to the glans and it should be readily available from any doctor at a reasonable fee.

Experience Before And After

I am 48, and was circumcised when I was 34. I was born with a long foreskin and my first recollections of trouble with my penis as a youngster was balanitis. I found it upsetting to have this continually attended to. Circumcision was discussed, apparently, but nothing was ever done. I was sent to a boarding school and as an adolescent had considerable trouble keeping my penis clean, as there was only communal bathing. I seemed to collect a good deal of smegma, which frequently made my penis sore and irritable. In order to overcome this, I retracted my foreskin when I urinated, and tried to keep it 'pulled back' to allow the smegma to evaporate, which did help. I certainly envied my schoolmates who were circumcised and clearly did not have the trouble I was having. About half were circumcised, some having it done at school. If parents send their sons to boarding school, then the advisability of circumcision should be discussed, although I think individuals should decide whether they wish to be circumcised or not. In general, routine circumcision at birth should be avoided, as I believe is now the practice.

On meeting my wife, she often retracted my foreskin, which I found uncomfortable, particularly when my penis was erect, and I realized that I had a somewhat tight foreskin. Also my wife read in a magazine that an uncircumcised penis is more likely to cause cancer of the cervix in the partner. We discussed the matter, and I agreed to see a surgeon, who said that circumcision was necessary. It was done under general anaesthetic, so unfortunately I could not see what technique was used. My first reaction to the operation was amazement at the amount of skin that had been removed. The wound healed after about ten days.

I have found four main advantages. First, my penis is a lot easier to keep clean. Secondly, my glans is bigger. Thirdly, my penis needs more stimulation before ejaculation; and fourthly, my wife is happier with the situation and more willing for oral sex. My only regret is that I did not have it done earlier. As regards masturbation, before I was circumcised, I stimulated my penis by rubbing my foreskin, but rarely retracted it fully. I now realize that this was because of the tightness already mentioned. Now I tend to concentrate on the rim of the glans, which I find much more sensitive than previously. Also the scar is sensitive, since some nerves were cut. From my experience, it would seem that a long, tight foreskin is unhygienic and gives trouble: it is important that the foreskin retracts itself on erection.

Bill.

Social Class And Circumcision

Dear Acorn: I much enjoyed the first edition of your newsletter. Like all Acorn members I am fascinated by the incidence of circumcision and have been making mental notes ever since I first got interested in the subject in the dormitory of my boarding prep school in the 1950s. This idle curiosity has resulted in my liking to know (and indeed in most cases succeeding in discovering) which of my friends are roundheads and which cavaliers. As I am enthusiastically heterosexual, I have also asked my girl-friends where their preferences lie. I have the following observations from my research:

- (1) at prep school, about 50% were roundheads.
- (2) at the very grand public school I went to, over two thirds were roundheads. This, together with subsequent observations, leads me to conclude that there is a distinct social bias. The upper class boys were almost all circumcised; so were those middle-class boys whose parents had social aspirations. The exceptions were those coming from non-social intellectual backgrounds whose parents were presumably not interested in the social stigma of circumcision.

- (3) Circumcision would seem to be even more widespread amongst upper and middle class boys born in the 20s and 30s. Even cavaliers born in the 40s had roundhead fathers.
- (4) 1943 would seem to be the watershed in the UK.
- (5) In the 1950s in the UK, its incidence seemed to be falling, well below 50%, although socially conscious parents still seemed to think they were giving their sons an added social cachet by having them cut.
- (6) By the 1970s it was becoming very rare and even those of my friends who wanted their sons 'done' were having difficulty in finding a doctor, and in some cases having to resort to the local rabbi. In my own children's case, the hospital was vehemently opposed. As they were born at the same hospital and under the same doctor as the Royal Princes, I would be very surprised if Harry and William were circumcised even if their parents had wanted it.
- (7) My feeling now is that only those with a medical problem or with a particular religious or family prejudice are circumcised. In London, where there are many races and religions, perhaps 10% of my children's friends are circumcised. In the country and in the provinces it is far less. Against this background, it is surprising that those women who have had experience of both roundheads and cavaliers still seem to prefer the roundhead. Notwithstanding that preference, today's mothers seem to be accepting that circumcision is an operation of the past and that tomorrow's generation will be uniformly skinned. Maybe that is for the best as all the jealousies and prejudices that have developed surrounding this subject are probably borne of envy and the worry that the grass might be greener if the knife hadn't struck or vice versa. Certainly in America, there was total disinterest in the roundhead cavalier debate amongst men and women while everybody was the same. Now that the pendulum is moving against circumcision, interest has heightened and the debate has developed. Personally I enjoy the debate and hope that the practice of circumcision will continue, if only to add a little variety to the male sex organ.

Yours, R.

Dear Tony

A friend sent me a copy of your Acorn Newsletter. Issue 1, Jan. 1988. I found it very interesting and would very much like to join the club. Enclosed is the £5.00 membership fee. I realize that this won't cover postage to the US. Let me know how much more I should send. Do you know that there is a club in the US having the same name and same orientation. The US club can be contacted by writing to Acorn, c/o Bud Berkeley, P.O. Box 26011, San Francisco, CA 94126, USA. Feel free to print all or parts of this letter, but please don't publish my last name. I will accept letters via you, if anyone wishes to comment personally on anything I have written.

Circumcision is much more prevalent in the US than in Great Britain. During the period from 1950 to 1980 each year between 95 and 98% of the male infants were routinely circumcised. Over the last 8 years the number has fallen to about 85% as a result of the efforts of anti-circumcision groups. I am enclosing a list of some of the anti-circumcision articles in the public press during the last year. It used to be everyone had it done, but no one talked about it.

You pose some very interesting questions for discussion. I would like to comment on many of them, but time and space permits only one, the effect of circumcision on masturbation. Even though we know today that masturbation in moderation does no harm, one of the reasons doctors still give for having your child circumcised is to discourage masturbation. Does it do so? From my observation it doesn't if done neonatally. However, if an uncircumcised youth or adult is masturbating excessively (say more than once a day) and he really wants to break the habit but can't, circumcision will help. First he will be too sore to attempt to masturbate for several weeks. This will allow time for the habitual drive to masturbate to diminish. Once the soreness is gone he will not be able to masturbate using his old technique. All uncircumcised boys and men that I have observed, masturbate by sliding the foreskin back and forth over their glans. With no foreskin, this can't be done, so new techniques have to be learned. If the individual really wants to quit, he won't search out any new technique. The masturbation habit will be broken. My own case bears this out.

I wasn't circumcised neonatally. My father didn't believe in it. Nor would he allow my circumcision later, even though nearly every other boy was circumcised, I wanted to look like them. Every year in grade school we would receive a medical examination and the school doctor would send a letter to my parents saying that my foreskin was excessively long and tight and I should be circumcised. When I was about 8 years old, my closest buddy and the only other uncircumcised boy in school was caught masturbating and because of this his parents had him circumcised in the doctor's office under local anaesthetic while he watched. He told me the gory details and showed me his sore, swollen, black and blue cock with the stitches still in it. This made me fear circumcision. We had previously masturbated together. It effectively stopped his masturbation.

In my teens I tried unsuccessfully to train my foreskin to stay behind my glans. Adhesive tape didn't work. Eventually I cut my frenulum to allow me to wear a collar in the sulcus behind my glans. This successfully held my skin back, but failed in training it to stay that way. My glans did lose its ugly glassy purple colour, becoming pink like a circumcised one. I liked my circumcised looking glans, but I didn't like the loss in sensitivity that accompanied it. So I quit keeping my glans exposed but its former high sensitivity never returned. This makes me believe that foreskin restoration is not advisable for those who don't like the reduction in sensitivity that their circumcision caused. It can not restore the glans sensitivity of an uncircumcised penis.

By the time I was 21, I had read widely about circumcision: in medical journals, army and navy reports, medical and surgical text books, patents, etc. I was in college and dating a very sexy nurse. I felt sure that before long we would be in bed together. Then during some heavy petting she discovered that I was not circumcised. She was completely turned off. She thought an uncircumcised prick was dirty and unattractive. Moreover she feared that I would give her cancer of the cervix. By retaining my foreskin I was, she said, risking cancer of the penis, which would require amputation of my entire penis.

Although she was only part of the reason, this clinched it! My foreskin had to go. I had long had a love hate feeling toward my foreskin. My uncircumcised cock was always an embarrassment. But the hold masturbation had over me was the most compelling reason I felt I had to get circumcised. I was masturbating far too much, often several times a day – so frequently that often I didn't come. I had acquired a very bad habit of rhythmically squeezing my legs together while sitting. This made me lubricate and my foreskin slide back and forth over my glans giving me very erotic sensations. I decided that even if it meant losing more sensitivity, I would have to start keeping my foreskin retracted again, until I broke the squeezing habit. So I started wearing my foreskin holding devices again. But this didn't work. The beads or collar would press against my sulcus and corona and produce sufficient, although less pleasant, erotic sensations, to let me masturbate. The worse part was that frequently I wouldn't even be aware that I was masturbating until I felt myself about to come. Usually I could stop before coming, but sometimes I soiled my pants – once in class. I started wearing a Kotex pad over my cock to catch the cum.

I had made a New Year's resolution that I would stop squeezing myself and would masturbate only by other means and no more than once a week. I wrote in my diary that if I broke this vow I would go to the College free health service and have myself circumcised. Honestly, I didn't want to get circumcised. Yes I wanted to look circumcised, but I didn't want to lose my foreskin or lose any more glans sensitivity than I had already lost by keeping my foreskin held back mechanically. I really enjoyed masturbating with my full foreskin. I thought that knowing this would be my punishment would make me control my masturbation. But the habit was too strong. In less than a week I had broken both parts of my vow.

I went to the College health service and told them my foreskin itched and bothered me and would like to be circumcised. The doctor examined my penis and couldn't find anything wrong with it. He said my College health insurance did not cover an elective circumcision and there was no evidence of phimosis, disease or irritation. This gave me an out. I told myself that I had tried to get circumcised. I gave myself a second and third chance to bring my masturbation under control; but still couldn't. I had to get circumcised. My integrity was at stake. If I didn't keep my word, even though it was to myself, my word wasn't much good. My Jewish girlfriend gave me the final incentive to do it and do it right away. Since I knew my dad wouldn't agree to it and I didn't have the money to pay for a circumcision, I decided to do the job myself.

I chose the ecraseur, or strangulation, method because it was bloodless and seemed simple and safe. First I located a wooden spool about 35 mm diameter and fashioned a Plastibell like device from it. I carved out part of the centre to fit over my glans and made a groove next to the rim at this end. Then I soaked it in hot paraffin to make it waterproof. Instead of going home for the Easter holidays, as my roommate and nearly every one else did, I circumcised myself. First I sterilized all my equipment either with heat or alcohol. I shaved my pubic hair and took a bath, carefully washing my genitals. When everything was ready I pulled my foreskin forward over the spool with the grooved end toward me. I held my foreskin in place temporarily with a rubber band while I looped a piece of fine nichrome wire tightly twice around the back part of my foreskin over the groove in the spool and pulled and twisted the ends together with pliers. I used no anaesthetic because at that time I didn't know I could obtain topical local anaesthetics without prescription. So I applied tension slowly, stopping when the pain became too great. Surprisingly, my penis thought that this was fun and became very hard. As a result I shot my wad. This didn't help. My hands were full, so cleanup had to wait. I knew that the wire had to be tight enough to stop all blood circulation. At the same time I didn't want to break the wire or make the wire so tight that it would cut through the skin. (If anything went wrong I planned to go to the doctor and tell him that I had caught my foreskin in my zipper and that getting it out made it bleed badly. So I had applied this tourniquet to it to stop the bleeding.) I had considerable concern that the wire might not be tight enough to cause the two layers of skin to grow together as they should. However everything turned out fine. I became sore, but there was no great pain – except when I had erections. For the first two days I had a slight burning sensation in my penis. The skin grew together where the wire pinched it to the spool, and on the sixth day my dead foreskin and the spool, still bound together, fell off while I bathed. The remaining foreskin retracted by itself behind my glans and stayed leaving my glans and sulcus behind it uncovered. I had removed a bit more foreskin than I had planned, but still could pull my foreskin forward to cover 2/3 of my glans. The skin is taut only during an erection. I did not lose any additional glans sensitivity. My previous exposure had fully toughened it. In fact circumcision increased the erotic sensitivity of my penis. I was amazed at how erotically sensitive my circumcision scar was, particularly for the first few months. It still continues to be my most sensitive area. It seems that all the nerve endings that went to my foreskin now are concentrated in the scar.

Most importantly, circumcision brought my masturbation under control. Squeezing no longer works. For masturbation by hand to be any good I have to apply a lubricant. Then it is super, but it requires preparation, and is now a controllable act, not a habit.

When I told my girlfriend that I had circumcised myself for her, at first she didn't believe me. But she gave me a date and when she examined my penis she couldn't believe her eyes. She took my healed but still sore penis into her mouth without my asking. It was great. This was the first time I had ever experienced fellatio. Other fellows had told me about their girl friends doing it for them and I envied them. I learned later that this is another advantage of being circumcised. It is easier to get head.

Sincerely, Warren

[Thanks and congratulations, Warren. You seem to have been very fortunate in your use of the ecraseur method, as it is not usually recommended for adults. A 1981 comparison by I.A. Fraser et al. (British Journal of Surgery 68: 593-5) of 46 circumcisions using the Plastibell method against 49 'conventional' circumcisions using scissors and sutures produced rather better cosmetic results with the Plastibell, and it was rather less likely to cause discomfort or bleeding. But there were some difficulties with urination in almost every case and one poor result required further circumcision. The boys were aged up to 8 and were treated as day-cases except if there were post operative difficulties, when they stayed in hospital for a night. The Plastibell separated after 5-16 days, the average being 9 days. — Tony]

ACORN

1988 Issue No 4

(Formerly Issue D)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Tightening Up	Keith B.	Page 2
Circumcision And Disease	T.A.	Page 3
Incidence Of Circumcision	Brian	Page 5
Women And Circumcision	M.L.	Page 6
More Observations	D.P.	Page 6
The 'Prince Albert'	John McC.	Page 7
INTACT Hospital Survey	C.D.	Page 12
Circumcision: The Issue Behind The Foreskin	G.H.	Page 14

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to our fourth issue. This includes a discussion of the way that circumcision may help to reduce the chances of catching several of the more common types of sexually transmitted diseases. No-one would ever claim that it reduces the chances of catching HIV (Aids), but this research shows that there are several other stds which the circumcised are far less likely to catch, compared with their foreskinned friends. Continuing a theme from previous issues, we have the results of a survey by the US anti-circumcision organisation INTACT, which illustrates the wide variation in the incidence of circumcision in the US: several states in the south and the mid-west maintain rates over 90%, while Texas is down at half that (the Chicano influence, perhaps?) There is also an article about counselling parents on the pros and cons of circumcision. As a contrast, we have a story from John McC. about his granny and the Prince Albert. Please keep the contributions coming in: we have made a good start, and we're still gaining new members. Next issue will, I hope, include an article from a leading circumcision surgeon. There is also a chart comparing the advantages and disadvantages of six of the most widely used methods of circumcision and giving some of their identifying features. And there will be a review of an American book, Foreskin, which I recently received. I am beginning to think about an Acorn event in mid-September in Oxford: if anyone can suggest suitable accommodation or has ideas for what to include, please let me know.

Tony Acorn.

Tightening Up

Dear Acorn Editor: I was circumcised about 8 years ago, aged 26. At the time I was fairly satisfied, but more recently I have felt strongly that it was not radical enough: much less than the 12mm of inner foreskin should have been left, since the shaft skin was rather loose and there was quite a lot of loose skin just behind the frenulum. Increasingly my preference was for the glans rim to be completely exposed and far more prominent, even when my penis was flaccid.

Since the earlier operation was sufficient to achieve the advantages of hygiene and disease prevention, I knew I would have to give a surgeon reasons mainly concerned with appearance and self-esteem and would have to be able to discuss at length my reasons for wishing to be circumcised originally. Clearly, too, it would not be advisable to give any impression that I was under pressure from anyone else to seek a second operation. There would have to be some slackness of shaft skin when not erect, but I had more than I needed. So I tried to work out as exactly as possible what result I wanted, sketching it out, both flaccid and erect, with comparable sketches of how I saw it as it was to assist me in explaining what I wanted.

In early December 1987 I had the revision operation performed through the Surgical Advisory Service. It involved the removal of more of the outer foreskin, all the remaining inner foreskin, and excision of the frenulum. I am personally convinced that the more radical forms of the operation produce the most satisfactory appearance.

Keith B.

Circumcision And Disease

The following is an extract from an article by Laurence Gerlis on 'Cancer Risks' to women, printed in The Guardian, February 11, 1988:

"We now know that human papilloma viruses (HPV) are transmitted during sexual intercourse, and that these viruses are implicated in the development of cervical cancer. In brief, a girl can be unlucky if she chooses a man carrying the wart virus on his penis. It has been known for many years that two groups of women rarely develop cervical cancer: Jewish women and nuns... There has been limited discussion of the protective effect of circumcision on the wives of Jewish men and the debate has been confounded by two erroneous hypotheses. It has been suggested that Jewish women are protected from getting cervical cancer by genetic factors or by the strict religious code which prohibits intercourse around or during menstruation. It is time that both these theories were abandoned, the first because there is no evidence nor precedent, and the latter by the simple demonstration that almost all Jewish women are protected, while only a tiny minority follow the strict Talmudic rules.

Disposing of these arguments should allow us to face up to the reality that the prepuce or foreskin, which is removed by circumcision, harbours within its glistening groove the potential for carrying wart and other viruses. No definitive statement has yet been made but there has been a suggestion from studies of American homosexuals that Jewish men are less likely to transmit the HIV virus that causes AIDS... We should not allow embarrassment to stop us getting information on mixed marriages to elucidate the situation. We need to know if it is the gentile woman with the Jewish husband/lover who benefits from circumcision, or if the Jewish girl with the non-Jewish man reaps the reward of having more Jewish ex-boyfriends, thus lowering her potential exposure... Although preventive medicine is in vogue, preventive surgery has lost the enthusiastic support it had in the early years of the health service... One could too easily extrapolate from routine circumcision to nonsenses such as preventive appendectomies."

Maybe not. But if evidence is mounting of a lower statistical incidence of AIDS among circumcised men, is it responsible of parents to deny their boys the protection which it offers? Another virus which can settle on or under the foreskin causes genital warts: this is closely connected with cancer of the penis in men and cancer of the neck of the womb in their sexual partners. The importance of circumcision in preventing such disease is well known: cervical cancer is rare in Israel and Saudi Arabia. But many studies which attempted to test this idea more widely found that women's knowledge of whether or not their partner was circumcised was unreliable. As well as viral problems, bacterial or fungal infections can take hold in the moist environment under the foreskin and may cause inflammation (balanitis). The tip may become red, swollen, painful and inflamed or the whole foreskin may be infected. This problem is especially common in, but is not limited to, the hot dry and dusty parts of the world where circumcision is normal. Self-treatment with antiseptic may only make it worse. Ointments may be tried to clear up the infection, but the lasting solution is circumcision. The prevention or cure of such problems underlay the high incidence of circumcision practised by medical personnel in the British armed forces, reaching high levels during the 1914-18 and 1939-45 wars and remaining high in the US armed forces until a decade ago or less.

Association between uncircumcised state and sexually transmitted diseases.

	Number of patients	Proportion uncircumcised
Controls	471	37%
Diseases
Scabies	10	30%
Non-specific urethritis	374	37%
Pediculosis pubis	33	42%
Chlamidia infection	82	45%
Genital warts	97	46%
Gonorrhoea	97	56%
Herpes	104	58%
Candidiasis	84	75%
Syphilis	12	75%
All cases	848	49%

The proportion uncircumcised was as high or higher than in the control group for every disease except scabies. Source: Parker et al (1983): Circumcision and sexually transmissible disease. Medical Journal of Australia, 2: 288-290.

This very thorough Australian study by Parker and colleagues (1983) used a large sample of men attending a clinic for the treatment of sexually transmissible diseases and checked their own statements against an examination of whether they were circumcised. They found that there was a significant association between being uncircumcised and four major sexually transmissible diseases: syphilis, candidiasis, herpes and gonorrhoea. Uncircumcised men are twice as likely as circumcised men to develop herpes genitalis or gonorrhoea and five times as likely to develop candidiasis or syphilis. The moist, warm environment under the foreskin encourages these disease organisms to breed. The far greater cleanliness possible after circumcision greatly reduces the risks of these unpleasant and dangerous diseases.

Tony Acorn.

Incidence Of Circumcision

My observations over the last 25 years or so provide the following figures, which certainly show that amongst those born after 1950 the incidence of circumcision has declined but may perhaps be on the increase again. During this period, I have regrettably never discussed the matter fully with anyone, but one man I knew who had been done as a baby (pre-1951) thought all boys should be circumcised as infants, particularly after his son was done at the age of 5, since he thought it painful and upsetting for his lad at that age. The adult who was circumcised for medical reasons was very bitter about the pain he had to endure after the operation. Apparently he was done in an Army hospital under a general anaesthetic at the age of 22, but despite this obviously didn't think it had in any way harmed his sex life, and had he thought more about it would have had his son done at birth to avoid any possible pain if it became necessary in later years. He didn't want him to suffer any pain, but quite clearly didn't feel being circumcised was any disadvantage at all.

Despite reading in Acorn Issue 2 about the incidence of complete exposure of the glans among the uncircumcised I know of only one example of this amongst 109 cavaliers: hardly 23%. I must admit that prior to joining the roundheads I had trained my foreskin to remain retracted behind the glans rim.

Proportion of men/boys circumcised today:

Date of birth	Cavaliers	Roundheads	Total	% Circumcised
Pre-1951	44	40 +	84	47.6
1951-60	30	6 *	36	16.7
1961-	35	10 @	45	22.3
Total	109	56	165	33.9

+ includes 11 Jews: without them, % circumcised is 39.7% (pre-1951) and 29.2% total.

* one circumcised as an adult for medical reasons.

@ 1 British, circumcised neonatally in America, 1 white South African and 2 circumcised for medical reasons aged of 5 - 10.

Brian From The West Country.

Women And Circumcision

Dear Editor: You ask whether a woman can tell whether a man has been circumcised or not. Really it depends upon how knowledgeable the woman is. It seems that many women, perhaps a majority, have little or no knowledge of what circumcision entails. If your partner is one of these, she almost certainly will not know whether you are circumcised or not. On the other hand, if she does know what is involved, she will usually have little difficulty in deciding whether her partner has been done or not, even assuming that the foreskin had been pulled back. A glance below the rim will show either folds of retracted foreskin or a scarred region, and the glans of an uncircumcised penis is smooth and slightly moist in contrast to the hardness and dryness of the circumcised.

If partial masturbation is part of the foreplay, then most men will probably prefer to leave the foreskin on the glans to assist the process so if a woman knows what she is looking for she should have no difficulty in making up her mind. One lady I corresponded with claimed that there was a different feeling during sex, albeit a small one. Apparently the rim of the circumcised man provides a more pronounced scraping sensation than the rim which is holding back foreskin. Some men apparently find that the rim does not keep the foreskin securely retracted, and the foreskin is dragged forward onto the glans; when this happens, the woman is said to experience a marked loss of sensation.

On the other hand, it is said that some circumcised men find the initial insertion uncomfortable as it pulls down the shaft skin, putting a strain on the scarred area behind the rim. Insertion is easier for the uncircumcised man, particularly if the foreskin is still forward. A 'shoe-horn' effect then operates with penetration being achieved at the same time as the foreskin is pushed back by the vagina. However nothing, it seems, is simple in this controversial subject as the woman's pubic hair can get caught in the folds of foreskin which form as the loose skin is pushed back behind the rim. The unexpected nips received are disturbing and, on balance, I find it best to pull my foreskin back behind the rim manually before attempting insertion.

M.L.

More Observations

Dear Tony: Congratulations on Issue 3 of Acorn. It gets better and better as more people write. I used to be a member of American Acorn myself, but I think it is harder for them to keep their material coming across the Atlantic, as I haven't heard from them in some little time. It's very good to know that there are guys everywhere with an interest in circumcision.

It's particularly good to hear that there is interest in Scandinavia. Very few Scandinavians are circumcised on religious grounds, and it has never been part of the culture as it was here, so the fact that about 5% of Swedish men are circumcised suggests that this might be about the normal proportion for circumcision on grounds of phimosis. If so it suggests that since a few of these would also be candidates on religious grounds, the number of circumcisions in England (ritual plus non-ritual) should be about 10% of the live birth rate. On the other hand the ritual circumcisions would be about half and half neonatal (mostly Jewish) and pre-adolescent (mostly Islamic), while the non-ritual 5% would extend from birth to about age 25. There would also be elective circumcisions (which should certainly be available on the NHS) where individuals decided that though not necessary on strictly medical grounds, the procedure is desirable, and those cases where parents or guardians decided on circumcision for the offspring in their charge. I guess that the 'base' figure for circumcision in England would end up at about 12% to 15%.

At grammar school in the 1950s, just over half of my class were circumcised, which more or less agrees with everyone else. I agree with Anthony that some of the 'free-hand' circumcisions of that period were technically shoddy, leaving untidy scars or misalignment of the cut edges or suture marks. On the other hand, many left no visible scar at all, while the assisted Gomco or Plastibell circumcisions may have other side effects. Some of these problems are illustrated in the Ethnomedical Study mentioned in Acorn 2, which I highly recommend.

One correspondent asks about material on ritual circumcision. I can also recommend J.S. de la Fontaine's Penguin book, Initiation.

D.P.

The 'Prince Albert'

The 'Prince Albert' is the name used for a ring set into the end of the penis, piercing the urethra, and emerging just above the frenulum. It is commonly supposed that the name originated because Queen Victoria obliged her husband, Prince Albert, the Prince Consort, to wear one. Where this rumour originated I have no idea, but it is quite without foundation. The Prince Consort was never known as a philanderer. How, then, would the world have come to know about it? Rather, it is named after their son, Prince Albert Edward, (or 'Bertie' amongst family and close friends), the Prince of Wales and later King Edward VII. He was well known as something of a rake, and wore such a ring for many years. How do I know this? Read on!

My father was born in 1900. His mother had been born in March, 1870 of an unmarried lady who had been a servant in a large stately home in Aberdeenshire. This was the home of a wealthy aristocratic family much given to lavish entertainment. Amongst the guests in the house during June and July of 1869 was the younger Prince Albert.

Prince Albert, or Bertie, was the eldest son of Queen Victoria, and had been born just over a year after her marriage. In 1861, he had married Princess Alexandra of Denmark. His was a political marriage; he had had very little say in the matter, and had little love for her. He was well known for his powerful sexual appetite, and had never been very faithful to his wife. Whilst in London, he would frequent the clubs which then existed for the rich and titled to indulge themselves discreetly. When in the country, he would seduce the serving maids of the houses he stayed in. These servants were hardly in a position to refuse his advances, despite the risk of pregnancy. Most seemed to have been passing fancies, quickly fucked and forgotten. My great grandmother would seem, if her story is to be believed, to have enjoyed a somewhat deeper relationship with him than was usual. It lasted for about a month, and during this time he told her many things which he claimed never to have told to anybody else.

This, then, is his story, as told to her and passed down by word of mouth through the generations to me.

Bertie had always had a strong sexual appetite. Puberty arrived much earlier for him than for most boys. His upbringing was isolated from other boys of the same age, and so he had no opportunity to learn about sex from his peers. He discovered quite by accident the pleasures of masturbation at about the age of twelve, and, not knowing any better, did not make much attempt to hide it.

The Victorians considered masturbation to be a great evil and a serious hazard to health. It was considered to be a dangerous disease, known as 'Onanism' or 'self abuse', to be cured at all costs. The attitude can best be understood by comparing it with the present day attitude to child sex abuse. Many eminent Victorian doctors spent a great deal of time and effort devising cunning methods of combating this menace. When Bertie was discovered to be a victim of this habit, his Nanny, like any responsible nanny of the time, sought all in her power to cure him. His being heir to the throne made a cure even more important, since masturbation was believed to cause insanity and deformed offspring.

The first thing she did was to explain the supposed dangers of the habit. Having no contrary source of information on the subject, (there were no published counter arguments until many years later), he was quickly convinced of the dangers and the necessity of giving up the habit. He tried very hard to stop. For a boy with such a strong sex drive and no alternative outlet, however, this proved a practical impossibility. But because he was convinced of the need to stop, he cooperated fully in the attempts at a cure, confessing to his Nanny whenever he had had a relapse. When she realised that mere warnings were insufficient to cure the habit, she embarked on a régime of severe punishment whenever a relapse occurred. Eventually, after this method had proved unsuccessful, the Doctor was called.

The Doctor tried all the usual remedies of the day. For a while, Bertie was obliged to sleep with his hands tied to the sides of the bed. This merely caused him to masturbate during the day. He was fitted with an anti-masturbation appliance, a sort of chastity belt, but soon had to stop wearing it because of the chafing it caused against his crotch and thighs which soon became badly infected. The Doctor then tried applying caustics to his penis to make handling it painful, but he soon found that frustration overcame the pain.

The next remedy employed was circumcision. In all he was circumcised three times. The first time about 1 quarter of an inch of skin was removed, so that the glans was still partly covered. He started masturbating again almost as soon as the scar had healed, less than three weeks after the operation. The second circumcision left his glans permanently uncovered, but enough skin remained to pull up over the corona when erect. Again he was masturbating using this technique, within a very short time of healing.

By this time the Doctor was becoming desperate. He claimed never to have had such an intractable patient. The third circumcision was as radical as he could make it without endangering the life of his patient. The mucous membrane was trimmed close to the corona and the outer skin was cut right back so that it was under constant tension whilst the penis was erect. The frenulum, said to have been abnormally sensitive in his case, was cut right back also. The wound took a long time to heal because the scar tore whenever erection occurred, which was frequently. He had to be given bromides constantly for several weeks to suppress this tendency. Once healing had completed, he found that his previous methods of masturbation were impossible, since the skin could no longer be pulled up over the glans. The doctor was jubilant, he was convinced that his cure had been successful. Bertie was very frustrated, and when his rational mind became overwhelmed by the frustration he experimented with many methods of achieving orgasm.

He soon found that a suitable lubricant applied to the palm of the hand would permit orgasm and temporary release from frustration. Masturbation was less frequent, because it required more preparation and because he could put off the event by denying himself access to suitable lubricants. But, always, the frustration would build up until it dominated his reason, and a relapse would occur. He started to worry that he might be going mad, for madness was supposed to be one of the consequences of masturbation. The cure had been partly successful, but the ideal demanded by the medical opinion of the day was no masturbation at all.

When the Doctor was told of his patient's relapse, he was initially at a loss as to what to do. He had read of a cure tried in Germany of inserting a silver wire ring in the foreskin to make erection painful. This could not be used in this case, since all of the foreskin had already been removed, but it gave him an idea. He had a ring made and inserted in the end of the penis, through the urethra, emerging from where the frenulum had been cut away. The ring was of gold, about one sixteenth of an inch thick and three quarters of an inch across. It was fastened permanently into position with gold solder. A similar ring was fastened into the skin of the perineum, between the thighs and in front of the anus. Once the wounds had healed, a small gold padlock was used to join the two rings together.

Because he had always promptly confessed his lapses, and had fully cooperated with all the treatments, he was entrusted with the key of the lock. This was done on the express understanding that if he had any relapse, the key would be taken away from him. This time the cure was successful. He found that he was totally unable to masturbate with the penis held down in this way. He also found that, because erection was very uncomfortable, he tended to avoid arousing thoughts, and so was far less tempted to masturbate. But the main factor, at this time, that helped him give up the habit was that he discovered girls. It was thus fortunate that he had access to his own key.

It is a strange feature of Victorian attitudes, that it was considered quite proper for a boy of fourteen to have sex with a girl just as often as he wanted. It was not sex which was forbidden for boys, just masturbation. (Girls were less fortunate, but this is not the place to digress into a discussion of the horrors of their treatment at that time.) Within a few days of his first experience of sex with a girl, he had discovered that regular fucking was an effective cure for his habit. He had no difficulty finding suitable partners, and was soon performing regularly several times a day.

My great-grandmother was probably not an innocent maiden when the Prince first met her, this would be very difficult for a maid-servant in such a house, but she was still in her teens. She certainly knew enough to express surprise at the circumcised state of his penis (circumcision was a very rare phenomenon then) and at the ring. Initially he told her that he had had these things done in order to increase his own pleasure, as well as that of the girl. This is probably what he told all of the girls he went with; most of them would have accepted this, and questioned no further. Certainly, amongst the better class whores of London (and their clients) the advantages of the 'Prince Albert' were being discussed at about this time. Nothing of this, however, was known to my great-grandmother. She recalled the strange and rather pleasant sensation of it nudging the neck of her womb (perhaps they favoured the rear-entry position). She remembered leading him round the room by it, 'the way you lead a bull to the market'. She remembered playing with the other ring, near his anus, teasing him by using it to pull him away from her during lovemaking.

Later, when they became more intimate, he confessed the real reason for it. At that time, for a man to confess masturbation to girl would be most unusual, since it was considered not just unmanly, but a truly heinous activity, (comparable to confessing, nowadays, to having sex with one's pre-pubescent daughter!). For this reason, I feel that their relationship must have been something quite exceptional. He told her that, despite being married and nearly thirty, he still needed sex at least twice a day to suppress the urge to masturbate, and that, if he was not going to be able to find a suitable girl, he still had to use the lock. This was the reason he still kept the ring in place. He did not know whether it enhanced his own pleasure, since he had never tried sex without it, but he thought that he would probably miss it. He said that many girls had claimed that it improved sex for them, but he did not know whether this was mere flattery.

His stay in that house came to an end all too soon. And so did hers, since, as soon as she was found to be pregnant, she lost her job. They never met again. They never wrote; that would have caused terrible complications for him, besides, she could barely read or write. Nine months later, my grandmother was born.

A few other facts are worthy of note:

Since that time, all male offspring of the Royal family have been routinely circumcised at birth (with the possible exception, unconfirmed, of the most recent ones); before then it was totally unknown.

I was born at about the same time as Prince Charles. When I was young, many people remarked on the uncanny likeness between me and the newspaper photographs of him.

I have, in my possession, a gentleman's gold fob watch with an alarm of about that date. He gave it to her to put under the pillow when they slept together. He used to set the alarm to waken her at five in the morning when she had to get up to go about her duties. Before she had that, she had got into trouble for oversleeping. The watch is quite plain, without any engraving.

The expression, 'Prince Albert', for such a ring, has been used in England since that time, and is now in common use throughout the world. I have encountered it in literature from France, Germany, Holland, the U.S.A., and Japan.

When my grandmother told the story to my father, she made him promise never to tell anybody outside the family. When my father told it to me, we agreed that, since more than a hundred years had passed and since all the protagonists were now dead, there was no longer any real need for secrecy.

John McC.

INTACT Educational Foundation Report Of The 1984 Hospital Survey

In the spring of 1984 the INTACT Educational Foundation made a survey of hospital maternity departments in the United States. The purpose of this survey was to ascertain trends in the practice of circumcision of newborn boys, especially after extensive medical research and findings on the subject made over the past twenty years. The consensus of these findings has been as follows:

- 1) That routine circumcision is medically unnecessary
- 2) That it is more painful and traumatic than previously supposed
- 3) That presumed benefits of this surgery which have guided past practices have not been demonstrated
- 4) That circumcision itself is riskier than the conditions it is alleged to prevent
- 5) That routine circumcision of the neonate is not cost-effective

In 1972 the prestigious American Academy of Paediatrics appointed a special task force to study the question of routine circumcision. After three years of reviewing all the arguments for and against the practice, this committee concluded in its 1975 report, "There is no absolute medical indication for routine circumcision of the newborn." In 1978 this report was endorsed by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists.

One should also bear in mind that medical circumcision has never been widely practised except in English-speaking countries. Beginning in 1950, however, it was abandoned in Great Britain. (In a 1972 survey of 400,000 newborn boys conducted by the British government only 1 in 200 was circumcised.) In Canada, Australia and New Zealand the practice has declined rapidly. The present rate is well under 30% in Australia and New Zealand, and about 40% in Canada. Thus, the United States is the only country in which the majority of baby boys are circumcised for non-religious reasons.

How The Survey Was Done

On April 16, 1984 a questionnaire was sent to the head nurse of the maternity department at 500 hospitals in all fifty states. We requested that questionnaires be returned by May 21, 1984, and we received a total of 311 replies.

Because we wanted broad geographical representation, at least five hospitals were polled in each state, and this was the number of questionnaires sent to the District of Columbia and to the fourteen states which have fewer than 20,000 births per year. In the thirty-six remaining states questionnaires were sent out in proportion to annual births. (See table for a complete breakdown.)

All hospitals in the survey reported at least 500 births per year in the 1983 American Hospital Association Guide to the Health Care Field. This meant that the survey was limited mainly to urban and suburban hospitals.

Table

In the data below the number before the slash indicates the number of questionnaires sent out to a state. The figure after the slash is the number of responses received. Next comes the average circumcision percentage reported in the state. For example, nine questionnaires were mailed to hospitals in Alabama; five were returned. The circumcision rate averaged 85%.

Alabama	9/5	85.0	Missouri	10/7	92.4
Alaska	5/3	54.8	Montana	5/4	74.5
Arizona	9/7	60.1	Nebraska	8/5	96.2
Arkansas	8/6	79.6	Nevada	5/3	70.6
California	35/19	56.4	New Hampshire	5/4	73.8
Colorado	9/7	72.9	New Jersey	11/7	91.1
Connecticut	8/5	92.8	New Mexico	8/5	58.0
Delaware	5/4	96.8	New York	23/15	70.7
District of Columbia	5/3	63.3	North Carolina	11/7	79.7
Florida	15/9	83.7	North Dakota	5/4	94.3
Georgia	11/6	92.2	Ohio	18/11	89.7
Hawaii	5/3	83.3	Oklahoma	9/6	78.9
Idaho	5/3	64.3	Oregon	9/5	60.0
Illinois	18/15	74.7	Pennsylvania	16/10	89.1
Indiana	11/5	95.5	Rhode Island	5/3	76.0
Iowa	9/8	94.8	South Carolina	9/5	81.2
Kansas	8/5	74.2	South Dakota	5/3	80.0
Kentucky	9/3	90.0	Tennessee	10/4	95.5
Louisiana	11/4	61.0	Texas	25/13	45.2
Maine	5/4	67.5	Utah	8/0
Maryland	9/6	90.0	Vermont	5/4	72.8
Massachusetts	10/7	66.1	Virginia	10/5	91.2
Michigan	15/11	91.5	Washington	10/7	67.9
Minnesota	10/7	88.0	West Virginia	8/5	87.6
Mississippi	9/6	76.0	Wisconsin	10/5	91.8
			Wyoming	5/4	80.0

This survey was conducted and written up by Christopher Davenport, with assistance from Rosemary Romberg. This report is a publication of the INTACT Educational Foundation. Extra copies are available from:

Rosemary Romberg
4521 Fremont Street
Bellingham, WA 98226

or Jeffrey R. Wood
P.O. Box 5
Wilbraham, MA 01095

Single copy – 45¢ plus business-size self-addressed, stamped envelope
12 copies – $4.50 plus $1.00 postage and handling
50 copies – $12.00 plus $2.00 postage and handling
100 copies – $20.00 plus $3.00 postage and handling

Other information sheets, technical articles, slide sets, and teaching aids are also available. Please write for free information.

Circumcision: The Issue Behind The Foreskin
From: Journal of the South Carolina Medical Association, November 1984: 547-8.

Despite formal statements by the American Academy of Paediatrics declaring the lack of medical indications for neonatal circumcision, approximately 95 to 98 percent of newborn males appear to be undergoing the procedure. Investigation into physician and parent attitudes has been carried out, and both proponents and opponents of the operation have outlined the rationale for either removal or preservation of the foreskin. To date no review of actual patient attitudes is available. In lieu of interrogating large numbers of neonatal males, a retrospective opinion survey of adult males in a select population was accomplished.

Methods

A standard questionnaire was presented to men attending the outpatient clinics at a large medical centre hospital. Participation was entirely anonymous and voluntary, and the patients responding were distributed among the surgical, primary care, urology, orthopedic, family medicine, and internal medicine clinics. The period of the survey covered three months. Not all items on the survey form had to be completed in order for the patient to be included in the study.

Results

There were 311 respondents, with ages from 18 to 48 years. Over half (58.5 percent) were less than 30 years of age. All were high school graduates, 32.5 percent were college graduates, and 14.5 percent had completed at least two years of postgraduate work. Two hundred eighty-one (90.4 percent) were born within the continental United States. Two hundred five, or almost two-thirds (65.9 percent) were circumcised within the first month of life with 13 (6.3 percent) expressing regret. Of the remaining 106 men uncircumcised at birth, 50 (47.2 percent) would have preferred having the procedure done as a neonate. Furthermore, 25 (50.0 percent) of the latter group had been circumcised later in life. These results are summarised in Table 1. Reasons given for desiring neonatal circumcision included perception of higher risks for cancer of the penis in uncircumcised males and for cancer of the cervix in sexual partners of these men. Others mentioned the difficulty of maintaining desired penile hygiene with an intact foreskin. Uncircumcised respondents who indicated a preference for circumcision explained that they viewed the procedure too risky, too painful, or too embarrassing for an adult.

Neonatally Circumcised	Neonatally Uncircumcised
205 (65.9%)	106 (34.1%)
Regrets	Regrets
13 (6.3%)	50 (47.2%)
	Later Circumcised
	25 (50.0%)

Table 1

Further characteristics of the population surveyed and some of the findings are delineated in Table 2. Fifty-one (16.4 percent) of the respondents were Black, 240 (77.2 percent) Caucasian, and 20 (6.4 percent) were either of other racial origin or were undetermined responses. One hundred seventy-four (55.9 percent) were Protestant, 61 (19.6 percent) Catholic, and five (1.6 percent) Jewish. The great majority were born in hospitals (85.2 percent) and 10.6 percent were born at home, with the remainder unspecified.

Characteristics Of The Surveyed Group
Black	51	(16.4%)
Caucasian	240	(77.2%)
Protestant	174	(55.9%)
Catholic	61	(19.6%)
Hospital Born	265	(85.2%)
Home Born	33	(10.6%)

Table 2

Table 3 illustrates the frequency of the procedure in the group with respect to race, religious preference, and place of birth. As can be seen, the frequency of neonatal circumcisions was higher in Caucasians and in those born in hospitals but was not significantly different in Protestants versus Catholics. Among those not circumcised at birth, 39.7 percent of Caucasians and 60.6 percent of Blacks would have preferred the operation.

---

Frequency Of Procedure

Blacks	18	(35.3%)
Caucasians	177	(73.8%)
Protestants	113	(64.9%)
Catholics	41	(67.2%)
Hospital Born	197	(74.3%)
Home Born	3	(9.1%)

Table 3

---

Discussion

The information obtained from this survey has obvious utility when discussing the operation of circumcision with parents of newborn males. Since 'informed consent' of the patient per se in this setting is impossible, the parents should be privy to as much data as feasible prior to making a decision. The necessity of fully-informed consent becomes apparent when one considers that neonatal circumcision rates approach 95 to 98 percent in spite of the aforementioned statements from the American Academy of Paediatrics.

The frequency of the procedure varies with individual physicians. Patel reported in 1966 that neonatal circumcision was done almost always by those openly favouring it and only 20 percent as often by those opposed. Lovell and Cox revealed some inaccurate notions regarding the risks of and indications for the operation as perceived by mothers of baby boys. Eighty percent of almost 200 mothers said the risks had not been explained to them by the physician doing the circumcision and apparently none of them responded that they had requested the operation because they felt that their sons would later approve it.

With the data revealed by the current study a comprehensive review of the indications, risks, probable attitudes, and background regarding circumcision can be provided parents, allowing them an informed decision on an important issue. The following comments are proposed to be included in a discussion of circumcision with parents of newborn males:

1. The American Academy of Paediatrics has said there are no absolute medical indications for the procedure.
2. The problems which might be encountered by males not circumcised as a newborn include:
  - A. Phimosis of clinical significance in approximately ten percent by age three years.
  - B. Balanitis, which rarely if ever occurs in circumcised men.
3. Neonatal circumcision is not without risks including:

- A. Serious complications such as haemorrhage or mutilation in 0.2 percent, and possibly even death in 0.0002 percent (or two in one million).
  - B. Minor problems of clinical significance (bleeding, irritation, infection, etc.) in up to four percent.
4. When adult males were surveyed, only six percent regretted having been circumcised at birth yet almost half of those not circumcised as a newborn would have preferred the operation. Furthermore, one-fourth of those left with a foreskin as an infant underwent circumcision later in life.
  5. There appear to be no major differences in attitudes towards circumcision as a neonate among American Blacks, Caucasians, Catholics, or Protestants.

Gerald E. Harmon, M.D.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 5

(Formerly Issue E)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Circumcision: A Surgeon's View		Page 2
Methods Of Circumcision Compared	Anthony	Page 6
Circumcision Clinic Thriving In Houston	L.B.	Page 8
Correspondence Received		Page 9
Yes, Circumcision Is Still A Good Idea	T.W.	Page 10
Review		Page 11
Correspondence		Page 13
Future Issues		Page 15
An Acorn Anthology Meeting	Anthony	Page 16

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome again to another newsletter from the group with 101 ideas for things to do with a foreskin. We have some good correspondence in this issue: let's have plenty more, as this newsletter relies on the contributions of its members for its success. You may have seen the letter about Acorn in the current issue of Forum, which has brought many new members. So far, most members have been predisposed towards circumcision, but several of these new members are less enthusiastic. One, Dr J, has written to say that he is particularly interested in the foreskin and its retention, and is only too willing to discuss any problems, in writing or in his London surgery, free of charge: a member wishing to be put in contact should write in to the Editor.

The BMA is thought to be going to change its rules to allow doctors to advertise: this should help an organisation such as ours to put members in touch with the help they need, but at present medics have to tread carefully.

As promised, we include in this issue an exchange of questions and answers with Mr H, the surgeon to whom the Surgical Advisory Service refers many patients. He does circumcisions on a day-patient basis using local anaesthetic, on a large and growing number of patients, some of whom have written to us to say how satisfied they are with the result. The Surgical Advisory Service currently advertises circumcision on this basis in London for £190. Many will see this fee as good value for a trouble-free procedure, but it may be beyond the means of others, and some may think the fee excessive, compared to the charges for infant circumcision mentioned in the article about Houston later in the Newsletter.

T.A.

Circumcision: A Surgeon's View

A leading expert in the surgery of circumcision has answered a long string of questions for Acorn newsletter, as follows:

1. What do you advise patients as to the advantages and disadvantages of circumcision?
  - A. I do not think there are any disadvantages in performing circumcision. The advantages are:
    - a. Prevention of the development of cancer in the male organ.
    - b. Prevention of the development of cancer in the female organ.
    - c. Prophylactic advantage of removing herpetic lesions (i.e. herpes sores) for social and hygienic reasons.
    - d. Treatment of phimosis (i.e. tightening of the foreskin).
    - e. Treatment of paraphimosis (strangulation by tight foreskin behind glans).

- f. Treatment of balanitis (inflammation of the foreskin).
  - g. Treatment of cysts and other lesions of the foreskin.
  - h. Treatment of tight frenulum.
- 2 Are there any categories of patient whom you would strongly advise against circumcision?
- A Strict, absolute contraindications for circumcision include congenital malformations (such as hypospadias, i.e. the urethral opening is underneath the shaft and not at the tip of the glans). The foreskin is needed for plastic reconstruction of the urethra. In adult patients, of course, these are very rare. Other than that, there are no absolute contraindications.
- 3 Which age do you consider best for circumcision, (a) to produce the most satisfactory cosmetic result, and (b) to minimise inconvenience/trauma to the patient?
- A I have performed circumcisions from the age of day one, and the oldest patient on whom I have myself performed the operation was 85. But I would consider patients of above 70-75 with great discretion, as they take a longer time to heal. Other than this, there is no upper age limit for good cosmetic results.
- 4 What do you think are the comparative advantages and disadvantages of local and general anaesthesia for circumcision? What complications occur with day-patients, how frequently, and what precautions do you recommend them to take?
- A I have now performed this operation under local anaesthesia for the last 5 years with a special technique of my own. I do not consider that there are any circumstances in which this operation has to be performed under general anaesthesia except for children under the age of 5, or a person of nervous disposition, or those who have an adverse reaction to local anaesthesia, which is extremely rare. The patient comes to hospital as a day case. There is no need for hospitalization and the patient is discharged after half an hours rest in the clinic. He can return to work etc later the same day.
- 5 When giving local anaesthesia, for about how long do you intend it to last?
- A Local anaesthesia should last 2-4 hours, which enables the patient to take the journey back home if he has come a long way for the operation.
- 6 Are there any categories of circumcision patient for whom you consider local anaesthesia inappropriate?
- A Local anaesthesia is inappropriate for children under the age of 5, or an extreme form of acute dermatitis of the skin, or any obvious acute ulceration and inflammation of the prepuce.

- 7 Which circumcision technique do you think gives the most satisfactory result, and why? Are different techniques desirable, depending on the age of the patient, for example, or on other factors?
  - A My technique is a simple single prick installation of 20ml of 2% local lignocaine anaesthesia and a standard technique circumcision with the application of clamps. At this stage I cannot reveal the exact technique.
- 8 Dorsal incision or stretching of the preputial meatus are sometimes suggested as an alternative to circumcision. What do you consider are the arguments for and against these procedures?
  - A Alternative techniques for circumcision are not recommended as they leave ugly scars and do not serve a purpose. I try to discourage partial slits or excision of the frenulum as such.
- 9 Please describe the ideal outcome of a circumcision, in terms of
  - (a) how much of the inner foreskin should be allowed to remain, i.e. how close should the scar-line be to the coronal sulcus?
    - A The scar should be about  $\frac{1}{4}$  of an inch away from the margin of the glans. The length of the foreskin depends upon the length of the organ, hence each patient is treated on his own merits. The scar should be smooth.
  - (b) how slack or tight should be the skin on the shaft?
    - A The degree of tightness or slackness depends, of course, upon the wishes of the patient, which should be ascertained previously.
  - (c) should the frenulum be left intact, divided, or dissected out?
    - A The frenulum can be divided or left intact: this should be discussed with the patient.
- 10 To what extent do you take into account the wishes of a patient regarding the intended outcome of circumcision?
  - A In general all patients are counselled in my Harley Street rooms, as well as prior to the surgery itself. All the patient's wishes are taken into consideration. The patient must sign a consent form before the operation.
- 11 What would be your advice to a patient who asked for
  - (a) 'semi-circumcision' to merely shorten the foreskin, so as to leave the glans half-covered (at least in the flaccid state);
    - A There is no such thing as 'semi-circumcision': I would not recommend this form of operation.
  - (b) or a very radical circumcision, e.g. to leave the shaft-skin very tight, and/or to remove as much as possible of the mucous membrane so as to place the scar-line at the coronal sulcus?

- A A very radical circumcision is generally not done; however tightening of the skin has been carried out for patients with too much elasticity, which of course happens in the (?) stage.
- 12 What suture technique do you use? Do you consider a few sutures sufficient, or do you use many small ones, as in some techniques of cosmetic surgery? Do you use soluble sutures, and if so, how long do you recommend that they should remain in place? What do you think of the suggestion that using 3/0 monofilamentous polypropylene, removed after 5-7 days, reduces the likelihood of formation of nodules or fistulas at suture sites? Some correspondents (none of them your patients so far as I know) have mentioned these as adverse outcomes following circumcision. Have you encountered this problem, and, if so, what solutions do you suggest?
- A I use a continuous suture technique, using catgut disposable sutures. This gives the advantage that the patient does not have to return for removal of the sutures, which dissolve in  $2\frac{1}{2}$  to 3 weeks. Synthetic nylon or Ethicon sutures are not advisable, as they leave more fistulas (holes) or pock-marks. An absorbable synthetic suture in the form of coated vicryl can be used: I have used it for revision of circumcision.
- 13 What advice do you give in response to the common fear of an erection during the healing period, which might reopen the wound and delay healing? Do you prescribe medication to suppress erections, e.g. Stilboestrol?
- A As a general principle, I usually prescribe Diazepam, a tranquilliser, one tablet to be taken at night for the next three nights. For the last four years there have been no problems with patients complaining of erections disturbing the healing pattern after operation. I do not recommend the prescribing of hormones as there is no indication for female hormones to be taken by the male, other than if indicated for conditions like cancers etc, eg cancer of the prostate.
- 14 What do you advise patients about treatment and aftercare following circumcision? e.g. dressings, period of sexual abstinence, etc.
- A There is a non-stick dressing on the shaft which should remain for 48 hours, and this slips off very easily. I recommend, of course, that the patient does not bathe until 48 hours after the operation, and then uses dilute Savlon lotion. I usually request that then the patient leaves the wound without a dressing, with plenty of fresh air to heal under normal circumstances.
- 15 What case-histories (in general) are presented to you by patients seeking circumcision? Have you been able to form any views as to the motivation, average age and social characteristics of such patients?
- A Indications and motivations for patients to come to me for this operation are plenty, including the standard ones described in textbooks (cysts, herpes, phimosis and paraphimosis, balanitis, etc); also prevention of carcinomas (male and female), prevention of viruses, social reasons, hygiene reasons, sexual reasons.

- 16 What is your estimate of the demand for elective circumcision, and what factors influence this?
- A In my personal experience the demand for male adult circumcision is on the increase. I have performed more operations this year so far than last year, as the general public become more aware of the advantages of circumcision being performed as a day case with a minimum of fuss. With a consumer-based ideology, I am sure the demand for the operation in this country will increase.

Methods Of Circumcision Compared

There are about a hundred methods of circumcision, so I have confined myself to the six most popularly used today, two religious/ritual, two classical surgical and two twentieth century instrumental. In the USA most neonates are circumcised either with the Gomco clamp or the Plastibell, or are given the traditional Jewish Brit Milah. Note that all these three are done without any anaesthesia. The baby is held with legs apart and bent, either strapped to a specially-designed shaped board or held by the Sandek, the Jewish God-father.

Because circumcision is the most practised surgical operation in the USA, foreskins are dispatched in record time. Manufacturers of the Mogen clamp and the Plastibell claim it is possible to circumcise in one and three minutes respectively. The Gomco clamp has to remain closed for 5 minutes before the foreskin is cut away, the total operation when it is used lasts 8-10 minutes. The two last stages of the Jewish ritual, tearing the mucous membrane to uncover the glans, and applying suction to remove blood, must extend the ritual operation to 3-4 minutes.

The Mogen clamp is claimed to be the least painful method. Both the Gomco clamp and the Plastibell require an initial dorsal slit before the foreskin is clamped or tied off, which may be more painful. Some Americans claim to be able to recall the experience of circumcision under hypnosis. If true, the pain league table is an indictment of medical practice, since the operation is experienced by about nine out of every ten American males. If duration is the measure, then the least painful is the non-ritual use of the Mogen clamp (1 minute), followed by Brit Milah with a shield or clamp (3-4 minutes), the Plastibell (3 minutes), and the most painful is the Gomco clamp (8-10 minutes).

American neonatal circumcisions exceed British ones by 100:1, and the British methods are of a different mix. The Gomco clamp is almost unknown

Most Common Methods of Neonatal to Juvenile Circumcision

Technique	Anaesthetic given	Glans protection	Simultaneous removal of both layers	Separate removal of inner layer	Suturing cut edges	Dressing	Application to adult	Appearance and identification
Islamic (Khitān) in non-muslim country	Sometimes local (dependent on age)	YES in most cases, clamp	NO	NO membrane rolled off glans on to shaft	NO except bleeding parts. Yes with larger penis	YES	YES performed by doctor with local anaesthetic	Scar half-way down shaft of erect penis all the way round. (could be 3-4in from glans)
Jewish (Brit Milah) by Mohel	NO on neonates worldwide	YES shield or Mogen Clamp in USA	NO skin removed quill shaped	NO membrane split dorsally and reflected back over glans	NO	YES around shaft but not glans	YES performed by doctor/mohel using local anaesthetic	Scar at angle to glans with greatest membrane to scar band at top decreasing to intact frenulum. Skin bulking around frenulum when flaccid
Classical Forceps Guided	YES General	YES Sinus or clamping forceps for Mogen clamp in USA)	NO	NO membrane split dorsally to 1/4 in of corona and removed	YES starting with frenal stitch	YES	NO	Least tidy of all nonritual circumcision scars with line irregularities and lack of symmetry. Scar should be 1/4 in in behind glans when erect
Classical Dorsal Slit with trimming at both sides	YES General	NO but glans is fully exposed after dorsal slit	YES	NO	YES starting with frenal stitch	YES	YES	There may be irregularities but edges will be matched by a single cut. Scar should be 1/2 in in behind glans when erect
* Gomco Clamp 9 sizes: 1.1cm small newborn to 3.6cm	NO on USA neonates	YES Glans is secure within metal bell	YES	NO	NO except at bleeding parts (yes over 12 months old)	YES	YES with glans up to 3.6cm in width	Perfectly straight scarline (1/32 in wide) Less prepucce remaining than with Plastibell, so scar will sit nearer to the glans when erect
Plastibell 3 sizes 1.1cm very small to 1.7cm large	NO on USA or UK neonates	YES Plastic bell over glans	YES by ligature	NO	NO	NO	NO largest size would only fit 7-9 year old with small penis	Perfectly straight scarline further down the erect penis than the Gomco clamp. 1 in to almost 2 in (in fitting and tying there is 1cm of prepucce between sulcus & ligature)

* Most commonly used circumcision instrument

(unlike in continental Europe), but use of the disposable Plastibell is relatively common, vying with the traditional 'cut, trim and stitch' method. Though only about 1% of the young are circumcised, neat results are beginning to outnumber the ragged ones that were once widespread.

In the first three methods in the Table; Jewish, Islamic and forceps guided, the forward-drawn prepuce is held in a shield, clamp or by forceps and the knife is swept downward along the guide. This often results in small dog-ears of skin at each end, dorsal and frenal, of the incision.

Where remaining inner membrane is turned back as in the Islamic and Jewish methods, the circumcision is less tight. Where this membrane is removed in a second stage of the operation, it may be more difficult to match up the two cut surfaces, especially in infants, and the result may be less attractive cosmetically.

Ideally both preputial layers should be excised simultaneously, so that the cut edges of skin are precisely matched. Both the Plastibell and Gomco do this, and have the further advantage of bloodless surgery (apart from the initial dorsal slit to facilitate fitting). The instrument can be skilfully adjusted so as to vary the amount of foreskin removed, and personally I would advocate a positioning which results in the glans remaining almost half-covered.

In choosing the most suitable method, consideration should be given to pain (if no anaesthetic is used), size of penis, amount of skin to be removed, and neatness. So for the neonate, the Plastibell or Mogen clamp is least painful. For a child, the Plastibell or Gomco clamps give the neatest result. For a youth or an adult, the Islamic method, the Gomco clamp or the classical freehand methods allow precision in the final result. The final appearance of the modified penis would be dramatically improved if universal instrumental foreshortening replaced non-ritual freehand surgery on the small organ. For the adult, the larger size allows reasonable neatness with most methods, but the Gomco clamp guarantees it.

Anthony.

Circumcision Clinic Thriving In Houston From American Medical News, January 11, 1985

Finding a need and filling it is a market principle that found a medical application in the case of Houston's first circumcision clinic. Circumcision Services Inc., a for-profit venture launched in August 1984, was conceived by professional marketers who have connections at the Texas Medical Centre. Because Houston's Harris County Hospital does not perform circumcisions on the 8,000 to 9,000 male infants born there annually, resident physicians began joking about opening a clinic for just such a purpose.

The joke stopped, however, when the idea reached a resident's wife who is in commercial marketing in Houston. Six partners collected $22,000 in start-up capital, a building near the hospital was rented, five to six resident obstetrician-gynaecologists were recruited, and the clinic was opened on August 1. For $35 (raised to $45 in October), parents can bring in their 3-day to 3-month-old infant for the simple surgical procedure.

"We have five residents on a rotating schedule", said John W. Zern, one of the clinic partners. He explained that settling on the cost of the procedure was difficult because "people associate price with quality. We are learning a lot about the public's perceptions of quality care versus costs. $45 seems to be a popular price", he said. Only cash is accepted. The clinic is open from 6 pm to 9 pm Monday, Wednesday and Thursday and 10 am to 2 pm on Saturday. "We tried to set the hours so that both parents could bring the infant", Zern noted.

The clinic has the blessings of Baylor medical school staff. Some physicians have referred parents who want the operation for their sons to the clinic, and people as far away as Dallas have come to the clinic. Appointments are not necessary at the clinic, which has four rooms for the operation and employs a nurse, receptionist and the physicians, one or two of whom are present during hours. The entire procedure takes about 20 to 25 minutes, Zern said, depending on the infant's clothing.

"If there's one thing we learned, it is that people put too many clothes on infants," he said jokingly about the time needed to undress and dress the babies. "Medical information about the procedure is given to parents by physicians; other information comes from the staff", Zern said.

Marketing the clinic is handled through advertising the clinic's address on a brochure distributed by the American College of Obstetricians and Gynaecologists in a gift pack given to new mothers. Other advertising comes by word of mouth, Zern said. Although jokes continue to flow about the clinic and the prospect of expanding into a nationwide franchised business, Zern said he did not see his group "diversifying too soon. The concern over the medical aspect is a given; the experiment with profit involved is secondary. We are very sensitive about diversifying too soon, but we've already had enquiries about franchises."

Linda Busch

Correspondence Received

Thanks to John McC, Anthony, and Bill for some long contributions which we hope to include in later issues.

Yes, Circumcision Is Still A Good Idea

From Health Confidential, April 1988

Circumcision is performed on 1.25 million infants and on thousands of older children and adults every year. Today 60% to 80% of boys [in the USA] have their foreskins surgically removed. This surgical procedure has come under increasing attack and is not usually reimbursed by most medical insurance. However, my findings and those of others confirm that circumcision is an important preventive medical procedure that should continue to be performed. The advantages far outweigh any potential disadvantages. The relevant findings are:

- Circumcised boys are 10-20 times less likely to contract urinary tract infections (UTIs) during their first year, and 15-20 times less likely to contract UTIs between ages one and 15. These UTIs are far from benign. Those who suffer from severe chronic infections often wind up with kidney failure and must undergo routine dialysis.
- Circumcised men are about 50% less likely to contract sexually transmitted diseases, including syphilis and gonorrhoea. The reason is that the foreskin is easily abraded during sex, giving disease-causing micro-organisms easy access to the man's bloodstream. Venereal warts are almost unheard of in circumcised men. Many causes of cervical cancer in women are associated with the wart-causing virus being passed during sex. Uncircumcised men may be passing on these cancer-causing viruses to their lovers.
- Circumcision lowers the risk of penile cancer. Of 50,000 US cases, all but nine occurred in uncircumcised men.

Circumcision also reduces the risk of balanitis and posthitis, annoying localised fungal and bacterial infections of the penis. As many as 10% of the men must be circumcised in adulthood to eliminate such chronic infections. Those who suffer from a fairly common condition called phimosis (tight foreskin) also benefit from circumcision. Phimosis can be extremely painful and may prevent erections.

Myths: That circumcision reduces penile sensations; that circumcising a newborn without anaesthesia causes emotional trauma that carries into later life. No scientific evidence exists for either of these claims. Note that general anaesthesia for the newborn is not the solution either. Because a newborn's respiratory passages are smaller, chances of upper respiratory tract problems increase. Local anaesthesia does relieve discomfort.

Boys over age one and adults who were not circumcised should seek out the procedure, if desired, with a urologist. A drawback is that circumcision is a much bigger production in adults than in infants. Adult men who undergo circumcision typically need general anaesthesia (which involves some risk) and miss a week of work after the procedure. The total cost (surgery and hospitalisation plus lost work time) comes to $3,000 to $4,000.

Newborn circumcision as practised today is a fast, inexpensive ($100) and safe procedure. Within 48 hours of birth the infant boy's foreskin is swiftly cut off and disposed of. In most cases the incision heals quickly without stitches. For every 1,000 circumcisions, only two result in serious complications. Occasionally the procedure leads to septicemia. Very rarely doctors take off too much tissue, and in extremely rare cases the entire penis has been removed. The very small latter risk can be all but eliminated if the surgeon uses a scalpel rather than an electrical probe. Parents should try to find a surgeon with considerable experience.

Thomas Wiswell, MD
(Walter Reed Army Medical Centre)

Review

Foreskin: its past, its present and ... its future?*
by Bud Berkeley and Joe Tiffenbach, 208 pages, 1983, from Bud Berkeley, PO Box 26011, San Francisco 94126, USA.

This book was compiled as the result of Bud Berkeley's successful formation of an organisation called the Uncircumcised Society of America (USA), which shares with Acorn the aim of exchanging information about circumcision and foreskins among those of us who find the subject interesting. The two groups each have a different emphasis, however, because they cater mainly for the minority in each country: roundheads in Britain and cavaliers in the USA.

He began with a questionnaire which asks for some social characteristics and a genital description, and includes questions such as: Are you shy about being uncircumcised/circumcised? Do your fantasies include having a foreskin/being circumcised? Your sexual orientation? Your sexual activities? Do you want to know more about circumcision? etc. About 12 pages summarise some of the basic statistical data and some one-line comments received in response to such questionnaires. Another 70 pages are extracts, a few lines to a page or more in length, from letters generated by the U.S.A., and many of them published in Foreskin Quarterly (FQ), a journal which it published (still publishes?) These cover the range from men who are glad to be circumcised to men who are glad to have foreskins, via several who are dissatisfied with whichever state they are in. There are descriptions of what they use their equipment for, and also many accounts of how they were circumcised or narrowly avoided it. Many of these involve encounters with forces medical personnel, several of whom conducted 'short-arm' inspections and some of whom applied substantial degrees of pressure to ensure if possible that all the personnel in their unit were circumcised.

The first half of the book is 'A long history of the American foreskin, shortened'. This traces the spread of circumcision onwards from ancient Egypt and Jews in Biblical times. The onslaught of the crusades ended Islamic tolerance of the foreskin, and resulted in many a knight in shining armour being sent back to his cold northern woods without the benefit of his 'hood'.

Later, but as far back as 1661, 'the Old London Company' realised that her many phimosed employees were in mortal danger. Knowing that it was impossible to protect British foreskins from zealot Moghuls, the British governor of Madras proclaimed that all applicants to the Company be "bodily examined" and if a cadet could not "strip his yard", the company surgeon was obliged to "clip ye skin entire". This is taken as the start of 300 years of circumcision of European Christians by European Christians, and it is claimed that records still exist with explicit details of which of the builders of empire were 'clipcocks' and which were 'pillcocks' (or peelcocks, uncircumcised).

By the early 19th century "the clipcock became fashion among the British aristocracy, who wore it as a badge of honour, proof of serving Throne and Empire in foreign service" (p.31). It spread to other classes in the second half of the 19th century, impelled by a hysteria against masturbation, so that by 1914, 85% of upper class and nearly 50% of working class males were circumcised. At that point prevention of VD took over as the favoured reason given for encouraging circumcision. The well established link between the forces medical personnel and the operation was continued through World War II, Korea and Viet Nam.

The book goes on to discuss foreskin restoration operations from Roman to modern times, and mentions another US organisation, BUFF (Brothers for Future Foreskins), which aimed to advise and encourage men who were dissatisfied with their circumcised state: the most effective technique seems to be to stretch and tension the remains of the circumcised foreskin, and partial or full coverage of the glans is claimed to be possible with persistence. The book is extensively illustrated by Berkeley's co-author with photographs on every second or third page which illustrate the wide variety of penises, both with and without foreskins. There are also some line drawings reproducing Egyptian hieroglyphic accounts of circumcision, etc. The book is unique in its discussion and illustration at such length, and is unusual in emphasising the foreskin rather than circumcision, although it will be of interest whichever viewpoint is yours, whether for or against circumcision. No price is given. For US postal purposes it is apparently possible to avoid censorship by stating that you are soliciting private correspondence and that all matter received as a result through the US Postal Service is acceptable to you and will not offend you and that you are at least 18 years of age. Whether a similar statement would satisfy the British Customs or Postal censors can only be a matter of experiment.

Correspondence

Dear Editor: Andy (Issue 2) claims that 'most of the men interested in circumcision are totally heterosexual'. Sorry, but that just isn't true; there are quite a large number of gay and bisexual men who are interested too. I am sorry that Andy doesn't feel that gay or bisexual men are welcome in the group, but that is his problem. Let us all please remember that we share a common interest in the subject of circumcision. We can all contribute, and we can all gain a better understanding of the subject. I for one want this group to be a success. It doesn't matter to me what a person's sexual leanings are. We are all individuals, so please don't let this Newsletter become just another platform for anti-gay views.

K.

Dear Tony: I hope the letter from the other Andy of London in Issue 2 doesn't represent club policy. My own view is that Acorn should be for anyone, gay or straight, who takes an interest in getting the cock into the best possible shape. I very much look forward to the next issue.

Andy S.

[Thanks Andy I think your phrase about the group being "for anyone who takes an interest in getting the cock into the best possible shape" is an excellent summary of our aims. — Tony Acorn]

Dear Editor: I was delighted to receive details of Acorn and to know that something is being done to lift the wraps on the simple operation of circumcision. Please enrol me as a member of the Acorn group. May I congratulate you on the apt choice of title: Acorn applies to both the 'haves' and the 'have nots'. I would summarise my own views as follows:

As a Christian I do not endow circumcision with any religious or spiritual significance, but think that a large proportion of the population would benefit from the operation. In general I regard male circumcision as healthy, hygienic and aesthetic, contributing to improved sexual performance by the man and increased enjoyment by his partner.

Ritual female circumcision is to be deplored as an unnecessary and cruel mutilation. Nevertheless, many women are endowed with an over-abundant or adherent prepuce, preventing proper stimulation of the clitoris. In such cases orgasmic response is greatly enhanced following exposure of the clitoris.

Adult male circumcision may well lead to difficulty during masturbation, due to the different techniques required (until these are learnt), but this is fully compensated by the greater satisfaction reached in sexual intercourse.

Yours sincerely, A.W.

Dear Tony, Thanks for your prompt reply. Your concern that the ecraseur method can cause difficulties was well taken. While I experienced no trouble, I have, since my own circumcision, helped four other men circumcise themselves, two by correspondence. One correspondent had a very strong erection on the third day that partially pulled the skin out from under the ecraseur. Although this produced only minor bleeding and eventually healed OK, the swelling that accompanied the accident caused difficulties with urination. He decided to remove the ecraseur. He cut the ring where the skin had slipped from under it, and by soaking to soften the scab, was able to remove the ecraseur with hardly any bleeding. The wound healed slowly but satisfactorily and except for a wide scar the results were quite cosmetic.

Sincerely, Warren.

Dear Tony: A friend on holiday was on a beach in Spain last year. He heard a commotion and saw a guy of about 17 being led by a group of about fifteen people along the beach with his hands tied. They took him to a spot where there were some trees, stripped him and tied him with his legs apart to the forked branches of a fallen tree. The guy was then forcibly circumcised by one of the group, who then placed the ring of foreskin over one of his fingers and showed it to the rest of the group. The operator seemed well experienced, and had come with the necessary dressings. I can only assume that the guy was circumcised either as some sort of punishment, or as a form of ritual initiation. Have you ever heard of similar incidents?

Sincerely, Keith.

Dear TA: Thank you for forming Acorn. Since J.M. stated the case so well with 'Cock Cut Club', I've watched for just such a positive response. I trust in your confidentiality. Once again, well done.

Alan B.

Dear Sir: I would like to join and enclose £5 for this year's subscription. I am 42, a keen masturbator, and the proud owner of a foreskin, which I prefer. I am against circumcision except on medical or religious grounds. If a tight foreskin is the problem, only partial and not complete removal of the foreskin should be attempted. I look forward to being a member of the group.

Yours faithfully, D.M.C.

Dear Acorn: I enclose my subscription. When I have seen the newsletter, I might pluck up courage and write to you, but at the moment I am a bit too shy.

Yours sincerely, A.A.

Dear Sir: I am currently doing research into the changing attitudes in this country and the US towards circumcision and the foreskin. The intention is to contrast the widespread but little realised distress of the man circumcised in infancy with the fanatical zeal of the foreskin phobes. The key to both attitudes is the attitude of the sexually aware woman towards the foreskin and its removal. Can the group help, do you think?

R.B.W.

Dear Sir: As one whose sex life has been wrecked by circumcision (Forum published a letter from me recently giving details), I am interested in seeing the subject discussed, particularly from the woman's point of view.

R.B.W.

Dear TA: You may have read some of my comments on circumcision in past issues of Forum. I am particularly interested in the foreskin and its retention. I know many men have hang-ups on their penises and I am only too willing to discuss the problems in writing or my surgery free of charge and act as honorary advisor to Acorn. Good luck with your project.

Dr J.S.

Dear Tony: Many thanks for the Acorn newsletters. I have found them fascinating reading. Please keep up the good work. I have passed on the newsletter address to a few interested people from Forum correspondence. I found the personal accounts much more interesting than the more lengthy facts and figures. It would be nice to see some contributions by women, especially on the subject of female circumcision.

Yours sincerely, R.A.

Meeting

Some members have indicated their interest in a meeting in Oxford in the evening of 24/25 September. The cost for a single bed-room and breakfast in a guest house will be about £16. Members will make their own booking, identify themselves to each other once they have arrived, and allow the evening to develop from there. If you would like details, write to Acorn.

An Acorn Anthology of Words and Phrases

American Clipper: a New York rabbi. New York has the world's largest Jewish community (2.8 million in 1976). There is even a Circumcision Street.

Arel: Hebrew for unclean, of meat, etc. Arelim (plural) refer to the uncircumcised, as contrasted with goyim, non-Jews or gentiles who may be circumcised

Balanitis: from the Greek for 'acorn' + 'itis', inflammation. Inflammation of the mucous membrane forming the inner surface of the foreskin, it is one of the few ways of obtaining an NHS circumcision. The cause is anaerobic organisms (such as spirochete and fusiform bacillus) which thrive in the moist interior of the prepuce. Antiseptic and topical antibiotic treatments are usually considered before resorting to surgery.

Bilharzia: a serious systemic trematode worm infection, common on the Nile, which affects some 5% of humanity as well as sheep, cattle and camels, described by T. Bilharz in 1881. It causes debility, and a symptom is bleeding when urinating. The infection is water-borne, and the point of ingress was thought to be the penis, with Egyptian-type circumcision as a preventive. During the First World War British soldiers were ordered to wear condoms when swimming as a precaution against the disease.

Blaengroen: Welsh for foreskin, 'blauen' foremost, 'groen (croen)' skin. The complete penile meaning exists as groen/blauen/gwilan/gior: skin/ foremost/ rod/man.

Brit Milah: Hebrew covenant + Mishnaic Hebrew cutting; the covenant of circumcision, usually just referred to as the brit (pronounced 'briss').

Anthony

Future Issues

Issue 6 of the Newsletter is planned for late July, but there will then be a break until October before the next issue. I hope it will be possible to produce one or two further issues in November/December, so please keep your contributions coming.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 6

(Formerly Issue F)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
From Our Norwegian Correspondent		Page 2
Retracted Foreskins	M.L.	Page 3
More From The Acorn Dictionary		Page 4
Letters to Acorn	Various	Page 6
Replies To Questions In Issue 1	Borderer	Page 8
The Rôle of the Foreskin In Orgasm	J. McC.	Page 9
Fall and Rise of the Foreskin		Page 12
Foreskin Envy	Tony	Page 14
More Letters to Acorn	Various	Page 15
Press Coverage Increases		Page 22
Dear Tony	Warren	Page 23
Meeting		Page 24
Future Issues		Page 24

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

We have an extra-large issue this time. Many thanks to all of you who have contributed the letters which we have included: please keep them coming. Opinions are more balanced than in past issues, including some thoughtful letters against circumcision as well as some in favour. We also have an interesting comparison by John McC. of the relative sensitivities of the glans and inner foreskin, and a copy of the recent half-page article in The Independent newspaper in favour of infant circumcision.

T.A.

From Our Norwegian Correspondent

Scandinavia is usually thought of as uniformly opposed to circumcision. Interesting light was shed on this issue in the newspaper Osloavisen, with its sensational June 4 headline: "Small boys mistreated in hospital". This was based on a statement by Sten Sander, the surgical consultant at Aker Hospital, the gist of which was that several hundred circumcisions were done in Oslo hospitals every year; he thought this was child abuse, to remove so sensitive a part of the sex organ. Furthermore, other important operations might be delayed. Another surgeon thought that immigrant groups should bring their own circumcisers with them.

The total number of circumcisions in Oslo hospitals was unclear. Aker Hospital did about 150 in 1987, but this excluded operations in the maternity department. The 150 had to be done on overtime, at an estimated cost to the health service of 2,000 to 5,000 kroner each (£200-£500). Most of the patients were Muslims from Pakistan, but there were also some circumcisions of Norwegian boys with tight foreskins. The surgical department now flatly rejected requests for circumcisions, which were done by the paediatricians on boys up to eight years old in both Aker and Ulleval hospitals. In both, no circumcisions had been done for some months, and there was a waiting list of 50-60 boys. Helge Jensen, the paediatric consultant at Aker considered that the risk of bleeding and infection increased if the operation was left beyond the perinatal period. Local anaesthetic was used on the newborn, but normally general anaesthetic was used on older boys. Although he found it a thankless task, there was no room for personal opinion, since the central health authority had issued instructions that the operation must be done. Commenting on the long queue, he said that he had rejected a request from a 20-year-old, and would call a halt for boys over 8-10 years, but he did not think that 'child-abuse' was an appropriate phrase to use in this context.

The following issue of the paper carried a reply from the Imam of the Muslim congregation which emphasised that circumcision was absolutely fundamental for Muslims. It was quite unthinkable for a Muslim not to circumcise his sons. He referred back to Abraham as the origin of the custom, and argued that there was a similar obligation on Jews and Christians, since Abraham represented the original true religion. Abraham advocated circumcision, and practised the custom on his own sons. God sent the prophets to build a better life for the people, not a worse one. So a custom laid on us by the prophet Abraham could not involve mistreatment. Since Norway was a country with freedom of religion, circumcision could not be forbidden. A good government should meet the needs of the whole people, if necessary with a special department for circumcisions, so that there would be no conflict with other medical needs. The reporter asked five members of the public for their views, but either they had none, or thought that people had a right to practice their own religious customs; and, besides, it might well be cleaner.

The Imam's 5,000-strong congregation thought that a hospital clinic should be established for circumcisions. He was supported by a Socialist politician, Saeed Anjum, who argued that minority groups had enough difficulties already. The newspaper headline had given the impression that Norwegian doctors were being pressed to do something against their will. Circumcision was not an urgent matter, and could wait until urgent cases were dealt with first. But in a society where the health service was responsible for the good health of the population, the public health service has a duty to circumcise boys.

Retracted Foreskins

Dear Tony: I am struck by the number of your contributors who say they practised 'permanent' retraction before their circumcisions. If they were able to keep the skin held back, what is the point of circumcision? Surely the two states are very similar and it is hard to see what extra advantage the operation can confer: it is rather the opposite in fact, since the operation removes the option of second thoughts and of returning the foreskin to its natural position.

However, despite the frequency of its reporting in Acorn, I suspect that the overwhelming majority of men do not and would not want to practice permanent retraction. Like them I much prefer to wear my foreskin forward; when flaccid, the glans is completely covered, thus giving a measure of real protection as well as maintaining superb sensitivity. I would take issue with your statement in Issue 2 that 'the foreskin should slide easily back behind the glans rim on its own' when fully erect. Whilst I do not doubt that this does occur with some men, I do not think it is normal. At least  $\frac{3}{4}$  of my glans remains covered with just the slit in the glans and its surrounding area exposed, and I suspect that this is much more the norm. The foreskin can be pulled down manually to form folds below the ridge and, again contrasting with your view, effective sexual performance is not hindered.

My general impression after three issues of Acorn is that the majority of your members are circumcised. Are there any others of similar views?

Yours sincerely, M.L.

More From the Acorn Dictionary: A – D

Ampallang: short rod, often of gold, silver or ivory, worn by Dyaks in a transverse piercing of the glans, with a ball at each end to hold it in place, one of which can be unscrewed for easy insertion.

Apadravya: rod similar to an ampallang, worn in a hole pierced through the glans from front to back, and originating in India; advocated by the Kama Sutra.

Balanitis, balanoposthitis: inflammation of the foreskin, temporary or chronic, which may be caused by germs or a fungus; best remedied by circumcision.

Cavalier, pillcock: slang terms for 'uncircumcised'; contrast 'roundhead', 'clipcock'.

Celsus operation: named after Celsus Arelus Cornelius (53BC-7AD) who devised a method of uncircumcision in which the penis could be peeled back and stripped; the loosened shaft skin was then bound to the glans. If successful, a foreskin was formed after healing. Polish doctors used similar techniques (without anaesthetic) to save circumcised males from execution at the hands of the Nazis.

Cheese supper: fellation of the uncircumcised (smegma = 'cheese').

Circumcision: from Latin 'circum' around and 'caedo' cut. The removal of the prepuce from the glans penis or glans clitoris so that the glans is normally fully exposed at all times. Various forms of the operation (with different results) are practised ritually by Jews, Muslims and traditional societies in Africa, Australia and occasionally America. Therapeutically it is a remedy for phimosis, paraphimosis, and balanitis in the male and for a hooded and insensitive clitoris in the female. Routine circumcision is practised in the USA (about 80% of males) and to a lesser extent in Canada, Australia and New Zealand. Slang terms for circumcision include 'baby job' and 'Jewish national' (American), 'Brit' (Hebrew) and 'Khitan' (Muslim). 'Circumcised' evokes a plethora of terms: 'cirked', 'cised'; euphemisms: 'clipped', 'done', 'tidied up down below', 'doctored', 'nicked' ("Plumbers are afraid of working in a synagogue because they get their tools nicked"), 'been under the knife', 'No-smegs'. The commonest term, 'roundhead' is an obvious description with a reference to the Civil War, contrasting with 'cavalier' for a foreskin possessor. In Islam one of the greatest insults is 'son of an uncircumcised mother'. Ancient Roman terms of derision were 'curtus' (shortened, mutilated or circumcised), 'recutitus' (shorn, skinned, circumcised), and 'verpus' (verpa, the penis) (a circumcised male). French: circoncision. German: beschneidung.

Cicatrice, cicatrix: scar of healed wound.

Clipcock: the term for 'circumcised' used since 1661 in records of the London East India Company. The Governor of the Company's station in Madras required that all applicants be 'bodily examined' and if a cadet could not 'strip his yard' the Company surgeon was to 'clip ye skin entire' (Bud Berkeley, Foreskin).

Clitoris: from Greek 'kleis', key; plural, clitorides. A part of the female genitals equivalent to a rudimentary penis, erectile and with a glans covered by prepuce, with a great number of nerve endings and capable of being intensely stimulated. The largest recorded was 3.14 inches when erect; a clitoris over 1" is rare in whites, but may occur in 2-3% of black women.

Cock: the commonest of slang terms for the penis. Relates to the male fowl, which has had a randy reputation (at least since Chaucer's 'Chaunticleer and Pertelote', because expected to serve a large flock of hens); so common a euphemism that Americans use 'rooster' or 'cockerel' instead of cock. Hence also 'keep your pecker up'. Possibly 'cocky', cheeky, has a related origin. Also relates to 'cock' as tap/stop-cock, in relation to the urinary function.

Corona: from Latin 'crown'. The ridge or rim on the dorsal (upper) aspect of the glans, often more pronounced in those circumcised early in life. Classical circumcision involves cutting off the outer layer of foreskin and then trimming the inner layer as closely as possible to the corona.

Corpora cavernosa: the two masses of spongy tissue which form much of the structure of the penis. A third, the corpus spongiosum, forms the structure of the glans and the ventral (under) part of the penis, through which runs the urethra.

Distal: at the outer or further end, eg from the body (opposite: proximal).

Dorsal: the forward or upper surface, eg of the penis (opposite: ventral), from Latin dorsum, back. Dorsal slit (sometimes also referred to as preputiotomy): the upper surface of the foreskin is slit, as an alternative to formal circumcision. If the slit is longitudinal, from the opening (meatus) back, the foreskin hangs down beside and under the glans forming a loose mass of skin; if done in infancy, this diminishes in bulk as the penis grows. The Masai and other East African tribes customarily have the slit done transversely (across) at the level of the glans ridge. The glans is then pushed through the hole, where it is fully exposed, and the foreskin is held in place with a thorn until it has healed. It then forms a roll under the glans, giving the penis a double-ended appearance and increasing its bulk during sex. The advantage of the dorsal slit is to fully expose the glans in a simple operation with little risk of bleeding which does not remove any foreskin; the distinctive appearance may be thought a disadvantage.

Dydoe: short rod of gold, silver or ivory worn in a piercing of the glans rim, with a ball at each end to hold it in place, one of which can be unscrewed for easy insertion. Often more than one are worn.

Circumcised Boys — The Odd Ones Out?

Dear Tony: I have read Forum since about 1970 and hardly missed an issue. I was delighted to read your letter in Vol 21 No 6 and to learn that at last a society has been formed to discuss circumcision etc. One of the things that has kept me reading Forum is the correspondence on this subject. I have had a fascination for circumcision and foreskins as long as I can remember. As far back as infancy I can remember being taken to the family doctor to have my foreskin retracted, I think on more than one occasion. I grew up in the '40s and '50s, uncircumcised among a predominantly circumcised society, with a very long and not easily retractible foreskin. Eventually I was circumcised at the age of 26. I would make three comments at this stage:

1. Do circumcised boys feel as uncomfortable these days in an uncircumcised society as the uncircumcised did 30-40 years ago?
- 2.. Has the infrequency of the operation led to a lessening of skills in its performance? I know of several instances where results have left something to be desired.
3. I agree we should hear more from women, as I know they have strong views on the subject, both pro and con.

Yours sincerely, J.R.

Circumcision and Masturbation

Dear T.A.: I was 'treated' at about three or four years of age as a last measure to stop masturbation: fortunately this was eminently unsuccessful. I can't remember what it was like uncut, but have found no difficulty over the past seventy years. The unfettered glans certainly has always seemed larger than similar hooded ones. Lack of sensitivity has never been a problem. Although as a schoolboy of some 8 or 10 years I was embarrassed where the girls were concerned, 'cos in those days it was not possible to explain why mine was different, though I knew why. A pity society was not as enlightened as it is now. With best wishes for a happy and successful interchange of news and views.

Sincerely, H.M.

Uninformed Boyhood

Dear T.A.: For an introverted person like myself who has had a long and tight foreskin, Acorn is a welcome development. As a boy who had no instruction in these matters, I was excited when I managed to force the foreskin back over the glans but alarmed when I could not reverse the situation: fortunately things reverted to normal during sleep. I was also alarmed to see the attachment (which some years later I knew to be the frenulum), since

I was convinced that I was abnormal as I expected the foreskin to be fully concentric with the glans. Right up to my wedding night I thought this might be an obstacle to sexual intercourse but fortunately this was not the case.

Irritation occurred periodically beneath the foreskin, particularly working in hot dusty and gritty conditions, so much so that at one time I asked the doctor about circumcision but was told that for an adult it was a nasty operation best avoided. Latterly the foreskin has assumed the 'rolled up' position which is certainly an improvement, though on occasions it can slip down, trapping pubic hairs with embarrassing pain.

Though there are no medically compelling reasons in my case I do feel that an individual should be able to choose circumcision (provided he is willing to pay a reasonable but not excessive fee) in order to put an end to personal inconvenience. I personally would be willing to travel some distance for such a service. Though the problem may be trivial compared with many others, it is good to be able to communicate on this normally secretive matter.

Yours faithfully, R.F.

Dorsal Slit

Dear TA: I fell foul of the doctor when I was seven or eight. I had what is called a dorsal slit operation. This has left me with loads of loose skin which gathers around the base of the glans. It is quite a hindrance when making love because the skin ends up as a tube within which my penis moves. I had thought about having a complete circumcision, but am hesitating. I was told that often boys were cut to stop them masturbating. Would circumcision have that effect? Do women prefer one way or the other? The letters in Forum seem to be so varied, so it would be good to hear from others on the subject.

T.S. – Gwynedd

[Dear T.S.: H.M.'s experience of 70 years shows that you needn't fear being unable to masturbate if you have a circumcision, though you may need to experiment to find the best way to do it. The dorsal slit operation was not very frequently done, and obviously has left you with some problem. – T.A.]

Why Do I Want To Be Circumcised?

Dear Tony: Well, I seem to have to wash my foreskin more frequently than most. But a more compelling reason is that I just prefer the look and feel of it that way. I have kept my foreskin retracted for some years, but do not find it entirely satisfactory. The skin bunches and it can slide forward again, but it has given me a good impression of how it would feel.

As to the effect I want to achieve: I want to retain about half of the inner foreskin and the whole of the frenulum intact, with the line of cut parallel with the glans ridge. This will leave about  $\frac{1}{2}$  to  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch of skin all round. I want the shaft skin not to be excessively tight in erection, allowing about  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch of movement, ie not excising to the limit. A good cosmetic effect is important to me, while I do appreciate that there may be a jump in skin colour at the cut. The 'sleeve resection' method would seem to be most suitable for my ideas.

Yours, G.H. – Devon

Replies To The Questions In Issue 1

- Q. Do men take enough trouble to keep clean under their foreskin?
A. I've always done so.
- Q. How should parents establish hygienic habits in their sons?
A. Parents should explain the need, as with teeth for instance.
- Q. Should boys and men always pull their foreskins back before urinating?
A. Yes: it then urges you to pee.
- Q. Can a woman tell whether a man has a foreskin or is circumcised by looking, or from differences of feeling during sex?
A. Can't see how.
- Q. How does circumcision affect sexual performance?
A. The few friends I know who have had it done would like to have it on again.
- Q. Does circumcision discourage masturbation, and is that good or bad?
A. Masturbation (tossing off) once or twice a day from when you can onwards is jolly good fun and harmless.
- Q. Is circumcision less popular than it was?
A. Yes.
- Q. Was circumcision more common among the upper classes?
A. It was.
- Q. Why is circumcision discouraged by most doctors?
A. They evidently know how mean and stupid it is.
- Q. Should a man have the right to choose circumcision (provided he is prepared to pay), or should a doctor only agree to circumcision if there are 'good medical reasons', and what are these?

- A. The man should have a right to consider 'doctor's orders' on this.
- Q. Does a parent have the right to have a son circumcised, and if so, which age is best?
- A. No, on no account.
- Q. If you are unhappy about having been circumcised, how can you learn to live with the fact?
- A. I wouldn't know.
- Q. Ritual female 'circumcision' (in fact, the clitoris and often most of the labia are cut away) is practised in some parts of Africa and the Middle East, and it is condemned everywhere else; but is there sometimes a case for a minor operation to expose the clitoris to direct stimulation?
- A. It is important for the prick to get at the clit and with foreskin on and half pulled back it bulges just below his glans and gives the girl a terrific come. The more comes the better. A foreskin is one of the most wonderful gifts for both sexes.

Borderer

The Rôle of the Foreskin in Orgasm

An interest in circumcision and its effects prompted me to try to investigate the relative rôles of the glans and the foreskin in producing orgasm. It has been popularly supposed that the foreskin is merely a hood to provide protection for the glans when not engaged in sexual activities, and that during intercourse its rôle is, at best, a passive one and, for some people, actually hinders their sensations. Yet the hood of the clitoris is an exactly analogous structure in the female, and it has been conclusively shown that it has an important effect in providing arousal. Why should the male foreskin be any different? I had also read of a man who had lost the whole of his glans whilst a soldier in war time, and yet was easily able to orgasm with what little foreskin remained.

I decided to conduct some experiments, and these have been extensive and wide ranging, conducted under exacting and exhaustive scientific conditions, with a total sample of one (me!) If any other readers should wish to try similar experiments, or have comments or opinions, I would be delighted to hear from them. The experiments consisted of masking off one or other of the two parts (glans or foreskin), so that stimulus was directed solely at the other, and observing the differences.

Masking the glans was relatively easy. I procured a piece of rigid scrap plastic in a cup shape of about the size of the glans. It was actually the body of a used 'party popper', the thing which explosively ejects streamers when you pull the string, rather appropriate really! I trimmed the edge to match the shape of the corona of the glans, with a pronounced inverted 'V' shape to accommodate the frenulum. The edge was lined with Elastoplast to protect me from the sharp plastic where it had been cut. Once in place on the glans, it fitted snugly, giving no discomfort, but allowing the foreskin to be stimulated without involving the glans, as long as the cup was supported carefully and not allowed to move.

Masking the foreskin was more difficult. After some experiments, and failures, I evolved the following technique. Firstly, I pulled the foreskin as far forward as possible, then wrapped the entire shaft of the erect penis in surgical tape, right back to the testicles (I found Micropore to be best, and it helps if the shaft is clean-shaven!) Then the entire foreskin forward of the tape is turned inside out so that it lies on top of the tape, and back from the glans. This is then wrapped carefully in more tape, starting just behind the glans, and finishing by sticking the top layer of tape to the layer below once all the skin is covered. What you have then is a more or less rigid structure of surgical tape with a bare glans protruding from the end. The foreskin is still not quite immune from stimulation, for the whole thing could be squeezed or moved up and down a millimetre or so. One has, therefore, to be careful that the applied stimulus does not do either of these things. But it was sufficiently well protected that orgasm without involving the glans was impossible.

What I did then was to try various methods of inducing orgasm using only one of the two parts. I tried to keep the other factors as constant as possible, for instance, the same time of day (evening), the same preceding period of abstinence (24 hours), and the same degree of anticipatory arousal (more difficult to control!) I have not tried intercourse with a partner; well, you try persuading a girl to let you put all that gubbins into her!

The results were as follows. Using the glans only, orgasm was always difficult to achieve. Using dry friction, it was impossible, the intensity of the sensation being so overwhelming as to be painful, orgasm got further away rather than closer. Friction with saliva as a lubricant was almost as difficult, I would be just about there when more spit was required. Using K.Y. as a lubricant was the best of the friction methods, and various oil-based lubricants, Vaseline, Savlon, etc were nearly as good. Water jet and vibrator methods were also reasonably good. The actual orgasm had a very different character from 'normal', being a more intense sensation with more holding of breath, muscle contraction and grimacing (but not pleurably so), and leaving a pronounced feeling of dissatisfaction. I found that whenever I had performed such an experiment, I was never fully satisfied until I had masturbated again, using the foreskin (and normally, when I have orgasmed, I have no desire to repeat the exercise for several hours). Without that second orgasm, which often followed immediately I had removed the tape, I was left with a very strong feeling of frustration. On one occasion, I tried several 'glans only' tests on successive days without masturbating with the foreskin in between, in the hope that there would be a phase of adaptation, and that the frustration would diminish. I found that the frustration mounted continually, and it required a superhuman effort of self-control to continue with the experiment.

Using the foreskin only was quite different. Orgasm was always easy to achieve with any of the friction methods, dry friction being best. The water jet and vibrator methods were very slow, and I am not convinced that orgasm was not partially caused by transmission of vibration through the plastic to the glans, although I tried my best to avoid it. Orgasm was slightly quieter and less intense than 'normal', but much closer to 'normal' than with the 'glans only' tests. I was left with only a vague and slight feeling of dissatisfaction afterwards, and no desire for an immediate second orgasm. I was able to perform repeated experiments of this type on successive days without difficulty. The most noticeable effect was the reduction in the pleasurable sensations during the stimulus. It seemed almost as if the two parts played different but complementary rôles in achieving sexual pleasure, the glans providing the pleasant sensations during stimulation, and the foreskin actually triggering the ejaculation.

What does this mean for those contemplating circumcision, those already circumcised or those wishing circumcision reversal? It seems probable that if circumcision has been performed in infancy, the responses will have been learned in such a way that the physical changes will have been fully compensated. Certainly Masters and Johnson found no measurable difference between men circumcised in infancy and those uncircumcised. They collected no data, however, for men circumcised in adulthood. For those, I would suspect that masturbation would be less easy, less satisfying, and perhaps less frequent. If one of the objectives of the circumcision is to reduce masturbation (and I suspect that this may often be the case), then this will probably be successful. Intercourse will be accompanied by more intense sensations during the act, and orgasm may be delayed somewhat. The orgasm itself will result in stronger physical sensations. I would fear, however, that the feeling of dissatisfaction I encountered might be experienced after intercourse, and could take a long time to diminish. The degree to which this happens, of course, would depend on how much foreskin had been removed; nobody will be left with the total lack of stimulation in this area which I experienced. It is very significant, however, that many men, when discussing their adult circumcisions, strongly emphasise the sensations to be experienced in the area near the scar and the residual foreskin. Perhaps they secretly regret having it done. For those wishing circumcision reversal, the parts removed cannot be replaced, you can only stretch what is there. Masturbation will become easier because of the more mobile foreskin, and, if you experience discomfort from friction against loose clothing, then this will be reduced when the glans is covered. But the main balance of sensations during either masturbation or intercourse will not be significantly altered.

John McC.

Dina Rabinovitch on the controversy surrounding cir

WHEN Prince Charles was born 39 years ago, it was de rigeur for upper-class Englishmen to be circumcised. The future king was circumcised at home — Buckingham Palace — by the late Dr Jacob Snowman, a mohel trained to perform the operation in the traditional Jewish way. By the late Fifties, circumcision was becoming unfashionable — the foreskin was back in vogue. The practice dies hard in the upper reaches of British society: it seems that Prince William was circumcised, but by a surgeon, not a mohel. Prince Harry, on the other hand, is believed not to have been. Now, the latest royal pregnancy coincides with yet another episode in the rise and fall of the foreskin.

In the Seventies, the issue seemed settled: the British Medical Association stated that there was no medical need for routine circumcision of newborn boys and even the American Academy of Paediatrics was against routine circumcision, although the operation was virtually universal in the US.

But in February this year the academy had second thoughts prompted by reports of higher rates of urinary tract infection in uncircumcised youngsters, and by claims from a urologist that circumcision could lower chances of contracting the HIV virus — claims which have been hotly disputed.

Circumcision on religious grounds is not queried by these bodies. The operation, properly performed, is harmless, both bodies stated. The only question is whether any useful function is performed by circumcising all male infants automatically.

Over here, the upper social reaches of the British establishment still think of circumcision as a good thing. Most will give hygiene as a reason. Britain's youngest millionairess, Sophie (Sock Shop) Mirman, daughter of the Queen's milliner, gave birth to a son earlier this year at the private Portland Clinic in London. She comes from a French Catholic family but has been influenced by English fashion.

She says: "Circumcision is much more hygienic. Actually, at the Portland, as soon as it pops out and it's a boy, they ask you if you want him circumcised. NHS hospitals, on the other hand, can be very off-putting to parents who request circumcision, and almost always ask them to make their own arrangements."

Dr Morris Sifman, a mohel for 20 years, explains the ideas about hygiene involved: "Certainly in days when baths were not as common as they are today, the uncircumcised organ was a messy one. It produces smegma, a substance which, if not washed away, can become terribly messy as it accumulates. But the truth is this is something which can be overcome — all you have to do is teach more hygiene."

Fall and rise o

The foreskin should never be pulled back in small boys; later in life it will retract naturally. In the early years, says the American academy, care of the uncircumcised penis is very easy: "Leave it alone".

Aesthetic considerations also figure high in parents' minds. In a 1987 study carried out at St Luke's Hospital, Denver, 39 per cent of parents who wanted their sons circumcised were concerned about health, while 44 per cent of mothers and 49 per cent of fathers were worried about "fitting in with friends" and appearance.

Judy Graham, who is a non-practising Jew, and her partner, Michel Odent, a guru of natural childbirth, are ardently against circumcision. Judy believes that women prefer circumcised men. Odent had to be circumcised in his teens to correct a tight foreskin — preferable, he says, to having it done at birth "just in case". Muslims and Jews circumcise for religious reasons. Oddly, circumcision has never been an issue among Gentiles outside Britain and the US — it was simply never practised; so in Europe during the Second World War, a circumcised child was almost certainly Jewish. In Britain, the practice of circumcising sons seems to have sprung up from Queen Victoria's belief that the English were one of the 10 lost tribes and consequently should circumcise as the Jews did. In the United States, the practice has probably become widespread through the influence of biblical fundamentalism.

Judaism does not, and never has claimed any medical benefits from circumcision, although many Jews say that the operation has such benefits. At one time in Europe, only non-medics were allowed to become mohelim to reinforce the fact that circumcision has a religious, not a medical purpose. And yet many disaffiliated Jews who keep nothing else of the religion will still circumcise a son. Questioned, they say: "Oh, but it's better for the child anyhow — isn't it?"

For parents who want to make a considered decision, the medical evidence is confusing. For every benefit claimed on behalf of removing the foreskin — everything from protection against cancer to better staying power in bed — there are counter allegations of pain inflicted on newborns, not to mention horror stories from The Circumcisions That Went Wrong file.

The cancer connection resurfaces routinely. Jewish men, it is pointed out, rarely suffer cancer of the penis. However, the chances of getting penile cancer in Britain are small (there are about 100 cases a year) although it is a common disease in South America. The belief was that smegma could be carcinogenic, but despite many scientific investigations, only one study ever succeeded in linking smegma to cancers — using horse smegma to produce tumours in mice. This experiment has since been damned in the medical journals as "deficient in conceptualisation, methodology, execution, gathering of data and analysis".

For parents, the medical evidence is confusing

LTH

circumcision, which is still popular with the upper classes of the foreskin

DALEY after MANTEGNA

Women partners of circumcised men were thought to be protected from cervical cancer. Again, evidence from Jewish women was brought to bear: a 1965 report showed that cervical cancer occurred in only 2.2 per 100,000 married Jewish women, but was as high as 44 per 100,000 in non-Jewish women married to uncircumcised men. However there are groups where circumcision is not practised, for example among Lebanese Christians, where the incidence of cervical cancer is as low as among Jewish women, showing that non-circumcision is not by itself a risk factor for cervical cancer.

Nevertheless the claim recurs even though it is now clear that the disease is caused by a sexually transmitted infection and that circumcision does not appear to influence it one way or the other. Extensive research has identified other factors which probably have a lot more to do with causing the disease: namely, how young a girl is when she first has sex, how many partners she has, genital infections and heredity. Laws governing orthodox Jewish sexual relations — no sex during periods — might be relevant in reducing sexually transmitted infections in Jewish couples. But, more likely, strong family bonds and social conventions reduce the likelihood of a Jewish man or woman having multiple sex partners.

The suggestion that circumcised men are less vulnerable to the HIV virus was first made by Dr Aaron Fink, a semi-retired urologist, in the New England Journal of Medicine on 30 October 1986. "The presence of a foreskin," said Fink, "predisposes both heterosexual and homosexual men to the acquisition of Aids." Fink thinks the possibilities of the virus penetrating are greater when "the skin surface is a delicate, easily abraded penile lining, such as the mucosal inner layer of the foreskin, than when the foreskin is absent". However it might as easily be argued that the foreskin protects the penis, making abrasion less likely.

By now, even the doctors were admitting to feeling confused. Dr Jay Berkelhamer, director of Wylter's Children's Hospital in Chicago, told the Miami Herald: "We thought we had this issue resolved, that we could say with a clear conscience that it was purely cosmetic surgery. But there's that Texas report..."

Dr Thomas Wiswell of the Brooks Army Medical Centre in Texas reported in the journal Paediatrics that a study of more than 400,000 infants showed that uncircumcised boys were 10 times more likely to develop urinary tract infections in their first year. This led to scare stories in the US press telling parents that not circumcising sons could mean condemning children to kidney trouble later on.

That sort of reporting turned the circumcision issue hot and heavy once again. Campaigners against circumcision such as Marilyn Milos, an ex-nurse, talk about "pro-circumcision types who can't keep their hands off baby boys' bodies".

This means that it is the politics more than the medicine involved which has prompted the American academy review. Doctors in the US are wary of lawsuits.

Marilyn Milos said she started campaigning after seeing babies strapped to plastic boards screaming their heads off in operating theatres. Dr Sifman tells how parents prefer circumcision using the plastibel device — this is put on the foreskin so that the blood supply is tied off and after a few days the foreskin falls off — because it is bloodless; but, he says, since it takes place in theatre, parents do not see the discomfort involved in fixing the device.

In sharp contrast is the Jewish circumcision — known as the brit, from the Hebrew word meaning covenant. This is done at home when the baby is at least eight days old (hospitals operate on the third day or earlier). The child is surrounded by watching family and friends, and the baby held by an experienced relative. Anti-circumcisionists such as Milos and Odent, when asked about watching a brit, change tack and talk about psychological damage — "men intruding on a woman's world" (Odent), or vice versa (Milos) — rather than pain and cruelty.

The part of the foreskin to be removed is pulled forward over the glans (the end of the penis) and then a shield is put on to protect the glans. A mohel uses a steel double-edged knife. Dr Sifman describes: "People often remark that there is no sudden painful yelp — that is, no change in the cry. Quite often the baby is crying already, because they don't like being held."

"Of course there is bleeding and the bleeding can look quite heavy for a few minutes. A dressing has to be put on, and the mother sees a blood-stained bandage which is alarming, and when the dressing is taken off she sees a raw area because we do not suture [stitch]."

"There is no need to suture — it heals up perfectly well. Doctors, surgeons, who are not aware of the Jewish method, are often quite shocked when they first see a child who's been circumcised in this way, before it has healed. They feel it will never heal, and needs a graft, and it will look awful. In fact, that's all nonsense, as our experience shows. But there have been surgeons who've done grafts on children, because they are not prepared to listen."

An experienced mohel said: "I'm quite sure circumcision is not bad for us, and I feel that one day we will find out the health reasons behind it. But to prove it on the medical grounds we have today, seems to me, quite tenuous." And that, orthodox Jewish soon-to-be-mother that I am, is exactly how I feel too.

Foreskin Envy

Dear Tony: I have just received the first four issues of Acorn. I must congratulate you on the excellence – the increasing excellence – of the publication. I had no idea that the question of circumcision could be so interesting and intriguing. You certainly deserve our thanks for all the hard work that must go into getting each issue of Acorn into print. I should like to tell Acorn of my experience of circumcision.

I am aged 56, married, with three children. I was circumcised at birth. This was in Cape Town, South Africa: I was born into a white middle-class English-speaking Protestant family. Does this suggest that neonatal circumcision followed the middle-class English around the world? I can just remember that my male play-mates seemed to be circumcised too. This was in the 1930s. I do not know why I was circumcised, whether it was automatically done to all new born males in the district where I lived, or if my parents requested the operation. Likewise I do not know if my father had been circumcised: he died when I was a baby. Later, at a Grammar school in England, I found that about half the boys in my class were roundheads. I was initiated into the joys of masturbation when I was 11 by a cousin, who was part Chinese and had been born in the European 'colony' in Shanghai. Like me, he was a roundhead. Then I had a friend with whom I had masturbation sessions, and he was not circumcised. How I envied him his foreskin. My attitude to circumcision since those early adolescent days has been one of anger and envy. I really do profoundly regret the removal of my foreskin, entirely without my consent. I feel anger at my parents for allowing the operation to take place. Yet I am equally certain that they had the very best intentions for my future and my welfare. But it has made me unhappy, and I would prefer to be responsible for my own welfare. In short, I think a great wrong was done to me, and I yearn to have a nice long foreskin back again.

I cannot know what effect this neonatal circumcision has had on my sex-life – I can only use my imagination. I imagine that because my glans is permanently uncovered it is not nearly so sensitive, and that this lessens the sensations of intercourse. This does not mean that I don't enjoy intercourse, it's just that I think I would enjoy it more if I were uncircumcised. I am a keen masturbator, and it is here that I think I miss out most. I long to have a foreskin that I could move back and forward over my glans when wanking. As it is, I have two basic wanking techniques, neither of which involves the use of a lubricant, other than my own, which is copious. (I do occasionally use one, when I want a real quickie.) Either I use my fingers on the shaft, my thumb on the top and my first two fingers underneath. I generally keep away from my glans. I use this method for a nice slow wank. The other technique is to wait until there is a lot of pre-cum fluid, and then to use a finger and this fluid to caress the glans, the frenulum, the meatus, and the part immediately behind the rim of the glans (the sulcus). This is a very nice way of wanking, which I realise I might not be able to do if I had not been circumcised and my glans was very sensitive. Nevertheless, I envy those who have a foreskin to wank with.

What I feel to be a positive part of the operation is indeed the skill of the operator. If he had to perform, he did a very good job on me. There is hardly a trace of a scar. What remains of my foreskin forms a small ridge around the rim of my glans when my penis is flaccid. When erect, all the skin of the penis is nicely stretched.

To sum up. I appreciate all the arguments in favour of circumcision; even circumcision at birth. But I do feel very strongly that I, as an adult, should have had the responsibility of making the decision myself. I resent my parents taking the decision out of my hands. I would have liked to have had the adult experience of a foreskin. My wife and I decided not to have our two sons circumcised. I feel I have been marked for life by what might have been a totally unnecessary operation. Do other Acorn subscribers feel as strongly as I do? What can we do to 'learn to live with the fact' (one of your Acorn questions, Tony)?

Lastly a question: if the glands in my sulcus produce smegma, what happens to this product after circumcision?

Sincerely yours, Tony – Tiptree

[Thanks for a long and eloquent letter. Possibly one way we can help each other is to offer our favourite wanking techniques, as you have done, plus the chance to put our feelings into words: a worry shared is a worry halved. I think that your observation about circumcision spreading with the spread of the British Empire is probably accurate, since the incidence seems higher among those who were born in India, South Africa, Kenya, etc.

I have not found much information about smegma in the medical literature: can any member help? I heard that the claim that it was secreted by glands in the coronal sulcus (the dip just behind the glans rim, where the foreskin is attached) is now rejected, and that it is now held to be the dead skin cells which are naturally shed, plus the moisture secreted by the mucous membrane which forms the inner layer of the foreskin, plus some stale urine if the foreskin is tight enough to create a back-flow underneath it. Circumcision removes the mucous membrane, and dead skin cells are removed by washing, friction against clothing, etc. – T.A.]

Foreskin And Masturbation

I would like to hear from men who have experience of sex before and after circumcision. From what I have learnt from letters in Forum it is suggested that sexual intercourse is more pleasurable both for the man and the woman when the foreskin has been removed. However, little is written about masturbation by these men. Does the pleasure from intercourse for the man improve following circumcision but with an accompanying decrease in pleasure from wanking? If so, can the pleasure be intensified by using a lubricant? Being uncut but with a retracted foreskin, masturbation for me has always involved using my foreskin. But with an increasing desire to be cut, I have avoided using the skin, but do not find this as stimulating. Do other members find a similar problem?

Regards, A.M. – Luton

[Certainly a different technique is needed to wank without a foreskin, but my guess is that you find it less satisfactory because you are holding back from using yours in a way that you have got used to. Some men use baby oil as a lubricant; saliva is always available; what do others use? – T.A.]

Eastern Practice

Dear Tony: I have found in my sexual experience that women prefer men to be circumcised, especially for oral sex. I myself have a long foreskin: when erect, the skin covers the glans, giving it a long, elongated look coming to a point of funnelled skin. The skin has stretched over the years, with wanking and sex. I feel that it is crucial what a boy is taught during the period of puberty. Some of my friends who had the opportunity of boarding school were circumcised, and when I asked them about this, all they could reply was that their parents had it done when they were quite young, but otherwise they could give no explanation. It would appear to have been an upper-class pattern some 20 years ago. When visiting Japan and enjoying its pleasures, I found that Japanese women were surprised to find that I had a foreskin, and indeed in a public bath others were invited to see this eighth wonder of the world.

Yours in foreskins, Jim

[Thanks, Jim. Apparently all Japanese boys are taught and encouraged to train their foreskins to stay back. Only with US influence since 1945 have they also started to have themselves circumcised. – T.A.]

Discovery

Dear Acorn Group: My own particular 'fetish' began some 40+ years ago when as a 6-7 year old my friend of similar age showed me how to manipulate the foreskin, although for some reason he wasn't able to retract his own skin. I felt 'one up' on him and from that day I was hooked. I have always wanted to be circumcised but have never picked up the courage to get it done. So as a slight consolation at age 23 I trained my skin to remain retracted, which I suppose is a half and half situation. My first wife was very interested in this topic and her comments would stimulate me accordingly, whereas my second (current) wife has no interest whatsoever which is a pity. However she does possess big tits which is a turn on for me.

My first encounter with Forum was a discarded copy in a litter bin at a railway station. There was a three page article on the pros/cons of circumcision by Dennis Nacton. From then on I've been a devotee of the magazine although it is sometimes difficult to 'smuggle' in copies as my wife would not understand my motives or desires to purchase such a publication. There have been numerous letters over the years on this favourite topic. In particular I like the comments and views of women, since for obvious reasons they have no axe to grind either way. But they do generally appear to be in favour of circumcision. Very recently 'Foiled by a foreskin' was interesting, and some seven years ago there was a letter from a lady in Bristol entitled 'A growing boy'. Her young nephew, aged 11, used to stay with her, and at bath time she would play with his foreskin in front of her two daughters, who were in the bath at the same time. I do hope she joins the group and lets us have some further comments. There was also a letter from a lady headed 'Circumcision of boys', in which she described in detail taking her 3-year-old to have a Plastibell fitted, and then after 3-4 days completing the circumcision herself at bath time and secreting the foreskin in a locket.

As additional topics in the Newsletter could we have a selection of past letters from Forum, a repeat of Dennis Nacton's article, and a discussion of which circumcision procedure is recommended in infancy, for young boys, and for adults.

Yours sincerely, C.B. – Cheadle

US Woman Prefers Foreskin

Dear Acorn: As an American married to an Englishman, I thought you might be interested in my views on foreskin since the subject is close to my heart. Not least among the many attractions which lured me from my first husband who was circumcised, was my present husband's splendid long foreskin. All my American acquaintances previously had been circumcised and my present husband's foreskin was the first I ever saw. To say I was riveted is to understate the case. He didn't just have a little thimble of skin coyly concealing his knob, but a long rope of velvety elastic hose extending an inch or more beyond the tip.

So why is it that I for one prefer the foreskin to the circ'd penis? First, appearance. I take real delight and pride in the fragile classical beauty of my two youngsters' penises: both of them sport lovely long foreskins like their father. I now find the prospect of the stumpy circ'd penis with its raw-looking tomato on the end unattractive and much prefer the smooth banana-like taper of the foreskinned cock with its long supple foreskin corresponding to the stalk.

Second, versatility. No more sore wrists from trying to administer a hand-job to a guy with barely any mobility in his shaft and a hardened, de-sensitised glans. Instead I can play for hours winding my man's foreskin around my finger and stretching it out to an unbelievable length, lasciviously massaging the hard swelling beneath it, sliding it back to reveal the glowing moist knob and finally catching his discharge inside his voluminous foreskin by pinching the tip until it can be squeezed out like a gel from a tube.

I also prefer the way it functions when we fuck. I tend to be rather dry and I used to have discomfort from the battering I got from the hard dry rim of my first husband's glans. With my present man, my sensitive lining is shielded by the long tube of skin through which his knob slides to emerge only at the end of the stroke, with his moisture adding extra lubrication where it is needed.

Finally cleanliness. My first husband used to piss in a split stream from his permanently denuded knob and I used to get furious, since if one hit the bowl, the other was sure to hit the floor or the wall. This cannot happen with my present husband who always pisses with the foreskin pulled forward, thereby acting as a nozzle and producing a neat tidy stream with no splashing.

I've looked in vain for the dirt so many seem to associate with the much maligned foreskin. Perhaps my man is lucky but he can go for a week without pulling it back and all that collects is a little cloudy moisture with only the faintest odour, which I find turns me on anyway.

The experience in my country of birth is illuminating. The incidence of infant circumcision is dropping fast and in some of the western states a majority of new-born boys are now left intact. This is largely the work of NOCIRC, an organisation run entirely by women, dedicated to the eradication of unnecessary circumcision in the USA. NOCIRC's widespread publicity has been reinforced by a spate of lawsuits against doctors for carrying out unnecessary and unwanted circumcisions. Please note that the momentum for this anti-circumcision drive is provided by WOMEN! So much for the view that most girls prefer their men with defrocked donges.

Sincerely, T.S.

[Thanks, T.S., for your vigorous defence of the foreskin. I'm puzzled that your roundheaded man couldn't pee straight: most parents find that a boy tends to pee at a random angle unless he pulls his foreskin back. I wonder what you have taught your sons about how to look after their foreskins, and whether your admiration of their lovely long foreskins has led you to check that they are also functional and capable of being pulled back? – T.A.]

Boyhood Ignorance

Dear Acorn: I was interested to read in issue 2 that in a survey of boys aged 9-18, many of the younger ones did not even realise that it was possible to retract the foreskin. I can well believe this, as I remember at school once pulling my foreskin back to show my glans off to a friend. He expressed total surprise at what I had done to my willy, and got his own out to do the same to his. He pulled back on his skin and looked down in astonishment as it slid back to reveal a tender red acorn. I was so excited at seeing a glans which had never been exposed before that I got a really hard erection. We were about 10 years old at the time, and I was curious to find out if any other of my friends were as ignorant about this part of their body. Most of those I approached had pulled their skin back before, but one other had never tried. When he did try, he was unable to. So was another of my friends: the opening in his prepuce was tiny and would not stretch at all, but he did know that it was supposed to retract. He said that his mother was arranging for him to go into hospital to have it 'seen to'. At the time I knew nothing about circumcision. The other friend with the tight skin, now in his 20s is still uncircumcised.

There must be many boys who reach puberty without ever retracting their foreskins. At puberty, however, as the penis increases in size, the skin will probably start to retract of its own accord during erections, so many boys will discover the ability to retract the foreskin at this stage. On the other hand, those with unretracted skins may continue in ignorance and I suspect there will be some men who go through their whole life with a tight foreskin and not realise there is anything wrong, unless of course it becomes infected through lack of hygiene.

I believe that in general parents seriously neglect their sons' penile hygiene. My own parents used to retract my foreskin in the bath from the age of about 4 to clean beneath it, but clearly many parents do not bother. I think all parents should start retracting their sons' prepuces from the age of 4 or 5 and seek medical advice if it can not be retracted. I see from the graph in issue 3 that around 5-10% of boys have a non-retractible prepuce at age 5. I am fascinated by the statement that those with non-retractible prepuces had 'therapeutic retraction' with 85% success: can you explain what this involves?

On another matter, is there any way for Acorn members to contact each other? I suggest a register of names and addresses of those who wish to contact others, with any other information a member wishes to add (eg age, whether cut or not, etc), and send a copy of the list to all members appearing on it. Any other ideas?

J.A. – York

[The contact list may get us into trouble as a contact magazine, but letters can be exchanged through Forum Society in Cardiff, if you join them and advertise in their newsletter; or a letter to J.A. c/o Acorn will be sent on. A therapeutic retraction would be forcible stretching and retraction by a doctor or nurse, at the same time breaking down any adhesions between foreskin and glans. This may leave the foreskin retractible thereafter. – T.A.]

Advice Wanted On How To Manage a Long Foreskin

Dear Acorn: These are some questions from a Cavalier who nearly lost his foreskin a few years back due to infection, possibly because of constant use of cock-rings to keep my foreskin back permanently. I'd welcome suggestions or solutions.

1. I have a very long, elephant-trunk type foreskin which I feel is most unattractive and, although I do not wish to be circumcised, I would like to be able to keep it pulled back. Unfortunately it is too bulky and my knob too flat to do this. Any suggestions? As an in-between measure, I manage to keep part of the knob exposed by pulling the skin back and pinching it as I bring it back over the knob. This means that I don't have to pull back much when I pee.
2. Masturbation methods: I very rarely wank by using the foreskin, instead holding it back completely and, with lubrication, rubbing over the exposed knob in the same way as a circumcised man would. My knob is now almost totally insensitive because of this. How do other cavaliers do it? I find that in this way it takes me longer to come – using the foreskin I come very quickly and also shoot further.
3. Cleanliness: I am certain that my uncut cock is as clean as any cut one and do not feel that this is a major factor in deciding on circumcision.
4. Are most cavaliers shy about retracting their skins when showering in public? I notice that most peel the skin back rather furtively, wash, and then pull it forward again. I generally keep it pulled back if I can after washing, leaving it that way until I dress again.
5. I have found that most of my contemporaries, in their early 40s, are cut but that the vast majority of the under-40s are not and I think that there is also a class element in this.

Basically I enjoy the effects and sexual variety of having a foreskin but dislike the look of mine – they're OK if short or only partially covering the knob. The circumcised cock definitely looks better, but I'd feel naked without my foreskin.

J.H. – Kent

[A real love-hate relationship, this! It sounds as though you had better avoid the cock-rings, anyway: anything that reduces the circulation increases the chance of infection. Some other possibilities: (a) you could wear a ring at each side of your cock through a hafada piercing at the base and a piercing at the side of your foreskin; (b) you could have a very loose circumcision which shortened the foreskin but still left enough to partly cover the knob; (c) you could have a dorsal slit – a longitudinal one could be short enough to leave the glans tip exposed; a transverse one could expose the whole glans, but not remove any of the foreskin, which would hang in a roll under the glans, still available to play with (the traditional Masai operation). Other Acorns may have other suggestions: let's have them. – T.A.]

Muslim Style Circumcision Wanted

Dear Acorn: I am not circumcised, but very much in favour of it being done. My father was 'done in 1910 in Egypt', I remember my mother telling me, and the few times I saw his penis I was struck by the fact that his cut was half way down the shaft. My brother was done when he was four years old because of complications, and when we used to fool around as teenagers and see who could come the quickest, he always won. His cut is also almost half way down his penis and the skin was as tight as a drum, which enabled him to rub his hand up and down the tender 'inside' skin. I have always tried to pretend that I was circumcised by finding way of holding my foreskin back. I am able to pull it right back because after having treatment by a very old doctor when I was seven years old, he cut my frenulum 'so that it would stay back', and since then I have enjoyed the benefits of a semi-circumcision.

I intend in the near future to have a circumcision but not the plain old 'cut it all off' type. I intend to have one like my brother's if I can find an Eastern doctor prepared to do it. I am now 50 years old and think that my sex life would be improved by having it done now. Is there a book that discusses the different types of circumcision and illustrates the final outcome? Good luck with your club.

Yours sincerely, W.S. – Hants

Cleanliness

Dear Acorn: Like many others, I am interested in the subject of foreskins. I am 30 years of age and uncut. You ask what our parents taught us about hygiene of the penis. When I was seven, my mother always rolled my foreskin back in the bath, and washed it clean; this went on until I reached 12 and was allowed to bath myself and take over the cleaning of my knob, pulling back the foreskin. I feel that all boys should be taught to pull the foreskin back always when in the bath and to wash clean at all times. I do not believe that a foreskin hinders a sex life at all: most girls I have known have enjoyed pulling the foreskin back and forth in foreplay.

Yours, Mark – Tottenham

Press Coverage Increases

One of the most difficult challenges of the Intact Baby Movement has been to get the U.S. media to report the growing trend to leave our boys intact. That is slowly changing.

The print media has been the most responsible, with radio and television lagging behind. You can help by contacting your local press and telling them you want to hear more about this issue. And, please, send us clippings or let us know if you hear or see something on radio or tv.

Listed below are some of the headlines we've seen in 1987.

Circumcision: Controversy Surrounds Surgery On Infant Boys

Baton Rouge State-Times

The Age Old Question Of Circumcision

The Boston Globe

Circumcision More A Matter Of Habit Than Hygiene

The Palm Beach Post

Year Of The Intact Child

Harper's Magazine

Is Circumcision Needed?
Doctors Disagree

The Detroit News

Whether Or Not To Have Your Son Circumcised

McCall's Magazine

Doubts About Circumcision
- Fewer Boys Are Now Cut

Newsweek

Unkindest Cuts?

Parenting Magazine

Circumcision: Painful And Useless?

Miami Herald

U.S. Insurance Company Cuts Payments For Circumcision

The Times, London

Circumcision And Insurance Coverage

Family Circle Magazine

Fewer And Fewer Circumcisions

East West Magazine

Unkindest Cut?

Bucks County Courier Times

Group Battles Circumcision Scourge

Peoria Journal Star

Routine Circumcision Comes Under Attack

Worcester Evening Gazette

Circumcision: The Peculiarly American Medical Tradition

St. Petersburg Times

Insurance Companies Drop Coverage

U.S. Health insurers continue to drop circumcision from their list of covered surgeries. In addition to Prudential, the Blue Shield Plans of California, Maine, Washington/Alaska, and Pennsylvania have ceased payment, and Delaware will join the others on January 1, 1988. In Canada, where circumcision has dropped to 25% of males, the Alberta Province Health Care Insurance Plan will stop payment on August 1. Once parents have to pay for this unnecessary surgery, it dies a rapid death. Britain's high circumcision rate dropped to below 1% once its National Health Service ceased coverage.

Announcement Sent To All Pennsylvania Blue Shield Subscribers

"Pennsylvania Blue Shield will no longer cover routine neo-natal circumcisions under our Medical/Surgical Programs.

"We have taken this action based on well-documented findings by various medical organizations that this procedure is not medically necessary.

"Following the approach that health care coverage is for medically necessary care, we have withdrawn coverage for routine neo-natal circumcisions. The Pennsylvania Insurance Department has given us approval to make this change to your program."

Dear Tony

I just received issue 5 of Acorn. That makes five issues already in 1988, all extremely interesting and informative, and each larger than the previous. Congratulations! Keep up the good work.

I have a comment on a comment you made in reply to Warren in Acorn issue 3. You stated that the ecraseur (or foreskin strangulation) method of circumcision is not usually recommended for adults and gave the reference: I.A. Fraser et al., British Journal of Surgery 68: 593-5 (1981) in support of your statement. I obtained this article and found in it no reference to adult circumcisions. As you stated, it compared the circumcision of 100 children of ages up to 8 years (one 11 years) half circumcised by the Plastibell (an ecraseur method) with the other half circumcised by the conventional (in Britain) freehand method using scissors and sutures. They concluded that the Plastibell produced better cosmetic results and less discomfort, but 59% had difficulty urinating while 'only' 33% of those circumcised conventionally had this problem. They concluded that the Plastibell was a satisfactory method for circumcising boys up to 8 years of age. The reason for the age of 8 limit, however, was that the largest Plastibell they had would not fit most older boys. I do not interpret this as ruling out adult circumcisions by this method. There was no indication that problems increased with age or penis size. Adult size Plastibells can be obtained, but I don't know who makes them.

The following ad appeared in the 1977 Manly Arts catalog, 216 Madison Ave, Athens, Ohio 45701:

Item 68. Plastibell circumcision devices, adult size. In original sanitary wrapper. We have only 8 of these. $40 each.

They offered also infant Plastibell kits at $22 each. All the Plastibells quickly sold out. When I checked, they were not expecting to obtain any more.

My very best wishes, Warren

Meeting

Some members have indicated their interest in a meeting in Oxford in the evening of 24 September. The cost in a guest house for bed and breakfast in a single room without bathroom will be £15, and £17 with a bathroom en suite. Members will make their own booking, identify themselves to each other once they have arrived, and allow the evening to develop from there. For details, write to Acorn.

Future Issues

This issue of the Newsletter goes out in late July. There will be a break until October before the next issue. I hope it will be possible to produce one or two further issues in November/December, so please keep your contributions coming. Originally it was hoped to manage about four issues a year, but clearly the interest exists to support a greater frequency. This will probably require a higher subscription to cover the costs.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 7

(Formerly Issue G)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Smegma Types	Anthony	Page 2
The Mark Of A Man	C.P.	Page 2
Masturbation	Anthony	Page 3
Therapeutic Retraction		Page 3
My Foreskin, My Friend	D.H.	Page 3
Glans Sensitivity	R.A.	Page 4
Father And Son	Fred	Page 5
Jewish Woman Prefers Men With Foreskins	Y.Z.	Page 6
Getting It Into Shape	Bill	Page 7
Male And Female Circumcision	A.W.	Page 8
Blind Encounter	Bill	Page 8
In Favour Of Foreskins	G.P.	Page 10
Initiation	T.A.	Page 11
Sensation and Performance, Before and After Circumcision		Page 13
How Much To Cut?	Ivan	Page 17
The Acorn Dictionary E - W		Page 18

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

We're back again after a summer break, with lots of interesting correspondence, including two letters from women with clear preferences for cavaliers. There'll just be one more Acorn before the end of the year brings the inevitable disruptions of the Christmas mail. I hope you will agree that our subscription has given good value, with what should amount by the end of the year to some 130 A5 pages of information and the chance to contribute or to hear from others who share our interest. To continue receiving Acorn into 1989 you will have to renew your subscription. Unfortunately, with both rising reprographic costs, longer print runs, more and bigger issues than originally planned, this will have to go up to £10 for all the 1989 issues.

T.A.

Smegma Types

The entire top layer of body skin is shed every 30 days, including that of the glans and inner foreskin. In an infant, this material accumulates in the enclosed space under the foreskin and works its way out at the tip in a process of separation of the two surfaces. In adults, for centuries smegma was thought of as a secretion of Tyson's glands, Tyson having misinterpreted lesions in the corona as the openings of glands. Drs A.B. Hyman and M.H. Brownstein reported in Archives of Dermatology (USA) the presence of sebaceous glands under the foreskin, but not specifically at the corona. Smegma was essentially a mixture of shed epithelial material (skin flakes) and sebum (the oily component of sweat). Men who have succeeded in re-covering their glans (keeping the foreskin forward after a period of keeping it behind the corona, for example) report a stickiness and the familiar shower-room odour of sweat.

Anthony – Devon

The Mark Of A Man

Congratulation on Acorn. As one who yearns to be circumcised it is very nice to see the subject being discussed at some length at last. My ex-wife wanted me to be circumcised some time ago because my foreskin was quite long and seemed to roll back and cause her discomfort during love-making. After plucking up the courage and making an appointment, the day before I was due to be circumcised she left home and went off with another man. I had to cancel the operation, but have regretted it ever since. The problems I have had with my foreskin are unending: soreness, rolling back, even splitting when it is pulled right back. Believe me, I shall be glad to see the back of that useless bit of skin. Let's get circumcised and cut out the problems which a foreskin brings, whether loose or tight. Circumcision is the mark of a man.

C.P. – Wiltshire

Masturbation

John McC's detailed contribution confirmed what many others have found: that the most intense masturbatory sensations essentially originate in the prepuce not the glans. All masturbation stimulates the shaft, with individual refinements, the to and from distance being determined by the mobile tissue available. Those who have been foreshortened have restricted movement and compensate by more forceful and rapid hand movements. Personally, for maximum stimulation my grasp is just behind the scar-line, with about  $1\frac{1}{4}$  inch movement to and fro, with forward thrusts against the glans pushing the coronal ridge onto itself without any cover. Sensations are greatest below, in what I term the vale of the lost frenulum. Though the glans surface responds only slightly to my touch, gentle stimulation from other sources has sometimes resensitised the area. For example, my fiancée's gentle finger movements on corona, meatus, frenal groove, and tracing the scar-line; the intense sensation of an insect moving on the glans after nude sunbathing had turned me from roundhead to redhead; the touch of trousers at each step, with the glans trapped at the sulcus in my Y-front opening. Individual refinements include plucking at the frenal area; pinching the tip of the foreskin, and rolling the penis between the thighs.

Anthony – Devon

Therapeutic Retraction

Therapeutic Retraction of the foreskin is described in the British Medical Journal, 1983, by Graham G. Cooper, Department of Surgery, Western Infirmary, Glasgow G11, as follows: 'of 91 boys of mean age 4 years 9 months with non retractable prepuce, retraction under general anaesthetic relieved 79, leaving only 12 to be later circumcised'. Anthony relates this to a general rate of 10 per cent of 4-year-olds with non-retractable foreskins and concludes that circumcision would only be essential for about 1.3% of all boys. If done at the age of 4-5, the Plastibell would be the technique indicated to achieve the most uniformly satisfactory cosmetic results. But the use of general anaesthetic seems unnecessarily dangerous when, if any is needed at all, a local should be quite enough.

My Foreskin, My Friend

Dear Tony: Most correspondence to the Newsletter, I notice, is from circumcised men, generally cut as adults. It follows that, for reasons not usually stated, they have been unhappy with their foreskins. Those that are unhappy with their circumcisions are not likely to write about it. Conversely, those that are happy with their foreskins are not likely to bother writing to defend their possession.

To redress the balance a little, here goes. I have a foreskin. When my cock is completely soft, my foreskin halfway covers my knob. I love my foreskin and he has repaid me by giving me hours of pleasure. He has ideas of his own, sometimes staying back for a couple of days and sometimes staying forward. During intercourse he is a good boy and disappears but during masturbation he's there and I find that 90% of the pleasure of masturbation is the friction of my foreskin over my knob. I would recommend anyone with a foreskin to make a comparison. While masturbating, put your free hand behind you and under your legs, and pull your ball-bag back as far as you can. Then you'll know what its like to masturbate circumcised. In a future letter I hope to include excerpts from a treatise by a doctor who appears to have spent a lot of time on the subject, refuting most of the anti-foreskin lobby; also a list of books on all aspects of the subject.

D.H. – Avon

[Thanks for introducing your friend: we hope to hear more soon. – T.A.]

Glans Sensitivity

Dear Tony: Thanks once again for another fascinating issue. I was particularly interested to see the questions and answers in Acorn Issue 5 from 'Mr H' who circumcised me in September 1987. Afterwards some little bits of skin popped out between the stitches, and they have resulted in a sort of 'frilly effect' rather than a smooth scar-line. The SAS told me that any nodules could be removed after about 6 months, at no extra charge, but when I went back to see Mr H at Harley Street he said, slightly dismissively I thought, that there was nothing to worry about.

On the subject of sensitivity, I do think that my glans is less sensitive following the operation. As I had previously worn my foreskin retracted for about 25 years, I can only think that this must be directly attributable to the operation and the removal of inner foreskin. I am quite fascinated by the subject of sensitivity of the glans, both in cut and uncut men and also for those in whom the glans is permanently exposed/covered. I'd be interested to hear any comments through Acorn. For example, can you describe how sensitive your glans is when flaccid/erect? Can/do you directly stimulate the glans, i.e. masturbate with lubrication? Do you only manipulate the shaft, or do you move your foreskin over the glans to masturbate? If you were circumcised as an adult, how did it feel to have your glans exposed permanently? If you have a foreskin and normally keep it covering your glans, how long can you keep it pulled back? Could you try doing so for, say, a week and describe what it feels like?

R.A. – Brighton

Father And Son

In the early 1930s, when I was about  $3\frac{1}{2}$ , my father, an RAF pilot, was posted to India. It was decided, by whom I do not know, that – because it was a hot country – I should be circumcised. This was undertaken by one of my father's tough rugby-playing RAF doctor friends. I remember nothing of the procedure except that I was sore for a long time afterwards. Thirty-five years later, when having a vasectomy in a North London hospital the friendly surgeon asked who had circumcised me. When I told him, he commented on what a horrible mess had been made. I had got used to it by then but must admit there were a lot of knobs and veins around the cicatrice. All the surgeon did, after he had finished the vasectomy, was to tie off the unsightly bits. He told me to keep them well greased with antiseptic cream. Within a week or ten days the three little pieces became detached, leaving the area smooth and neat without a vestige of spare skin, even when slack.

Our son was born in the late 1950s and from the start seemed a sickly little fellow. When picked up from his cot or pram, or after being fed, he would go red in the face, draw up his knees and scream. We had no idea what was wrong. My wife took him to the weekly baby clinic, where one of the nurses suggested that he might need to be circumcised. From there she took him to our GP who said the problem would solve itself as he got older; besides, the NHS did not encourage the operation.

We noticed in the bath that clearly his little prepuce was hard and red, so went back and consulted the clinic nurse. She suggested a Jewish mohel and gave us his name and telephone number. I contacted him and within a couple of days, a Sunday morning, I called for him at his house. He was a lovely, quiet and wise old man who did not drive. He took one look at the boy and agreed with the nurse. There and then, after much washing and preparation, the job was done. I held the baby (aged 9 weeks) with his legs very wide apart. The mohel pulled his prepuce through what looked like an Army button stick and cut it off very quickly. I noticed that he had a long and pointed thumb-nail which he then used to slit a thin membrane covering the tiny vivid-coloured glans. The boy cried, of course, and who wouldn't, but it was no worse than his previous 'knees-up' performance. The mohel then sprinkled yellow powder on the wound, applied a piece of greased gauze and an enormous wad of cotton-wool. Next with an extra-wide bandage he bound him from under his arms to the tip of his toes and told us to leave him like that or two or three days. He explained that the urine would help the wound heal. Three days later in a warm bath the dressing floated away leaving a marvellously neat job, and there were no more 'knees-up' screams.

Fred – Barnet

Jewish Woman Prefers Men With Foreskins

Dear Mr Acorn: As a Sephardic Jew, the chances are that the man I marry will be Jewish. But I shall consider his lack of a foreskin with regret rather than rejoicing. The Talmud advises that Jewish women should not be permitted to have sex with gentile men. The reason given is that sex is so much more pleasurable with an uncircumcised man that they would be lost to the faith! This is to some extent nonsense, but as one who has broken this Talmudic injunction at least a dozen times during my 10 years in the UK, I have to admit that there is some truth behind it. Although the most important factor in procuring female pleasure is know-how and experience, there is little doubt that “the cut of a man’s jib” is a factor of significance. My attitude to circumcision is shared by a lot of intelligent and adventurous girls in Israel (i.e. most of them). It probably starts off as curiosity and the attitude that ‘grass is greener the other side of the hill’. If an Englishman gets on friendly terms with an Israeli girl it’s only a matter of time before she asks him, “Yeah l’kha Brit Milah?” (Are you circumcised?) He should not be embarrassed to say he isn’t because chances are it will open the door to her affections as well as her legs.

But why is it that many good Jewish girls are keen to try out foreskinned lovers? Most reform Jews these days question the need for circumcision and some really deplore it. But you would have a job to find one who does not conform. So Jewish girls who really want to find out what they are missing will often jump at the chance of having it off with a presentable gentile.

My view is that a foreskin adds an extra dimension to the penis, giving it a versatility that the circumcised man cannot compete with. No part of a woman’s body is as soft as the little bud of skin at the end of a long-skinned man’s erection, and for me it provides a clitoris-brush far superior to the tongue.

Apologists for circumcision usually raise the charge of uncleanness. Forget it: any girl who fucks with the sort of peasant who does not bother to keep himself clean will be outside my terms of reference. They also cite appearance and this I cannot understand. After seeing so many foreskins I really prefer the evenness and integral look of the uncircumcised penis with its head decently hidden to the damaged look of the circumcised penis with a bobble hanging off the end of it.

Contrary to what is said, a tight foreskin need not be a bar to sexual pleasure. My most accomplished lover had a long tight foreskin which extended well beyond his tip, even when erect. He never succeeded in pulling it back far enough to reveal any part of the head except the extremity, but it never gave him any trouble. Being a man of resource, he managed to clean it by inserting a soft plastic tube and irrigating under it with warm water and cotton-buds. He found his tight foreskin did not curtail his sexual activities in any way and I enjoyed trying to thread my tongue under it – so did he. To conclude, circumcision is unnecessary. If enlightened, both men and women can get a lot of pleasure out of a foreskin. Those who want to cut it off are a neurotic minority.

Y.Z. – London N5

[Thanks for the results of your interesting research and for your interpretation of the Talmud, which seems more original than orthodox. Your lover may have done wonders with his plastic tube and cotton buds in the cause of hygiene, but most men with such a tight foreskin would remain peasants or get themselves circumcised. – T.A.]

Getting It Into Shape

Dear Tony: Thanks for the latest edition of the newsletter. It seems to get better and better. My comments on the perfect penis: it should be 7 to 8 inches long when erect, and have a large pinkish glans with a pronounced rim and deep sulcus. When flaccid, there should be a short foreskin to cover the rim and part of the glans, which easily retracts itself on erection so that it never becomes a nuisance. To anyone contemplating circumcision, I would say that the paramount question is: 'is your foreskin a nuisance?' If so, have it circumcised.

I note that there are a number of observations on masturbation. From experience before and after circumcision, I would say that the main difference is that after circumcision the penis will stand considerably more handling before climaxing. I find one enjoyable variation is to use an American tip condom which covers just the glans: it is much easier to use if circumcised, and delays climaxing even further. Each individual develops their own technique when masturbating, but what is even more important are the fantasies which accompany masturbation, and the longer these last the more pleasurable it becomes. There is no need to feel that each time one masturbates one need climax; I find this is more relevant as one gets older. Surely there is no harm in masturbating when one feels the urge? Warren's letter in Issue 3 seems to infer that he is concerned about the frequency of masturbating. Personally I find that my masturbation urges vary considerably from time to time.

Is it possible to have more details about the ecraseur and Plastibell methods of circumcision, and perhaps a diagram? I can understand that it is possible to strangulate the dorsal aspect of the foreskin, but how does one cope with the frenulum?

Bill – Kingston

Male And Female Circumcision

As a male circumcised at age 25 as a matter of choice, I have always been somewhat bemused by the controversy in the UK. A simple evening visit to the surgeon in New York and a good night's sleep left me fully able to discharge my duties as a ship's officer next day. I am more interested in the female equivalent these days and deplore the linguistic inaccuracies which have led to the term 'female circumcision' being generally applied to extensive mutilation, rather than the simple removal of the clitoral hood. Indeed a recent Forum article baldly stated: 'female circumcision is mutilation by removal of the inner lips and infibulation.'

They really should know better. This is a description of infibulation, or closing off the vulva as a way of ensuring or recreating 'virginity'. Another female genital operation, sometimes combined with trimming the inner lips, involves amputating the clitoris (clitoridectomy). Both are designed to limit female sexual pleasure, and probably do so.

Female circumcision, in its proper meaning, is the direct equivalent of the male operation (which does not, of course, involve cutting off the glans) and involves removing only the female foreskin so that the clitoris can be more exposed to stimuli. It is a controversial operation, recommended when the female prepuce is so thick that it is difficult or impossible to pull back over the clitoris that it covers, or if it is painfully tight, or cushioned with excess tissue. Its main aim is to heighten sensation, ease the achievement and increase the intensity of the female orgasm.

It would be interesting to hear from any Acorn members with information or views on female circumcision, or with experience (their own or their partner's) of it.

A.W. – Devon

Blind Encounter

About 30 years ago, my father was medical doctor to a small residential hostel for teenage blind girls who were being assessed for their capabilities for a career and an independent life. I was an only child and the school holidays were often boring, so my father volunteered my services to look after the garden and do odd jobs at the hostel.

I got to know the warden quite well: a middle-aged woman who was strict with the girls but at the same time sympathetic to their disability. One day she asked me to her office and told me that one of the girls, Elaine, was interested in art and sculpture and wished to model the male body. Of course, being blind, all her sculpture had to be done from feel. So would it be possible for her to touch me in order to build up the necessary mental picture? Being a doctor's son, I think the warden thought she could approach me without causing offence. A date and time were duly arranged.

I was introduced to Elaine and we were left alone. I was a little nervous and did not know what to expect. She was, I guess, about 18, had dark hair, a beautiful smile, and was somewhat shy. She said that it was very kind of me to do this, and we began to exchange some general conversation about the hostel and our homes. She started to feel my head and face, etc. I then removed my shirt and she felt my chest and breasts, at once noting how mine differed from hers. I remember her spending a good deal of time feeling my shoulders and upper arms. She asked a number of questions as she gradually worked her way down to my trousers. She said that she would quite understand if I did not remove them, but I pointed out to her that unless I did so, she would not have the complete picture, to which she agreed. I stood there 'starkers' as her fingers made their way down to my pubic hair and genitals.

Her soft and exploring touch had made me erect. When she started to feel my penis she went very quiet as she began to handle my shaft, gradually working her way to the foreskin which still covered the glans. I tried to explain a little about the penis and the purpose of the foreskin, etc. She was still quiet as she felt my scrotum and testicles. It was at this point that I retracted my foreskin. I told her that if she felt my penis again she would find it different. She at once remarked that she found it more pleasant with the foreskin pulled back: the feel of the naked glans she found very erotic. Her fingers were small and sensitive, and she said she could detect the Tyson glands around the rim of the corona. I explained that these secreted sebum which, if allowed to accumulate, congealed into smegma.

She remarked that with the foreskin retracted, it felt as if it had disappeared. I found this somewhat difficult to explain in words. She was becoming more talkative and enquired about circumcision, which she had heard about from the Bible, and asked why some non-Jews also had the operation. She was interested to know how often I retracted my foreskin, and when I told her that because my foreskin was long I found it necessary to pull it back every time I peed, she said that if I was circumcised this would be avoided. By gently guiding her fingers and thumb, I was able to show her how to pull the foreskin forwards and backwards. I also showed her how to squeeze the frenulum between her thumb and forefinger, and she noticed that I clearly enjoyed this. She only did this for two or three moments, when I involuntarily climaxed and covered her hand with semen. This naturally surprised her, and she was concerned that something was wrong. Of course I had to explain what had happened, and she was relieved to know that no harm had been done. She wiped her hand. We sat chatting for some time as she continued to feel my thighs and legs. I was tempted to ask if I could caress her, and I think she would have agreed, but at the same time I had a strange feeling that I would be a cad if I did so: it was most odd. When I left she thanked me and gave me a lovely kiss.

Elaine left the hostel soon after this and so I never did find out how her sculpture progressed. I have often thought of her since, and do hope that she was able to find a regular partner who could enjoy her inquisitive, probing fingers. As a result of her questions, I felt increasingly that I should give serious consideration to getting myself circumcised. After some initial apprehension, I spoke to my father about it. He reassured me that I had nothing to fear from the operation, and arranged for one of his medical colleagues to do it. It was soon done and the scar healed after about ten days. The result has given improved satisfaction and enjoyment ever since, which I hope will reassure others considering becoming a roundhead.

Bill – Kingston

In Favour Of Foreskins

Dear Tony: As a mere woman it may seem presumptuous of me to make pronouncements on the subject closest to your hearts. However, except for your dedicated poofster, most of you men will have experience only of your own individual willies, whilst I can claim with some pride to be a cock connoisseur par excellence, having devoted my close attention to whole clutches of them over a number of years.

I have to say first off that I fail to understand what all the fuss is about. The vast majority of British men are uncircumcised and entirely happy, even proud, to be that way; and what's more, so are their wives and girlfriends. There's an awful lot of balls talked about hygiene, cancer and so on in support of the operation, but these arguments have all been thoroughly discredited by reputable authorities here and, latterly, in the US.

I struck up acquaintance with the foreskin when I first saw my mother peel my brother's back as a child. I found the momentary apparition of his blue-red little cherry, swiftly and modestly re-hooded with an expert flick of her wrist, a source of fascination and curiosity. As a result I took every opportunity thereafter to explore its possibilities by handling it and sliding the long tube of skin back to reveal once more his mysterious cherry.

I marvelled at its elasticity but only discovered its true potential by accident. I used to insist on holding it for him when he did wee-wees and, curious at seeing the long tassel of skin swell slightly from the pressure of his urine, I tried pinching the tip to interrupt the flow. I remember to this day my amazement at seeing his foreskin swell out like a huge wobbling egg, the skin distended so tight as to be almost transparent! I may say that my brother gave his wholehearted co-operation in my rude little game and said it gave him a lovely warm tickly feeling. I started doing this for him regularly and soon found that if properly handled, his whole penis would swell and harden. And then came my second exciting discovery: once his penis had hardened and the pressure released with a whoosh, I found I could make him yelp with pleasure by slipping the mobile length of skin rapidly to and fro over his wet knob, eventually causing him to shudder in an as yet unproductive orgasm.

Thus I embarked on a career as an enthusiastic lady wanker, at an age when most young ladies were still playing with dollies. Inevitably as I expanded my clientele I found myself confronted by my first roundhead. I was interested to see that his foreskin had been reduced to an unsightly bunch of skin underneath, whilst his knob had a pink, grainy texture instead of the exciting purple of the freshly peeled cavalier with its moist, glistening surface.

The question was, then as now, how do you toss off a cock with no mobile skin to work over the head? At first I was hesitant to touch his bare knob, since to do so with one of my foreskinned friends would usually make him wince. I needn't have worried. His knob was no more sensitive than the sole of my foot and it took ages to hit the jackpot.

Having established my preference, let me now expand on the theme. Appearance: I greatly admire the smooth elegant lines of a long tapering foreskin. It has a sort of aristocratic sense to it in contrast to the crude foreshortened stump of the roundhead, whose club-like appearance associates it irrevocably with the peasantry. Let's face it, the appearance of the circumcised cock is as aesthetically displeasing now as it was to the ancients. This reminds me of a new word for your anthology of words and phrases: VERPUS: Latin for circumcised man (a term of contempt used by Romans to describe a roundhead).

So there it is, gentlemen. There are women about, a big majority of them from my personal acquaintanceship, who don't share your enthusiasm for the knife. To me a long foreskin provides the biggest turn-on of all the male equipment. To peel back a tight one over a crock-smasher of an erection, gradually exposing the wet purple pee-hole glaring at you through the taut ring of foreskin (like an Evil Eye on a periscope) gives me a thrill to beat all save the attentions of a skilled cunnilinctor. Your readers could do worse than reflect on the words of Milton: "There is a destiny that shapes men's ends, rough hew them though they will".

G.P. – Hoddesdon

Initiation

We know that circumcision (male, female or both) is used as the test and mark of initiation among many of the peoples of Africa, Australia, Arabia and the Muslim world, often as part of a much larger set of celebrations and ceremonies, and sometimes combined with more severe tests of courage and the ability to bear pain stoically, such as subincision.

Writing in The Independent, 2.8.88, 'An urge deeper than the skin', Ruby Wallace explained how a tattoo fulfilled a deep-seated need for ritual in her life. Several of her comments throw an interesting light on the attitudes and feelings associated with initiation, and so may be of interest to Acorn readers and are quoted here.

"I wanted a fully-fledged, decent-sized tattoo, the sort sailors have, of scarlet blossoms on my left shoulder. Friends' comments did not put me off. Once, sitting on a bus just thinking about the process involved – the injection of ink under the skin via a fairly hefty needle – I fainted. And yet I went ahead. Nothing would put me off. To have a tattoo was a need for me. Maybe I was not prepared for quite how painful it would be, and more to the point, how long it would take. I was with my boyfriend, who sat holding my hand and joking with me, and raved over the tattoo to keep my spirits up. The needles were, I am told, very fine. None the less, it felt like a combination of an injection and a dentist's drill. When Raymond said, after what seemed like hours, he had finished, I found I could hardly stand up. I was enchanted. My back, my old back that I had had all my life, would never look the same again. I had become a woman, and the change was forever marked.

Talking about the pain, Raymond's theory was that women were braver than men for this kind of pain, sharp and fierce. I am more inclined to believe that women make less fuss about pain all round. But his theory gave me my first clues as to why I wanted to be tattooed. When he talked about pain, and pain willingly chosen, he was talking about initiation.

Bani Shorter's book on women and initiation, An Image Darkly Forming (Routledge, 1987), claims that in former times transitions from one stage of life to another were always marked by ritual initiation. My addition to this theory is that in certain circumstances, people still instinctively perform their own ritual initiations, recognising and responding to an ancient need. Ear-piercing and face-painting are surely direct traditions of a tribal ancestry which used to involve such rituals for men too.

Recovering from anorexia with an extremely patient lover was the first time in my life I had felt loved. At the end of the tunnel I emerged into a sunlit day, with scarlet blossoms on my left shoulder. I felt forever changed and welcomed it. My sister remarked that when I am old and wrinkled, so will my tattoo be. I did not mind. It was my decision, my choice, my body. Having myself tattooed did not seem to me to be masochistic or self-destructive. The tattoo involved pain, it involved bleeding, and it meant I was forever altered. Initiation ceremonies generally involve these three components. My tattoo was a reminder of how much I had wanted to mark and ritualise my total and final emergence from the 'dark tunnel' of anorexia. My boyfriend acted in the role of high priest of the ceremony. I have never regretted having it done. Now I am born again, with flowers on my back."

Ruby Wallace is quoted at length because she seems to voice the same kind of feelings that one might have about deciding to have oneself circumcised or to have a body-piercing. Both involve pain, bleeding, and bodily alteration. Many Acorn members have made the decision willingly and are pleased with the result. What do Acorn members think about such an 'initiation' interpretation? What change(s) of status did you mark (or would you like to be marked) by an initiation ceremony? What form should such an initiation take? Is there a hierarchy of status, with a series of initiations to progressively higher levels, and how should each be marked? Alteration involves showing off the new status: who should be 'high priest', who should be present as witnesses, and what should be their qualifications?

T.A.

Sensation And Performance, Before And After Circumcision

This article is published at the request of a reader and sets out the views and experience of parents of boys who have been circumcised, some of them in infancy, but a significant number at a later stage in their lives, which has allowed them to compare life with and without a foreskin. The data presented are derived principally from Nacton's 1978 article in Forum, published again by request, with supplementary material from other sources. In our next Acorn we'll print the second half, which dealt directly with men's experience and opinions about circumcision.

What's in a foreskin? Acorn exists to exchange views of both men and women, for and against the foreskin and male circumcision. The argument also takes place across continents: in the USA most boys are still routinely circumcised at birth; in the UK most infant males are not. Some doctors and researchers suggest that foreskins cause penile and cervical cancer, other experts poo-poo these findings which they believe inconclusive. Circumcision is ritually practised by some of the world's greatest religions, notably Judaism and Mohammedanism, and by tribal doctors in many primitive societies. Some women prefer the shape of a circumcised glans sexually speaking; some men argue that the circumcised penis is less prone to premature ejaculation since it is desensitized in the ordinary course of rubbing against clothing. Men who have been circumcised at birth may grow up feeling abnormal; men who have not been circumcised at birth may become under-confident adults who blame all their shortcomings onto their long foreskins. All males may feel anxious because they are not the same as everyone else and therefore over vehemently defend their condition, whether 'roundhead' or 'cavalier'. The same applies to 'penis-fetishists' who have an over-developed interest in their genitals and know the map references for every hair and nodule. Zoologist Dr Desmond Morris believes circumcision is nothing more than bodily mutilation and argues that males should be left to decide for themselves in later life whether they wish to be cut or not. Clearly there is a group of men who need circumcision because of a too-tight foreskin which prevents them having sexual intercourse or even enjoying an erection at all. Acorn receives enquiries every month from men who know they want to be circumcised but don't know where to go for help... and so the various data accumulate.

In 1978 Dennis Nacton produced two surveys of circumcision, the first a questionnaire directed to parents in respect of their children; the second to men who have been circumcised outside early infancy. Together these survey findings should give clear answers to the question of a child's reaction to circumcision, particularly if you are thinking of taking any decision for him. They also reveal a good deal about contemporary sexual psychology.

Eventually, 109 child and 313 adult questionnaires were returned to Nacton from a variety of British sources. Table 1 shows the child's age at circumcision, whether his father was circumcised or not and if so, whether before the birth of the child or after.

Table 1
Boys' circumcision in relation to circumcised/uncircumcised status of father

Age at circumcision		Father uncircumcised	Father circumcised
Years old	Number		a) before the birth of the boy	b) after
1	4	2	2	0
2	12	3	7	2
3	16	2	14	0
4	9	2	5	2
5	3	0	3	0
6	6	0	4	2
7	13	4	5	4
8	7	0	4	3
9	7	0	2	5
10	10	6	2	2
11	1	0	0	1
12	3	0	3	0
13	0	0	0	0
14	5	2	3	0
15	4	4	0	0
16	7	7	0	0
17	2	2	0	0
Totals	109	34	54	21

The question was asked: what were the circumstances leading up to the son being circumcised, when the father was uncircumcised. Phimosis (too tight foreskin) and balanitis (inflammation) were the main reasons in 85% of cases.

In two cases of one-year-old boys the doctor advised circumcision and the parents did not get reasons. In one case it was prevention because the father did not want his son to experience the irritation he had endured. One mother (also a nurse) had one son done because of balanitis, then got the other two boys (aged 5 and 10) cut for reasons of conformity. One boy of 10 complained that his tight, adherent foreskin hurt 'when I play with myself'. Two 15-year-olds discovered they had phimosis as a result of school sex lectures.

When the father was circumcised before the birth of the boys the reasons given for the majority of circumcisions on their sons were again tight foreskins and inflammation, together with hygiene (85%). In one case the boy was felt by the parents to be too interested in his penis, so they had him 'doctored'. In another case the boy saw his father naked at the beach and wished 'to be like daddy'. Many of the problems revealed themselves when the boy reached puberty and found it impossible to retract his foreskin over his first erections. This led to inflammation.

Where the father was circumcised after the children's birth, the universal reason in all 21 cases was to prevent the child having to repeat the father's uncomfortable experiences. In 18 of the cases, the improved sexual experience following the father's circumcision was a material factor when arriving at the decision to dock the son's foreskin.

To the questions: how long was it between the circumcision being proposed and performed? Were you satisfied with the procedure? the longest and shortest delays were found to be in the private sector – four and a half years (a non-urgent case) and three days. The average delay under private treatment was four weeks. With NHS operations the delay varied from one week to two years, with an average of three and a half months. In over half the privately performed cases, the parents were working class. 46 of the circumcisions were done under the NHS and 63 privately.

The operations seemed satisfactory to the parents in 94% of all cases. Two operations did not completely expose the glans and were re-done later at the parents' insistence. Complications occurred in only three cases. In two, the frenulum was cut, causing haemorrhage. In the third, an active 18-month old tore his stitches climbing out of his cot.

In 87 cases (80%) discomfort lasted for less than a week and in only seven cases did it last more than a fortnight. The maximum period of discomfort was three months (two cases). There was no apparent emotional effect on 69 of the children (63%). Two children were distressed at the loss of their foreskins; three didn't like it 'at first'. Other reactions were 'normal as after any operation'. Most boys liked the comfort, appearance, cleanliness and lack of smell of their circumcised penis. A feeling that they had been mutilated was conspicuous by its absence. Some of the circumcisions were done by the doctor in his surgery or at the child's home under local anaesthetic, which was well liked by the parents and child. 'I watched it all. It was very interesting', said a ten-year-old.

When asked 'have you ever talked about circumcisions with other boys?', in 67 cases (61%) the answer was no. Among comments made by the others were: 'Yes. Leg-pulling and comparing wanking techniques.' 'I was once asked if I was Jewish, but this did not bother me.' 'They asked me if it hurt and they wanted to touch it.' 'My best friend was done as a baby and he said my late circumcision stunted my growth.' 'We compared our scars and measured ourselves with rulers and also compared our testicles and seats. He said we would both have difficulty with sex because of not being sensitive where the skin would have been, but I don't believe that.'

When asked 'if you ever have a son, would you want him to be circumcised?', 61 (88%) of the 67 said they would. 59 answers were a plain yes, but two added comments: 'Yes, as a baby, so that he does not need it later,' and 'At birth: I would not want my sons done at my age since it hurt a lot.' There were some don't knows and one said 'only if his wife agreed'. Most parents in this sample seemed to be of the view that circumcision should be performed routinely at birth, though one couple considered the operation had been a waste of time, even with problems of tightness and irritation of the prepuce.

Parents were asked: 'What instruction were you given when he was born or later about the care of the foreskin?' In 85 of the 109 cases (78%) the reply was none. In the remaining 24 the advice was varied: 'leave it alone', 'gently ease it back a little at a time to cleanse it', 'just pull the foreskin back occasionally to keep it clean', 'I was told to cleanse the penis head daily by retracting the foreskin', 'to wash daily once the foreskin had separated from the glans', 'I was able to pull the foreskin back each time I bathed him.' (Note: an infant's foreskin should not be forcibly retracted – it is not retractile till the boy is about three years old. See article, 'Circumcision', Forum Vol 10, No 1)

A further postal survey added 35 responses to those obtained by Nacton. From these it was evident that interest in circumcision was often shown at an early age: half gave an age of 10 or under, and the remainder became interested at ages ranging from 12 to 21. The aspects mentioned as of interest included: reasons for circumcision, operation techniques, extent of removal, how to get it done, how widespread is the practice in Britain, whether it would be painful, how their own compared with others, what women think of circumcision, what effect it would have on one's sex life, circumcision as an initiation rite, and 4 inquiries about reversal operations.

Advantages of circumcision were stated as cleanliness (18 mentions), preferred appearance (13), improved intercourse (6), reduced sensitivity and preferred feel (5 each), efficiency when urinating (2), none (2), prevention of cancer, cured balanitis, to be like friends etc (one each). Disadvantages mentioned included making masturbation more difficult or less pleasurable (8 mentions), none (5), reduced sensitivity (4) uneven result (3) or unsightly scar (2), irreversibility, dislike of feel/appearance (2) and being in the minority (2).

To be continued

How Much To Cut?

For anyone who has decided to have himself or his son circumcised, there is still the question to be resolved: how much foreskin should be removed? Surgeons can adopt one of three strategies, resulting in: (a) the majority of the glans remaining covered; or (b) the corona (glans rim) remaining covered; or (c) total exposure of the glans. What are the pros and cons of each of these?

a) The majority of the glans remaining covered

In this case the surgeon cuts back any excess of foreskin beyond the end of the glans and exposes the tip of the penis including the meatus (the opening of the urinary passage). Those who favour this solution say that the boy or man still retains many of the benefits of the foreskin whilst gaining the prophylactic benefits of circumcision. There is no soiling of the foreskin during urination and there is no danger of phimosis. It is of course virtually impossible to tell that anyone dealt with in this way has been circumcised. Indeed since in many uncircumcised men the foreskin shrinks naturally to expose part of the glans, these circumcised men have more foreskin than some of their uncut brothers.

b) The corona remains covered

In this case much of the foreskin is removed but sufficient is left to cover the rim of the glans (corona) when the penis is relaxed. Here it is felt that there is advantage in leaving protection for the most sensitive part of the glans whilst still allowing the man the full benefits of circumcision. In such cases it is usually apparent that the boy or man has been circumcised although sometimes there is similarity to the uncircumcised man with a short foreskin.

c) Total exposure of the glans

In this case the surgeon removes as much of the foreskin as possible. There is no spare skin left and the whole of the glans, including the corona, is totally and permanently exposed. There can be no disguising the fact that the boy or man concerned has been circumcised even when his penis is relaxed.

Those who favour this radical treatment claim that it is the only proper form of circumcision in that only by this method are all the benefits gained.

There are no problems with hygiene whether from smegma or urine. The permanent exposure of the whole glans reduces over-sensitivity especially of the corona. Also the totally uncovered glans is felt to be aesthetically the most pleasing. When circumcision is performed for religious reasons (as with Jews and Moslems) or for tribal reasons (as in many African countries) there is usually insistence on the complete removal of the foreskin.

This form of operation calls for the greatest skill from the surgeon. The perfect result leaves no spare skin on the shaft of the penis but at the same time does not cause uncomfortable tightness or pulling. Sometimes this ideal is achieved but more often there is a slight rucking of the skin behind the glans rim although there is never enough actually to stretch forward onto the glans.

So which is the best answer? As with all matters concerned with circumcision, the final choice has to be personal. My own preference is certainly for the total excision of the foreskin. Whatever your preference, however, one word of warning. Surgeons will often not bother to discuss with patients the form of operation that they are going to perform. Many men who have at last been circumcised after many years of desiring the operation have been disappointed to find that it is not as complete as they had assumed it would be. Whether the operation is for yourself or your son, make sure that your wishes are impressed upon the surgeon. It would be interesting to hear views on this subject and also on the question of the frenulum. Should it be cut during circumcision? Is circumcision really radical if the frenulum is still intact? The opinions of those who have been cut in that way would be particularly interesting. I am happy to be written to directly:

Ivan Goodhart – BM Box 2252, London WC1N 3XX

More From The Acorn Dictionary: E – W

Electrosurgery: Dr W.W. Walker, an American, devised a circumcision procedure in 1929 which used an electrically-heated wire to sever the prepuce of a neonate bloodlessly. Clumsily used, in 1967 the penis of one of twins was so severely damaged that a sex-change was advised. In a similar case in 1975, the family was awarded $850,000 damages; by the age of 3 the boy had undergone 8 attempts at restorative operations.

Enuresis: unable to control urination, incontinence, 'bed-wetting'.

Epispadias: (Greek epi, upon, and spadon, a rent) very rarely a boy is born with the opening of the penis not at the tip but on its dorsal (upper) side, perhaps with other genital deformities; if severe, may give rise to doubt as to his sex.

Epispastic: (Latin: epispasticus, drawing out with blisters) describing the formation of an artificial foreskin by Jews, persecuted by Antiochus Epiphanes. The spadister drew skin forward so it could be sewn to the skin of the glans and made tight with glue. Greek customs and gymnastic games had reached Palestine and were so popular that Jews wished to participate but were ashamed to reveal their circumcised state when appearing naked in public.

Since then to prevent foreskin renewal, after cutting off the outer foreskin Jewish circumcisers added the stage of periah, tearing the inner membrane and turning it back, as an essential part of the ritual operation.

Epithelium: cell tissue which forms the outer surface of the body, including the outer foreskin.

Euphemism: a figure of speech to refer to something 'unmentionable'. Ones for the genitalia include 'privates' (1634, Sir Thomas Herbert); button (for clitoris), developing to 'button-hole' for vagina and 'button-hole worker' for penis; John Thomas, penis, originating in 1840s but popularised in D.H. Lawrence's Lady Chatterly's Lover (1928).

Flaccid: hanging loose, limp, flabby, relaxed, drooping; of the penis, not erect.

Foreskin: the doubled-over skin which more-or-less covers the end of the penis unless removed by circumcision, also known as prepuce.

Fossa navicularis: where the final section of the urethra (the urinary channel in the penis) widens a little for about the length of the glans before narrowing again at the meatus.

Frenulum (also fraenum or frenum): the small bridge of skin which joins the glans to the foreskin underneath; easily stretched or torn, but sometimes so tight as to make retracting the foreskin impossible; sometimes called 'the penis string'.

Glans: the dark-coloured knob at the end of the penis, structurally part of the corpus spongiosum, and covered by the foreskin unless exposed by a short or retracted foreskin or by circumcision.

Guiche: a ring piercing the skin in the perineal area just behind the scrotum.

Haemostasis: (noun) prevention of bleeding; (adjective): haemostatic.

Hypospadias: a fairly rare birth defect in which the opening of the penis (the meatus) is located not at the tip but on the underside of the penis. Sometimes the opening is near the tip and the problem is minor; occasionally it may be as far back as the scrotum or the base of the penis, and more serious. Usually the foreskin is short and the glans exposed. Repair by plastic surgery may use some of the foreskin, so a boy with hypospadias should not be circumcised. As an initiation test, after circumcision Australian aborigines create an artificial hypospadias by sub-incising the urethra from its opening at the tip along some or all of the length under the penis. See also meatotomy, meatus.

Masturbate: to wank; to stimulate one's own sexual organs by rubbing, etc. In Victorian times, doctors claimed that masturbation weakened the sight and/or the mind, or even caused blindness or madness. There is no evidence of any such connection – if there were, most men and many women would be blind and/or mad. Masturbation is as enjoyable (or more so) after circumcision as before. By providing experience of what gives oneself pleasure, masturbation can pave the way towards enjoyment of sex with a partner. Circumcision was recommended to prevent masturbation. Although it may not do so physically, the operation or its threat may be used to discourage excessive masturbation.

Meatotomy: operation of cutting the glans meatus to widen it, usually either because of difficulty urinating or to allow an instrument to be inserted, e.g. to inspect the urinary tract or reduce obstruction by an enlarged prostate gland.

Meatus: (pronounced me-ate-us) the opening of the urethra at the end of the penis, from which urine and semen flow; usually the meatus of the glans but can also refer to the meatus of the foreskin.

Mohel (plural, mohalim): Jewish circumciser trained in surgical and ritual aspects of infant circumcision.

Mucous membrane, mucosa: moist and sensitive type of skin which secretes mucus, a slimy fluid, and lines various tubular cavities of the body such as the nose and mouth, the urethra or the foreskin (compare epithelium).

Orgasm: the climax of sexual excitement; in the male, ejaculation occurs, then the erection of the penis begins to subside; in both male and female, the height of pleasure is experienced and tensions are then released.

Paraphimosis: the painful condition in which a tight foreskin becomes trapped behind and strangles the glans; requires urgent first aid.

Penis: the external male genital organ. Numerous slang terms include cock, dick, John Thomas, prick, willy.

Phimosis: tightness of the foreskin.

Pillcock or 'peelcock': uncircumcised; contrast clipcock; see also cavalier.

Posthectomy: word coined by Doiteau (1927) for his operation of shortening the foreskin and widening its opening, from Greek posthe, foreskin, and tomy, cutting.

Prepuce: the doubled-over skin which more-or-less covers the end of the penis unless removed by circumcision; also known as foreskin.

'Prince Albert': a ring worn through a ventral piercing at the base of the glans near the frenulum and emerging through the meatus.

Proximal: at the inner, nearer or attached end, e.g. to the body (opposite: distal).

Raphe: seam-like junction; e.g. the dark mid-line running along the underside of the penis (pronounced 'raff-A': there is an acute accent on the e).

Roundhead: slang term for 'circumcised', because of the smooth, rounded head of the glans; contrast 'cavalier'. (Cavaliers and Roundheads were the opposed sides in the English Civil War). See also clipcock.

Scrotum: the bag of skin hanging below the penis which holds the testicles; it is temperature-sensitive, contracting in cold weather and relaxing when warm so that the testicles are not over-heated.

Semen: the whitish, slightly sticky fluid containing sperm which is secreted by the testicles and other glands and ejaculated by a man at orgasm.

Smegma: a white, cheese-like substance with a distinctive stale and offensive smell which forms from glandular secretions and dead skin-cells, and may accumulate in the coronal sulcus of uncircumcised males, especially from about the age of 10 onwards. It may offer a breeding ground for bacterial, fungal or viral infections.

Sperm: the very small 'tadpole'-like male 'seed' which is capable of forming a baby when united with a female egg. Sperm contain the father's contribution of half the genetic material which sets the characteristics of the child, the other half being supplied from the egg. Sperm are made in the testicles of men and stored there until ejaculated at orgasm, as a component of semen. Many millions are produced over a lifetime, but the number is not fixed and the testicles can continue to produce them into old age: men in their 80s have successfully fathered children.

Sub-incision: to cut open the urethra on the under-side of the penis. See also 'meatotomy'.

Sulcus: a groove or furrow. Coronal sulcus: the groove behind the glans corona (rim) where the inner foreskin is attached to the penis. Glands located in this area secrete a substance which, mixed with cells discarded by the skin surface, make smegma.

Supercision, super-incision: anthropological term for a dorsal slit in the foreskin, the form of male initiation practised by Melanesians of the Western Pacific.

Testicles: the 'balls' or 'nuts', glands located in the scrotum which, after puberty, make semen and other fluids.

Testosterone: the hormone which sets off male puberty and maintains male physical characteristics.

Tumescence: the process of becoming swollen or inflated; of the penis, erecting; opposite: detumescence.

Tumid: swollen, inflated, erect; opposite of flaccid.

Urethra: the tube running along the ventral side of the penis through which flows urine and semen.

Ventral: the backward or lower surface, e.g. of the penis (opposite: dorsal).

Vas: the tubes which carry semen from the testicles to the penis. Vasectomy is a (near-) permanent form of birth control in which the vas are cut and tied in a minor operation, usually done only when a man feels that his family is complete.

Wank: to masturbate (see above); to stimulate one's own sexual organs by rubbing, etc.

Piercing

Do any Acorn readers have any knowledge or experience of tattooing, or of piercing the foreskin and/or glans? If so, it would be interesting to hear from them.

Bill – Kingston

Postal Strike

Incoming mail was disrupted by the postal strike and its aftermath, together with Cerig's well-deserved break during the last half of September. In consequence it has not been possible to include recent contributions and responses to recent correspondence in this issue. It is hoped that the final Acorn of 1988 will go out in mid-November, well before Christmas imposes its postal delays.

ACORN

1988 Issue No 8

(Formerly Issue H)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Subscriptions		Page 2
The Nacton Survey (continued)		Page 2
Acorn Survey		Page 9
A Lost Friend	A.C.M.	Page 10
The Frenulum and Circumcision	J.R.	Page 10
Cock		Page 11
Dorsal Slit – The Unkind Cut	T.S.	Page 12
Operation Costs		Page 12
Frenulum	A.W.	Page 13
Oxford Meeting		Page 13
Re Forum Magazine Article	Ann	Page 13
Phimosis	D.P.	Page 15
Dear Tony	Edna	Page 15

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1988 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome again to Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in everything phallic: the penis, circumcision (male and female), the foreskin, piercing, and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. The owner and/or his partner of course should be the judge of what is 'best'!

This is your newsletter and its success depends very much on your contributions. If contributions continue to come in as they have done in 1988, we shall again manage 8 issues of 12 pages in 1989. As well as personal we'll include contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit). There are also plans later in this issue for a survey which will allow us to collate observations from readers around the country. In future we will also include fantasy as well as factual contributions, provided only that the contributions relate to our broad theme.

T.A.

Subscriptions

As you know, the principle has been that, whether you joined in January or at any time later, an annual subscription pays for all the issues published in this year, including back copies. This has meant that it has been fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. This is the last issue which will be sent to 1988 subscribers. To continue receiving Acorn again in 1989 you will have to renew your subscription. Unfortunately, with increased reprographic costs, more and bigger issues than originally planned, and longer print runs (now that we have 85 Acorn members), the subscription will have to go up to £10 for all the 1989 issues. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, blank or payable to Acorn. They should be sent to our address as on page 1.

The Nacton Survey (continued)

In Acorn 7 we reprinted part of a 1978 article by Dennis Nacton analysing responses to his questionnaire about the experience of parents and boys who had been circumcised. In this issue we move on to the part of Nacton's questionnaire relating to adolescents and adults. There were 313 replies, the youngest coming from a 15-year-old whose father said he was man enough to complete his own form and the oldest from a husband of 77 still enjoying active relations with his wife. There were 291 Britons, 8 from the USA, 3 Germans, 3 Swedes, 2 Danes, and one each from Austria, Canada, France, New Zealand, Norway and Switzerland who completed the survey. Approximately 40% of respondents were white-collar workers, the rest blue-collar workers. Jobs included an accountant, actor, ambulance driver, ballet dancer, barrister, clergyman, chiropodist, farmer, gardener, glazier, hospital porter, medical student, miner, nurse, NHS administrator, doctor, postman, tripe dresser, warehouseman, office managers and military personnel, both officers and other ranks.

Table 2
Age at circumcision

Age at circumcision			Now aged 25 or less		Now aged over 25
Age group	No	%	No	Average age now	No	Average age now
1-10	37	12	10	20	27	42
11-20	39	12	19	16.5	20	43
21-30	102	33	23	23.5	79	33
31-40	57	18			57	39
41-50	41	13			41	47
51-60	23	7			23	57
61-70	12	4			12	68
71+	2	1			2	76
Totals	313	100	52	(16.6%)	261	(83.4%)

Note: 57% of the circumcisions were performed under the age of 31 and 51% during the period of greatest sexual activity (21-40 years old).

Table 3 summarises answers to the question: Why were you circumcised? It shows that four-fifths of circumcisions were for medical or physical reasons. The distinction between the two is to some extent arbitrary, since phimosis can lead to infection and vice versa. In some cases difficulty in retracting the foreskin only occurred when the man had an erection; in one such case the man, then aged 16, was told by his GP that circumcision was not necessary and he had it done four years later after approaching Forum, who were able to recommend a sound doctor. Often the trouble is an old, long-lasting complaint: "I had never been able to pull my foreskin back" (labourer aged 24, circumcised at 22). "Tight foreskin, inflamed tip" (librarian aged 29, circumcised at 28).

Table 3
Reasons given for circumcision by adults

Medical/physical reasons	No	%	Other reasons	No	%
Tight foreskin/phimosis	102	33	Parents' decision	11	4
Foreskin too long/loose	39	12	Caught masturbating	2	-
Inflammation/infection	93	30	Social/hygiene	2	-
Foreskin/frenulum damage	13	4	Wife's health	15	5
Medical advice (unspecific)	5	2	Cosmetic/ inferiority complex	31	10
Totals	252	81		61	19

Conditions prior to the operation can cause much suffering: "Pain during intercourse; erratic urine spray and dribbling" (chiropodist aged 29, circumcised at 27). "Repeated irritation of glans and foreskin with soreness leading to deterioration of sex relations with wife" (engineer aged 47, circumcised at 46). "Until I was 30 I never had any trouble but then my foreskin became tight so that when I entered, the foreskin was forced back on the glans. The pain was such that I had to stop trying to penetrate and had to press the foreskin off the glans. This was not easy as the rim of the foreskin strangled and bit into the glans" (petty officer RN, aged 35, circumcised at 32). "It was not possible to keep clean while fighting in Burma. Heat, no clean clothes, excessive sweating and lack of washing facilities made foreskin suppurate. It hurt like hell" (teacher aged 53, circumcised at 20 while in the army). To the supplementary questionnaire there were eight replies stating that the reason for the circumcision was a preference for the appearance. One of these respondents had been circumcised at age 21, one at 22, 4 in their 30s and 2 in their 40s, and three mentioned that the operation fulfilled a long-standing wish.

A very loose foreskin, particularly if it is rather long, can also lead to difficulties. The usual consequence is that the foreskin will not remain retracted, either when the man wishes to keep it retracted normally, or during sexual intercourse when it may result in loss of sensation. This may affect either partner: more usually the woman but sometimes both. "Loose skin slid over glans like a shutter, reducing contact during intercourse" (life assurance manager aged 44, circumcised at 32). "I was very surprised when, one day, my wife suggested I get circumcised for her. She explained that she wanted very much to feel my penis sliding against her vagina and labia, but my foreskin remained motionless against her as I slid back and forth with my loose skin. As a result she seldom reached orgasm and felt frustrated. I attempted to draw my foreskin back and hold it tight during coitus but this was not satisfactory for either of us. I gave up my foreskin. If your wife wants you to get circumcised because she likes or needs the extra stimulation a circumcised penis gives, I would get it done. The gain exceeds the disadvantages." (Extract from a very clinical letter in lieu of a questionnaire. The man seemed to be about 35 and had been circumcised 10 years earlier). Four men with loose foreskin problems said they had previously been given a partial circumcision to correct a phimosis, the unintended effect of which was to substitute one problem for another. The main effect of a loose foreskin on a man appears to be a loss of sensation in the corona (rim) of the glans when covered by the foreskin. Four men, whose foreskins had been kept retracted since they were pre-pubertal (by parental instruction or personal choice) said this had resulted in their foreskins becoming extremely short as if they had been circumcised, but they found after they had been having sex for some time that the foreskin became stretched and spoilt this effect.

Three men were circumcised for a fungus infection. Eleven were done for thrush/monilial balanitis (also fungal infections). In five of these cases, the wife was stated to be on the pill, which was considered to be the reason. Of the 13 damage cases, 7 resulted from getting the foreskin caught in the trouser zip. "My foreskin was damaged in an accident with trouser fastener and did not heal cleanly" (chemist aged 35, circumcised at 29). Other damage reasons were: "As a result of a fall on a broken ladder which caused a tear in my foreskin" (model-maker aged 52, circumcised at 50). "Burn on end of foreskin caused by contact with paraffin heater in dormitory when larking about" (farmer aged 45, circumcised at 10). "Bleeding from glans and foreskin during intercourse" (work-study officer aged 26, circumcised at 26; cousin done for same reason). "To repair the damage caused when I tore my foreskin and frenulum during a 'woman sitting on top' position of intercourse" (civil servant aged 42, circumcised at 27). "Foreskin split during intercourse" (accountant aged 24, circumcised at 24). "I had a tear in the frenulum" (caused by girlfriend masturbating him – postman aged 23, circumcised at 23).

Other reasons included: "The operation was becoming fashionable and my parents regretted not having me done earlier – they were also convinced that it would discourage excessive masturbation" (bank official aged 47, circumcised at 10). "According to my parents, it is the mark of a little gentleman! It was not done at birth since it was not feasible in the country we were living in" (army officer aged 40, circumcised at three and a half). "Boarding school had circumcision as an entry requirement" (American student nurse aged 27, circumcised at nine).

During adolescence five individuals had trained their foreskins to stay back to look circumcised. The health of a wife was a factor in 15 cases, usually to do with cancer fears. Cosmetic reasons and inferiority complexes played a much more significant part. "For some reason which I do not clearly understand, I have always thought the circumcised organ looks superior" (musician aged 45, circumcised at 40). "A compulsive desire from about 11 years of age. I envied my pals who were circumcised" (local government officer aged 23, circumcised at 19). "I became aware of circumcision at prep school – I suppose half the boys were circumcised. I felt left out. By my late teens, I'd trained my foreskin to stay retracted almost permanently – but still wished to be circumcised" (teacher aged 34, circumcised at 32).

Another wrote: "I had wanted to as long as I can remember. I became unable to establish a normal relationship with the opposite sex. I attempted to do the job myself with great trepidation. When I got to the point of no return, ie a wound that would not heal, I cycled five miles over to hospital casualty where I was admitted and circumcised that day under anaesthetic" (engineer aged 51, circumcised at 23). Two others had also attempted self-circumcision, one at the age of 19 and the other at 43 after being successfully married for many years.

The supplementary questionnaire revealed further cases of self-help: three men had divided their frenulum, one had loosened his foreskin with a dorsal slit, extending this twice until the slit was  $\frac{3}{4}$  inch long, and then (aged 48) had circumcised himself using an adaptation of a 'Plastibell' technique; but he released the ligature after only a few hours and had to obtain help from a casualty officer for sutures to halt the haemorrhage. Another had circumcised himself in stages beginning at age 14 with a transverse dorsal incision to form a 'button-hole' through which he pushed his glans (a technique like the one used traditionally by East African tribes), later achieving full circumcision at the age of 21. A third had used a cuff-resection technique in a series of four or five operations done during his 30s, shortening his foreskin repeatedly until he had achieved the desired degree of tension in the penile skin. The last two had also extended the urethral meatus with meatotomy operations.

The wish to be circumcised for non-medical or physical reasons is a curious phenomenon and though it occurred more in those age and social groups where circumcision was most common, it was not confined to them. Nor was it necessarily connected with other males of the family being circumcised: in many cases none were. Nor, again, did it correlate with homosexuality: of the 27 replies to the appropriate section of the supplementary questionnaire, 16 described themselves as heterosexual, 4 bisexual, 4 autosexual and only 2 as homosexual. It would seem that the naked glans is often regarded as a celebration or assertion of masculinity among males and towards the females who apparently sometimes respond to this feeling. Is this the fundamental explanation of the operation's widespread practice throughout the world for religious or social reasons?

Those men who were circumcised under a local anaesthetic were of course aware of what was happening. None of them regretted having it done this way. They were mostly impressed by the ease, simplicity and quickness of the operation. Few experienced any discomfort – adult circumcision is really a very simple operation.

Question: "What did you feel about being circumcised (a) as a small boy (if so)? (b) as an adolescent (if so)? and (c) now?" Of the 37 circumcised in early childhood, 15 (41%) had no recollection of their feelings or made no comment. Thirteen of the 15 are now pleased they are circumcised and two are sorry. Of the remaining 22 who made a comment, 15 are now pleased and seven sorry. Nine of the non-pleased said they felt slightly different or odd at the time; four said they liked being the same as their fathers, etc; one developed a detestation of medical men and being undressed, and one was "bitter".

Of the seven who were sorry to have been circumcised, two were resentful because the only reason for being done was the parents' wish to inhibit masturbation, and in the other five cases because of appallingly poor surgery: "It looks awful. The operation was badly done and more skin was taken off one side of my penis than the other. The result is an unsightly bunch of skin on the starboard side, a highly stretched raw patch on the port side and a wrinkled mass of flesh around the frenulum, with the result that my cock develops a marked left-hand slew when erect. I also invariably get soreness around the tightly stretched bit when I have intercourse” (typical response).

When the 37 who had been circumcised became adolescent, their attitudes were: 19 pleased with their circumcisions, 5 indifferent, and of the nine previously displeased, there was some softening of the resentment. By adulthood, these 37 generally preferred circumcision (73%).

Of the 39 circumcised in adolescence, 17 made no comment, two were worried, one felt too much had been taken off, one did not like the look of it, one felt “one up” on his mates, and 17 were pleased. [So the experience was generally more satisfactory when done in adolescence than in childhood. — T.A.] Of the 237 circumcised as adults, two regretted having gone through with it (“Sex so unsatisfactory I am suicidal”), 107 made no comment, and 76 said they were pleased (“I feel quite sincerely that it was an event of very great psychological and spiritual significance – it was God-given, allowing me to start again when my life was so appalling”).

Table 4
Are you pleased or sorry to have been circumcised?

Present age	25 or under		Over 25
	No	%	No	%
Pleased	45	86	249	95
Neutral	5	10	2	1
Sorry	2	4	10	4
Totals	52		261

Of those 25 or under, one was dissatisfied because it was untidy and one because it was not sufficiently complete. Of the over-25s, eight were dissatisfied because of bad or untidy surgery and eight because it was not sufficiently complete, but most were clearly pleased.

Of the 249 with sexual experience pre- and post-circumcision, 41 found that the operation had made little or no difference to them, though 23 of these men said women preferred a circumcised partner, especially for fellatio. 73, mostly with mild phimosis or a rather long foreskin, felt that circumcision had reduced sensitivity of the glans with beneficial results as it had delayed orgasm with less risk of premature ejaculation. They also found it gave them better control. 19 with severe phimosis said sensitivity had increased. One said he had experienced almost total loss of sensitivity following the operation. 58 said the glans had become larger, especially in the area of the corona and often it had changed its shape from slim and pointed to plump and rounded, “a fireman’s helmet”, to quote one. A Norwegian was so impressed by the effect of the change that he made little drawings at the foot of his questionnaire to show what had happened. 81 found that the foreskin no longer slid over the glans during intercourse. This appeared to benefit both partners because of the better contact and friction. It appears from the comments that the rim of the glans is its most sensitive part and that circumcision, by ensuring complete exposure of the penile rim and neck, maximises feeling for many men.

Some men are naturally better lovers than others and the only valid way in which the sexual benefits or otherwise of the operation can be properly tested is among those who have had extensive sexual experience with the same partners.

There were 53 married couples and 38 unmarried couples who met this criterion. With only one exception, a man who had kept his foreskin retracted during adolescence and (unsurprisingly) found no change, all these 91 couples said their sex life had become more pleasurable after circumcision. They particularly praised their ability to make sex last longer, the absence of smell and insensitivity. These results are summarised in Table 5.

Table 5
Opinion after circumcision by 91 males with extensive before and after experience of sex with the same partner

Better control and longer to reach orgasm	41	45%
Cured premature ejaculation	21	23%
Better feel and contact	22	24%
Better excitation of the shaft	7	8%
Improved sensitivity	7	8%
Lessened sensitivity as desired	11	12%
Improved appearance	26	29%
Glans shape and look improved	16	18%
No smell	10	11%
Greater general comfort	7	8%
No flapping or trapping of foreskin during sex	8	9%
Preferred by partner for oral sex	25	28%
Less easy to masturbate	5	5%
Better friction with clitoris	6	7%

St. Paul preached: “Let there be neither Greek nor Jew, circumcision nor uncircumcision”. Some men can train their foreskins to retract permanently, and some men enjoy their foreskins. Alas, Paul didn’t contemplate how essential circumcision is if some men are to be able to enjoy their sex life. It seems clear from this survey that boys and men who need and then obtain circumcision find it a very successful experience. It is a little more uncertain whether it should be a general procedure at birth. In some it arouses strong feelings of “going against nature”. Most parents are likely to be as good at making the decision as their doctors. On the general benefits of circumcision today, a consultant wrote: "Prophylactically, the operation confers virtual immunity against penile cancer, and there is considerable evidence it reduces the incidence of cervical cancer in women and prostate cancer in men, both of which are associated with general herpes virus infections which have been noted to occur less frequently in circumcised men."

Acorn Survey

Nacton was highly successful in obtaining responses to his survey. It would be interesting to have Acorn members write in with information about themselves, both briefly in a form which can be summarised, and perhaps adding a longer account of their own views on the foreskin, circumcision, etc. In addition, Acorn members may have the opportunity to make (very discrete) observations in changing-rooms, urinals, etc. If data is collected systematically it should be possible to reach some useful conclusions about the distribution of foreskins, the proportion of men who keep their glans half-bare or bare, and the average age at which the option of keeping a foreskin retracted becomes a serious possibility for at least some lads. Conditions will often not allow observation of a circumcision scar-line, even if present, but the proportion of the glans covered can be seen and this can be simply noted in 10ths, with a bare glans as 0, about half covered (5), or the same length as the glans (10), or with a significant overhang (12), or moved from covered to bare (10 : 1) etc. Of course any observations must be made unobtrusively, and noted in more convenient circumstances later. The criteria suggested are rough ones, and can usually be assessed in a brief glance or two. When convenient, data can be sent to Acorn for collation. The following scheme is suggested:

Penis size (for age): small/average/well endowed:	Sm/Av/WE
Circumcision scar visible (yes: C / no: U)	C/U
Glans coverage by foreskin (10ths):	erect E 0-12
(more than 10 if overhanging)	flaccid F 0-12
Foreskin opening: slack/tight/no foreskin:	S/T/O
Shaft skin when erect: slack/tight:	S/T
Age in years (estimate if necessary)
Religion (if known/relevant):
Christian/Jew/Muslim/other:	C/J/M/O
Skin colour: black/brown/white/yellow:	BL/BR/W/Y
Location: town, county
Comments:

A Lost Friend

I am interested in joining the Acorn group, having been introduced to Issue 1 by a friend in the south of England. Acorn is an extremely good name. I became a roundhead at about 7-8 years old, when I had my tonsils and adenoids removed and found that my most treasured possession had been “cut”. Neither at the time nor in the 40 years since have my parents offered any explanation. My son is a cavalier (naturally), and very proud to be one: he does not like roundheads! However, circumcision as a general topic has always interested me in the sense of initiation rites etc, but over the last few years I have been most interested in reading the Forum letters. Did you know that foreskin restoration has been available (at much cost and time) in the USA for several years? Is a person's sexuality affected by whether he is a roundhead or cavalier?

A.C.M. – Ayrshire

The Frenulum and Circumcision

Dear Tony,

At last I have got around to writing to congratulate you on the issues of Acorn to date. You have done some really good work and it is interesting to learn that obviously so many people share an interest in foreskins and circumcision. I had always assumed (and maybe others have too) that it was an interest very particular to myself, although the correspondence in Forum over the years started to dispel this assumption.

It would seem that many people's interest in the subject originated from two sources; (1) parental attention to the foreskin early in life; and (2) life in single-sex boarding schools where there was a natural curiosity about other boys' willies. Like another correspondent, I thought for some time that those with circumcised willies were born like that, and it was only the unfortunates such as myself who possessed a long 'trunk'.

Having seen very many circumcised organs during my school career I am particularly interested in the technique of the operation. I can recall that there seemed to be two extremes. Sometimes the remaining skin 'wrinkled up' behind the glans, and sometimes the skin seemed to go straight back smoothly, even without an erection. I always thought the latter looked better, although there were also numerous 'in between' conditions. My experience dates from the 40s and 50s, when some 80% of my contemporaries were circumcised. Almost all had totally invisible scars. I can only recall ever seeing two bad circumcisions. One was where the glans had been accidentally cut and scarred. The other looked as though the whole operation had been untidy, and there were little bridges of skin between the circumcision scar and the corona of the glans. But neither of the owners ever seemed at all worried about them.

Back to techniques. I am particularly interested in the frenulum, and various comments in Acorn have reinforced this, especially when there have been references to its total removal. I find this hard to understand in view of my own condition. I was circumcised at 26 with a very tidy result. There are no stitch marks thanks (I was told) to a running suture. The frenulum was left attached to the base of the glans, but is not attached fully to the shaft skin. The result is a triangle of frenulum which hangs down under the glans, albeit only about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " on either side. At the time I did not question it as I was not as well versed in the subject as I am now. I would certainly not want to lose my frenulum as it is very sensitive, but it seems to me that those methods of circumcision have a lot to recommend them that entail turning back the inner foreskin to cover the shaft and leave the scar 2 inches or so behind the glans, therefore leaving the frenulum completely unaltered.

Thanks again for the Newsletter. It would be interesting to know of more books and publications, especially if illustrated. The only book I have is the one by Nicholas Carter, Routine Circumcision, which was reviewed in Forum about eight years ago.

Regards, J.R. – Norfolk

[Good to hear from you J.R. The first style of circumcision which you noticed sounds like the Muslim type, when the outer skin is pulled well forwards and, with a single cut, removed level with the tip of the glans. This leaves all the inner layer of skin, so that the scar line is well back from the corona and the frenulum remains untouched. Type two involves a second cutting stage to remove some or all of the inner skin. Some surgical text-books urged that this second stage should be thoroughly done, closely following the line of the corona and removing the frenulum. But most advise leaving the frenal area untouched, not least because there is a greater risk of heavy bleeding in this area. The latter advice is heavily emphasised by Jewish operators, who try to ensure that there is no slack on the upper (dorsal) surface but often leave substantial slack skin, including the frenulum, gathered under the glans, where it may form something of a bulge. – T.A.]

Cock

Further to the comments about the origin and meaning of this word, we can add some further meanings (from Longman's English Larousse) which throw more light on its popular colloquial meaning of 'penis': (nouns) male bird; a tap; the hammer of a gun; the raised position of this hammer, and hence 'to go off at half-cock', meaning to fail because not fully ready or prepared; (transitive verbs) to erect or cause to stand on end, as in 'the dog cocked its ears'; (intransitive verb) to stick up, stand on end. 'Cock of the walk', someone who asserts himself domineeringly.

Dorsal Slit – The Unkind Cut

Of several methods of male circumcision, surely the meanest is the dorsal slit. It was a simple operation that required no skill, and for a decade before and after the founding of the NHS babies and small boys were subjected to it. In my case, at the age of 5 or 6 I started to have problems: when passing urine, the tip of the foreskin would swell up and the urine would just dribble out. Perpetual retention of urine led to bedwetting. There were also minor infections of the prepuce and, each time these cleared up, the restriction became worse. Eventually a concerned aunt had me seen to by her friend, a nurse. She tried to stretch the foreskin with an instrument which looked like a three-pronged pair of pliers. She inserted these into the prepuce and held them open. It was most uncomfortable. After ten minutes or so the pressure was released, and I was left with a very sore stretched prepuce, but for the first time ever I remember seeing my glans. Some months later things were pretty much back to where they had been. My mother called the doctor about a boil on my sister's knee, and then asked him to look at my penis.

I well remember the results. He made me lie on the kitchen table, rubbed some ointment into the end of my foreskin, and then slipped the blade of a pair of scissors into the end, pulled the skin forward over the blade and snipped. There was a sharp pain and I started to cry. I still watched, however, while he pulled the skin right back then dabbed the cut, now a large area, with some fluid and dressed it with a gauze bandage. I was sore for a day or two, then it healed with the foreskin remaining permanently back.

I gather that I was lucky, as only the forward part of the prepuce was cut. I've been in contact with a chap whose dorsal slit extended right back, through both inner and outer layers of foreskin, to the glans rim. In my case I now have enough foreskin to cover the glans if I pull it forward, but when flaccid it remains bunched up behind the glans. During intercourse my penis moves within this 'glove' of skin, decreasing the friction for both my partner and me. If I hold the foreskin back by hand then sensitivity is greatly increased. I am now desperately trying to find a doctor who will rejoin the slit to allow me to become what I feel is normal, free of the unkind cut.

T.S. – Gwynedd

Operation Costs

The Surgical Advisory Service in London is still advertising day-patient circumcision under local anaesthetic for £100. By comparison, the costs quoted by the Ring Medical Centre in Norway (postboks 528, Majorstuen, Oslo 3. Tel: (02) 46 68 95) are much higher. Treatment (unspecified) for a tight foreskin costs members NOK (Norwegian kroner) 2,000 (about £169) and non-members NOK 3,000 (£253). Charges for 'Ritual circumcision' are NOK 4,000 (£337) to members and NOK 5,000 (£421) to non-members.

Frenulum

The Acorn newsletter improves with every issue and does a great job of spreading information on all aspects of our subject, including the frenulum. This small structure, while not strictly analogous with the female hymen, can be seen as similar in some respects. It frequently does not persist after sexual activity commences, and many cases could be cited of its breaking during masturbation, love-play or intercourse. If it does break, bleeding may be quite copious, which may be embarrassing for those concerned, especially if they seek medical attention. It would be interesting to hear of incidents of this type.

A.W. – Burgess Hill

Oxford Meeting

Despite the postal strike (which made notifications difficult) seven Acorns spent an interesting time together in Oxford in September. There was only one cavalier among all the roundheads – a more even balance would have been better. Accommodation in an inexpensive guest-house was comfortable and the group found an excellent Chinese restaurant for dinner. The atmosphere was supportive rather than sexy and the conversation both before and after dinner was long, relaxed and informative. Members came away more learned than when they started, as well as making friends and coming to a much fuller understanding of each other's attitudes and feelings towards their cavalier or roundhead status.

These were the gains from keeping together as a group: perhaps, next time, members will also feel confident enough to spend some of the time one-to-one. Suggested locations for future meetings are in Weston-super-Mare, Coventry, Lancashire or Edinburgh: write in, please, to say if you would like to come, which location you prefer, and to suggest a suitable venue. When further arrangements are made details will be sent out to enquirers.

Re Forum Magazine Article – Vol 21, No 6, 1988

Dear T.A.

I was truly fascinated by your letter. I have contributed to the correspondence column over the years and thought that you might be interested in my views on the subject.

My husband at the tender age of 5 was whipped off to the old fashioned family doctor because his mother was concerned that his foreskin would not retract. Fortunately, in my opinion, the 'doc' was an anti circumcision philosopher. Using a local anaesthetic fluid and some oil he manipulated the foreskin and succeeded in full retraction. He urged 'mother-in-law' to encourage retraction in the bath at every bath-time in order to stretch the foreskin. This enabled good hygiene and was probably the first sex lesson for my husband and greater awareness of his special organ.

When I first met my husband and in those early days of naughty heavy petting and exposure of our intimate bits I wrongly assumed that he was circumcised. You see he had developed the technique of sustaining retraction by anchoring his foreskin behind the ridge of his glans. Later when we were married and we discussed all kinds of sexual matters he explained that he preferred his foreskin to be permanently retracted as this was much more enjoyable to him since he was more aware of the sensitivity of the glans rubbing on his under clothing and at times promoted partial erection. I must admit that I like to see some shape to one side of a man's flies when he wears tight trousers. Afterall, women don't hide their shape! I like to display my feminine charms and also to ensure that my pubes can be discerned when wearing slacks and bikinis.

As far as performance is concerned, I like to see my husband enter me with full blooded purple headed glans exposed. I love to give oral attention and know that there is greater cleanliness always assured. That leaves me to sorely savour his ejaculate. As a vasectomised male, unlike one of the correspondents, I do not think his 'cum' is in any way diminished by being devoid of sperm. In fact his modified semen is sweeter since he was vasectomised and I enjoy the taste in this enhanced form.

I also enjoy masturbating him by hand (often when I have a period) because he needs relief and I prefer to be in charge rather than his wanking off in the bathroom. I can still cover his acorn by fully bringing his foreskin forward over his glans when I don't use the roll technique between palms.

My husband (and all men) are much more interesting with an exposed penis but I have the best of both worlds (and so does he) in having the choice in aesthetic terms and the ability to look different according to the mood. I dislike penises with surplus skin that wrinkles beyond the head.

The reverse side of the penis not normally in view with a full frontal also excites me. The underside of the penis with its coronal ridge and frenulum (the later particularly sensitive) really is part and parcel of a man's prick and is an interesting component much the same as a woman's cunt lips that can only be seen in detail when a woman is well and truly aroused. I often think that so much is hidden from view in the female genital tract and I have given much excitement to my husband in revealing every intimate detail when we are making love. It's a long time since our early encounters of fumbling under the sheets in the dark. To both of us, exposure is very exciting and we haven't lost the intrigue of our respective intimate bits being brought readily into view. It's a pity that women don't regard their cunts as pretty: many have been conditioned that all that pink is not quite nice.

I have widened out the discussion by not confining my comments to cut or uncut pricks but I hope you will find my honest beliefs and preferences from a woman's point of view helpful in your research work and that others will be able to share my interests in the subject.

In conclusion, men shouldn't really be too obsessed if they have been circumcised since there 'aint much they can do about it. But I would like to suggest that it is not something that should be rushed into. Primarily it is a matter between couples although I do really believe that I am lucky being married to a man that remains intact. It's my delight in the important parts of my partner's anatomy that keeps us sexually active into our 50s.

Good luck, Ann

Phimosis

I don't know if I am in time for the October issue, but I wanted to make just a few points. One was that Acorn has been so interesting and informative that I'd happily subscribe more to keep it coming. While I don't suppose we will ever again reach the percentage who were circumcised in the thirties and forties, it's very important that guys like us should have the information to hand so that circumcision is always an available option for those who require it for themselves or their family.

Second, one of your correspondents in an earlier issue wrote that his circumcision had left the fold. I suppose he was referring to the junction of the inner and outer preputial skin. I think it is important that this should be removed, both for the look of the result and also because it is there that the foreskin is usually narrowest.

Thirdly, while it is interesting to see the views of the anti's represented, I hope the magazine as a whole will remain balanced towards those of us who are pro. Finally, I would be very interested to hear from those who have personal experience of severe phimosis: perhaps an article and a letter?

D.P. – London

Dear Tony

I read in my husband's copy of Acorn the rather negative view one woman had of circumcision and your request for other women's views. Although the popularity of circumcision is decreasing, I remain a supporter.

I grew up a liberal during the sexual revolution, before it was brought to an end by herpes and aids. Consequently I enjoyed my share of casual sex. Although I always, or nearly always enjoyed sex, I never climaxed until after I received a female circumcision. A girl friend told me how circumcision had improved sex for her. Perhaps the foreskin of my clitoris was excessively long as hers had been and was hooding my clitoris. I made an appointment with her doctor and found that not only was my foreskin too long but it was excessively thick and needed to be removed. I let him circumcise me, and wow what a difference it made. The sensations after that were so strong that I came again and again during sex. In this type of female circumcision just the foreskin is removed making the glans of the clitoris more exposed to stimulation. It is quite different from the Muslim female circumcision that desensitizes the genitals because the entire clitoris is removed.

During these years I explored the genitals of quite a few men. Uncircumcised men were very rare and I immediately became intrigued with the penis of the first uncut boy I became intimate with. It was exciting to play with his foreskin and to push the skin back and see the head come into view. But when we had sex, it was a great disappointment. There was no sliding of his skin against my labia and vagina. His penis shaft slid in and out within its sheath of skin which remained motionless against me. Also I always felt that his penis was not as clean as that of a circumcised boy. I had previously told him how interesting and exciting his foreskin was, hence he was shocked when I told him that if our relationship was to continue, he would have to get circumcised. He confided that his foreskin had always been an embarrassment to him. The only reason that he had not gotten circumcised was that he feared his sexual pleasure would be diminished without a foreskin. I told him that more likely circumcision would increase his sexual pleasure, and told him of my own experience. So he had it done and had the best sex he had ever had after his circumcision healed.

I have discussed circumcision with many women. Most don't give much thought to the topic. Nearly all have circumcised husbands and prefer a circumcised man but say that this did not influence their choice of husband. All have had their male children circumcised. They are not sufficiently convinced of the benefits of female circumcision to have themselves or their daughters circumcised.

Very truly yours, Edna

ACORN

1989 Issue No 1

(Formerly Issue I)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Are Roundheads More Self-Assertive?	Fred	Page 2
Spanish Adventure	G.H.	Page 3
More News From Spain	J.M.	Page 4
Medical Examinations	Bill	Page 5
Keen Cavalier	J.T.D.	Page 5
Frustrations of a Would-Be Roundhead	R.V.A.	Page 7
Proud to Be a Roundhead	Ken	Page 7
My Masturbation Method	Mac	Page 9
Have I the Right?	I.G.	Page 10
Dear Acorn	J.D.A.	Page 12
Dear Tony	C.P.	Page 13
True Female Circumcision	Anon	Page 14
Questionnaire Reply	R.J.M.	Page 15

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in everything phallic: the penis, circumcision (male and female), the foreskin, piercing, and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. The owner and/or his partner should be the judge of what is 'best', of course!

Subscriptions: Whether you join in January or at any time later in the year, an annual subscription pays for all the issues published this year, 1989, including back copies. This has meant that it has been fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. Unfortunately, with increased reprographic costs, more and bigger issues than originally planned, and long print runs, the subscription has had to go up to £10 for 1989. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, blank or payable to Acorn. They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Contributions: The response to starting the Newsletter in 1988 was far greater than expected. If contributions come in as they did in 1988, we hope to again manage 8 issues of 12 pages in 1989. There are plans later in this issue for a survey which will allow us to collate observations from readers around the country. As well as personal accounts, we'll include contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit). In future we will also include fantasy as well as factual contributions, provided only that the contributions relate to our broad theme. But this is your newsletter, and its success depends very much on your contributions, so please keep sending your ideas, anecdotes, comments, information, observations and stories.

T.A.

Are Roundheads More Self-Assertive?

Dear Tony: I have really enjoyed Acorn: it now seems to be growing into an oak! Herewith my subscription for 1989. By the very nature of things, the circumcised state must be a minority, and yet it seems to obtrude beyond its true proportion. Why is this? It takes little more than a glance at 'health', sex or male magazines to realise the prevalence of the bare glans. Oh Calcutta similarly drew comment. Free beaches around the world also tend to support this view. Could it be that the owners have some message to give? Has circumcision, whenever it was performed, made them more aware of their bare glans? Have they become more assertive or exhibitionist? Could they perhaps be more proud, or more defensive, or more in search of sympathy, than their foreskinned friends? Your excellent magazine recognises that the circumcised are 10% to 15% of the population, so why is it that, despite an unbiased editorial, more Roundheads than Cavaliers seems to contribute? Or is that just my imagination?

Fred – Barnet

[One reason may be that many of the magazines are printed for the US market, where roundheads predominate: the 'regular American guy' is a roundhead. Another may be that, at least among adults, a significant proportion of cavaliers keep their foreskins back and their glans bare, and pass as roundheads. In my view, because a cavalier's glans is usually bare when the penis is erect, the bare glans comes to signify virility. Indeed, I suspect that one reason for circumcision at puberty was to ensure that the youths of the tribe would be prepared for their reproductive role, since circumcision would remove a tight foreskin as a possible cause of reluctance to perform. It would also indicate to a girl that the lad had been initiated into manhood by the elders of the tribe, and so had been approved as a mate. Again, circumcision equates with virility. Others equate a bare glans with cleanliness. — T.A.]

Spanish Adventure

Dear Tony: I find it very depressing to read letters from people advocating the circumcision of infants. I don't think anyone has the right to inflict mutilation on another human being purely to satisfy what at best amounts to a whim and at worst an obsession. What if your little boy doesn't share your views when he grows up, and bitterly resents the damage you have done to him in body and psyche? Believe me, I know what I'm talking about, having suffered more than my fair share of humiliation and misery over the years due to dissatisfaction with my scarred and deformed penis.

Last summer, for example, I went on holiday to Spain and met a delightful couple with their own villa who invited me to a swimming party which they were throwing next day. I turned up to be ushered in to the most gorgeous secluded garden with a small pool surrounded by occupied sun-loungers. But what shook me to the core, being a fairly averagely inhibited chap, was to find myself greeted by a dozen couples, all extremely bronzed and extremely nude! There was I in my natty swim trunks feeling all white and conspicuous. My hostess came forward, wearing nothing but a big smile and an impressive pubic bush, to take me round and introduce me to the gathering, finishing up in front of a striking-looking lady where she left me to go and get me a drink. What struck me about this woman was not so much that she was six feet tall and built in proportion, but that every body hair had been meticulously removed, making her doubly and startlingly nude. If she hadn't been such a work of art, she would have looked obscene, lying there and blatantly displaying her large and prominent pubic bulge, deeply riven halfway to her navel. By now I was squirming with embarrassment, but there was no way I could tear my eyes away from the lady's spectacular great vulva, and as I watched I could feel myself hardening to that inspiring vision. The lady had a sly smile on her face as she stretched lasciviously under my gaze. Then she suddenly sat up and lent forward. "You've had your little treat. Now it's my turn", she said, and to my consternation she grabbed my trunks and pulled them down round my ankles.

I was horrified on two counts. First, I was on the way to acquiring a flying hard-on, and second, it had not escaped my notice that every one of the men I had been introduced to was uncircumcised, the consort of my cloven lady-friend spectacularly so with a foreskin of umbrella like proportions: it extended well beyond the tip, tapered to a narrow waist, then burgeoned out into a big rosette of crinkly brown skin. I had always found the thought of such virtuosity in the development of the foreskin rather disturbing since it threw my stripped and raw looking penis into such stark relief and gave rise to thoughts of the untold pleasures such a succulent length of foreskin would afford to him and his lady-friend.

When the lady saw my penis perking away as it rose and swelled, she shrieked with laughter. But then she stopped and examined my cock more closely. "Oh look", she said, "he's been circumcised." There upon several of the women crowded round to gaze at it whilst my lady friend solicitously enquired if I'd had something wrong with it, or was it my religion, perhaps?

I'm sure that for most of those ladies it was a passing if unfamiliar phenomenon, but I could have died on the spot at being the object of so much pitying feminine curiosity. I proceeded to get drunk as quickly as I could, lying on my stomach to avoid revealing my disfigured parts to the inquisitive scrutiny of all those people, feeling like a freak at a fun-fair. No man should have to suffer that sort of humiliation, especially when it's only to assuage the whim of another person who doesn't have to share the consequences.

Yours, G.H.

[Courage, brother! Most of your embarrassment arose from the social scene: you came last, knew no-one, pale, in trunks, felt out of place; they were already assembled, relaxed, bronzed, nude. So, take a pride in showing off your virile roundhead on your own home territory at changing rooms etc, and watch for the look of interest that results.]

More News From Spain

Dear Tony: I am interested in news from Acorn and would like to join. Here in Spain circumcision is more popular than before, not in cases of young boys, who still all go home after birth with foreskins, but with late teenagers and men going to get married. Several Spanish magazines publish photos of men and ladies. Last month one magazine suggested that men who want their photo published should pose with their foreskin 'out of view', and more and more photos of Spanish men now show a clear circumcision scar. The op is advertised in several Madrid and Barcelona newspapers every day.

J.M.

Medical Examinations

Over the years I have had four medical examinations, and each time my penis and/or foreskin has been discussed. On the first occasion I was about ten years old and the doctor was a middle-aged woman. I was standing in her surgery starkers, when she suddenly pulled my foreskin back and remarked that if I ever lived in a hot climate I would benefit from being circumcised. I remember being embarrassed, standing there with an erection and my glans uncovered. I was also confused as I did not understand the meaning of circumcision. My parents were annoyed that these remarks had not been made to them. They found it quite difficult to explain what circumcision was and the need for the operation.

On the second occasion I was approximately fourteen years old, and the doctor after examining my balls pulled my foreskin back and remarked that it was important to wash there often and to keep the skin back as much as possible. I did try this at first but found that I had repeated erections which were uncomfortable in a pair of close fitting trousers. The foreskin tended to roll forward and double up on itself; again, this was uncomfortable. A long foreskin can on occasions be difficult to roll forwards.

The third occasion was a medical for National Service, and again the doctor pulled my foreskin back and closely examined my glans and meatus to see if I had VD. He noticed that I winced when he retracted the foreskin and remarked that my foreskin was tight 'at the hose'. I have never been able to find out exactly what he meant by this (any ideas?) I realised that I had developed a technique for retracting my foreskin which was comfortable to me, but as soon as someone else did it, it was somewhat painful.

On the last occasion, I was circumcised. The doctor again felt my balls and then said that every woman prefers a circumcised penis. Having read recent issues of Acorn, I have come to realise that this is not always the case! Have any other Acorns had similar experiences?

All the best, Bill

Keen Cavalier

Dear T.A.: Like all your other readers, I am most impressed and grateful for the issues of Acorn. If there is any criticism, it is that it has become a bit repetitive, but I suppose that can't be helped as you print items as received. I know the work that goes into running such an undertaking as I ran the 'Over 50' introduction club for a few years. I had to give it up eventually for lack of nation-wide contacts, lack of time and because my members just would not keep to the simple conditions required. It was interesting, though, and rewarding when those who found what they had looked for were good enough to tell me.

I belong to the group of uncircumcised men who did not know that a foreskin could be retracted! My father, a Jewish GP, was circumcised, of course. I was not, since my mother was Christian, so I remained a cavalier and have been glad of it. I have a reasonably long foreskin (elephant's trunk) and I guess I must be different in that all my pleasurable sensations during foreplay and sex come from the foreskin. I love to have my foreskin stimulated in every possible way, manually and orally, during foreplay. Once I enter the vagina the foreskin is pushed back and thereafter much less sensitive. Any girl who loves peeling a cock and does so to mine during foreplay will be told off, since thereafter I have lost my sensitivity. During actual intercourse one of my greatest pleasures is when I or my partner grips my penis firmly right at the entry of the vagina and then retracts. This moves the foreskin back over the erect penis, and is just wonderful. Another good use of the foreskin is to slide the cock up the slit and caress the clitoris with the foreskin, which gives us both pleasure.

As mentioned above, I did not know the foreskin could be retracted until I was well into my 30s. My parents did not teach me hygiene. Consequently I had an almighty attack of balanitis. I was considerably taken aback when the specialist doctor pulled my foreskin back. I vividly remember the disgust in his face when he discovered the mess. He prescribed some cleaning lotion, a solution of Centenium available from a chemist for a few pence and very useful for cleaning the cock, also after an application of ointment. He also prescribed an ointment containing silver, which cleared up the balanitis in no time at all. No need for a circumcision for that reason.

Both my wife and I are very sexually orientated and although approaching my 70s we still make love at least once every day. I am now very careful about cleanliness, and wash or at least rinse every time after I have a pee. I note that some men have complained about reddening of the foreskin, itching, and irritation and advocate circumcision for these reasons. Well, I say that all you need is a little water to wash your cock with after peeing. The composition of urine depends entirely on what you have eaten, and its concentration on how much you have drunk. Normal urine is sterile and totally harmless, and slightly salty but otherwise tasteless. But sometimes bacterial action generates ammonia, which is alkaline and can be highly irritant, especially if there are slight cuts or abrasions in the foreskin. Sometimes this problem is eased by drinking more.

Keep up the good work, J.T.D.

Frustrations Of A Would-Be Roundhead

Dear Tony: As a newcomer to Acorn, I have found the issues you have sent of absorbing interest, and sincerely congratulate you on a first class production. My interest in circumcision stems from serving in the forces. At one of the numerous medical inspections I was standing next to a Jewish boy who had the largest glans I had ever seen. From that moment I longed to be like him. I have a short foreskin which is easily drawn back and is kept more or less permanently retracted. When I left the Forces I went to see Doctor 1 and he asked if I had scalding when urinating, and of course with a retracted foreskin I had not. He then went on to explain that circumcision was 'messy', would involve stitches and that I did not need the operation. Doctor 2, as soon as he saw my short foreskin, said 'You are alright. I don't like doing unnecessary operations.' So I have been thwarted twice. After these setbacks I now feel like Mr C.B. of Cheadle in Issue 6/88 in not having the courage to have it done, especially as I do not have the moral support of my wife, who thinks circumcision is unnecessary. But I do feel that for a man wanting circumcision without 'medical' grounds there is a case that he should be able to have it, even under the NHS. I can not entertain the SAS, as it is too expensive. Perhaps other members know of doctors who are more sympathetic towards the operation.

R.V.A. - Lancs

Proud To Be A Roundhead

Dear Tony, When I was about 11 or 12 years old, one of my friends was describing to me some 'horrible torture' he had thought up (he often used to do this, and later became a customs officer!) and I remember he said to me: 'You know when you pull back the skin at the end of your cock and there is a sort of slit...' Well, I said yes and listened to what he had to say but really I did not know what on earth he was talking about. Later I examined my cock but I could not understand his description. Much later I discovered what he meant when I saw his 'willy' and realised there was a difference. Unlike him, I had been circumcised as a baby, as had my brother, and I had never known anything different. I certainly don't regret the operation and I have never found it to be a disadvantage. In fact, quite the reverse: I am proud to show off what I believe and have been told on many occasions is a very attractive cock. It has been admired by many people, both male and female, who have had the opportunity to see, fondle, wank and suck it. I am just glad that I do not have an unsightly, smelly and unpleasant-tasting foreskin. As for wanking, I have never had any problem, although it is true that most women and uncircumcised men find difficulty in mastering the special technique required. In order to wank a properly circumcised cock, it is necessary to grasp the skin fairly firmly towards the base of the penis and roll it upwards in order for it to be folded over the exposed knob. The best person I ever found to do this, other than myself, was one of my first girlfriends. She really had the knack. She was a student nurse, but that did not explain her expertise. As a nurse myself I have had lots of nurse girl-friends, and most of them are pretty useless at wanking. Brenda was magnificent.

As to whether or not men should be circumcised, it depends on the reason for doing it. If the foreskin is too tight, thereby causing difficulty with personal hygiene, then I think it is better removed. When I was a baby it was more or less fashionable, and certainly when I was at Grammar School it was the rule rather than the exception. But if it is not necessary for this reason, then perhaps it should be left alone. Personally I much prefer to see a cleanly circumcised knob, and am much more willing to take one into my mouth for a suck than with a cavalier. I also notice that circumcised cocks are much more popular in 'blue' movies, certainly the continental ones. I think there are probably a number of reasons for this. First, as I have said, I think it is more attractive anyway, and during a 'come' shot it is easier to see the spunk shoot out from the uncovered knob.

Second, I think there may also be a more commercial reason. Why do we have a foreskin anyway? Well, first of all, one has to realise that the purpose of the glans is not only to penetrate the female's vagina. It also carries a huge number of sensory nerve-endings which, when stimulated, bring about the ejaculation of sperm in the semen and at the same time provides a reward to the man in the form of an orgasm. To prevent undue friction on the glans at times other than during intercourse, the foreskin acts as a protective cover. It would obviously be a waste if involuntary ejaculations were to take place because of unwanted friction. When circumcised, the glans becomes less sensitive, which means that one is able to sustain stimulation for a longer period without 'coming', as I am able to do. This must be better for the blue movie industry as well. In fact, I believe that the films I have seen where the man comes too early (to the disgust of the director) have involved men with foreskins.

I have often indulged in marathon sessions of sucking and fucking lasting several hours before letting go on my spunk in a 'mind blowing' orgasm, only possible because of my circumcised and less friction-sensitive acorn.

The foreskin or prepuce, being made of skin, would of course provide a great deal of stimulation by friction of the two skin surfaces rubbing together, perhaps causing soreness and ulceration. Therefore there is a lubricant beneath the foreskin. This has the revolting name of smegma and is normally a clear, colourless and odourless fluid. Unfortunately though, it readily breaks down and becomes an ideal breeding ground for bacteria, hence the smell. So it is essential to wash under the foreskin frequently. I would never dream of touching, let alone sucking, an uncircumcised cock unless it had been thoroughly washed, and I think that most people would feel the same. How women allow an unwashed cock to penetrate their delightful cunt, goodness only knows. There is also the suggestion that bad hygiene and the consequent continuing depositing of smegma on the woman's cervix during unprotected sex may be a cause of cancer, a problem which rarely occurs when the regular sexual partner is circumcised. So, if the man is uncircumcised, he must be scrupulous in his personal hygiene. I have never, ever, regretted having been circumcised and I do believe that my circumcised knob is the more attractive for it, 'a thing of beauty and a joy to ever hold'.

I mentioned the female clitoral hood as the equivalent of the prepuce, a similar protective cover for her sensitive 'glans' of the clitoris. There are many similarities between male and female anatomy; after all, we begin as one single cell and only develop in different ways after an initial common period. Looking at a vagina, imagine the labia stretched out and fused together to form a sack: this would be the scrotum. Then look at the urethra (urine opening) just below the clitoris, and imagine both the urethra and clitoris stretched outwards and covered with skin continuous with the scrotum: this would be the penis. In fact, there is a 'seam', the raphe, along the underside of the penis continuous with the frenulum and running on along the scrotum. The modified ovaries descend into the scrotum as testicles.

Ken – W. Sussex

My Masturbation Method

I saw a photo in Issue 2 of Body Art of a Prince Albert penis ring on a penis which had been beautifully circumcised, with all the spare skin removed. Yes, circumcision, even at the age of 8, changed my life. Since then I have often wanted a foreskin, but since I am circumcised I have now decided to find out about having the job done properly, or how to do it properly.

Congratulations on Acorn: it should have been out years ago, with its uninhibited articles and views. On masturbation, I have a special way, which I use only on rare occasions when extra pleasure is required. Others may like to try it. Have fun! Put the palms of your hands together with the penis between them and move the palms in opposite directions, then reverse. By altering the amount of your penis between your palms, the pressure exerted, and the speed of rolling, the intensity of sensation can be varied. Sometimes it is so intense that one's breath almost 'shouts out'. A variation, although not as pleasant, is to roll your prick on your stomach. My wife likes my rolling method because when intercourse follows, it is normally longer lasting, once a second erection occurs, and 'superb' (her word). I have also experimented with various creams, oils and talcs: each has its own effect. For me, although cold at first, Pond's Vanishing Cream provides the ultimate sensations and feeling of well being after 'coming'. Does anyone else have a special method?

Mac – Ayrshire

Have I The Right?

It is fashionable nowadays to question the right of parents to have their sons circumcised. It is much better, it is argued, to leave baby boys intact so that the boys themselves, when they become men, can decide whether they wish to be cut. Indeed there are apparently now cases where circumcised children in America are suing parents and doctors for assault in removing their foreskins. So for the father who is in favour of circumcision but is not sure whether or not he is justified in arranging the operation, what are the rights and wrongs of the situation?

To me there seem to be three factors to be considered.

First, the argument that the choice is being left to the son needs to be challenged. Many men will testify to the difficulty of arranging adult circumcision. There is now fortunately the Surgical Advisory Service available but it is expensive and one suspects that the number of operations with which it could cope is limited. Approximately half a million male babies are born in this country each year. Thus if all young men on reaching the age of 18 decided that they wished to be circumcised, 2000 operations would be required each day. Where are the facilities to carry out this number of ops – even if the medical profession were willing to undertake them? We all know that adult circumcisions are few and far between and are likely to remain so. There is unlikely ever to be a situation where every youth approaching manhood is offered the automatic right of free circumcision. We must therefore face the fact that the vast majority of those who are not circumcised as babies will die with their foreskins still intact. The father who decides not to have his son circumcised is not therefore in most cases leaving the decision to the son; he is in fact deciding that the boy will remain uncircumcised throughout his life.

The second point to be considered is whether it is advantageous for the male to be in the circumcised state during childhood. The 'wait-and-see' proponents seem to neglect the fact that, by the time a young man reaches the age of eighteen, a quarter of his life, on average, has gone. If there are benefits to circumcision, by delaying the operation until adulthood the benefits are being lost over a significant period. And surely some of the advantages of the cut state are particularly applicable to childhood. Anyone who has seen a small boy unconsciously rubbing his penis must be aware of the irritation caused by an unclean foreskin. The foreskin may not be retractable until a boy is four or five years old but that does not mean that nothing can penetrate under the foreskin. Indeed, to think of leaving any part of the body unwashed for four or five years is to encourage infection and irritation. But the fact must also be faced that parents are not very good at teaching their sons penile hygiene and boys are not very good at carrying it out. Doctors will tell real horror stories of what they find in routine examinations when they pull back the foreskin. In far too many cases an uncircumcised penis is a dirty penis. Neonatal circumcision prevents such problems.

Then there is the prophylactic argument. Whilst it is true that in most cases the foreskin retracts naturally by the time the child is five years old, sometimes the foreskin never retracts on its own. Even if it pulls back in early childhood there is the distinct possibility that as the penis grows and the glans expands the entrance to the foreskin will be too narrow to allow it to be skinned back. The necessity for circumcision in childhood, at puberty or in early adulthood is certainly not uncommon. And at that stage the operation can cause more discomfort to the boy as well as a lot of embarrassment in explaining the operation to his contemporaries. By declining to have his son cut in infancy, a father may be condemning his son to the need for the operation a few years later. But for the majority of advocates of circumcision the main benefit is the permanent exposure of the glans. Every culture that practises circumcision carries it out before or at puberty. The exposed glans is seen as a mark of manhood and the benefits of exposure are seen to their full in sexual activity. Most young men will have become sexually active before their eighteenth birthday. Ideally therefore a boy needs to be cut before puberty and a father who leaves the choice to his son to make when he comes of age is condemning the boy to start his sex life with the handicap of a foreskin.

The third point to be addressed is the actual right of a father to take decisions on behalf of his son. It is a fact of parenthood that throughout childhood, decisions are constantly being taken by parents about their children. These range from the trivial – what time is bedtime tonight – to the profound – what school do I send the child to, what values do I inculcate? If parents agonised every time that they made a choice for their child as to whether they had the right to make that choice, they would be nervous wrecks long before the child reached school age! Most parents do not worry about this. They know that it is their responsibility to act in the way that they judge best on behalf of their son or daughter, even if some judgments may be wrong. This is part of the role of parenthood.

One of the first decisions that a father of a new-born son faces is: 'Shall have him circumcised?' In my opinion the father who says: "I'll leave it for my son to decide when he grows up" is ducking his responsibilities. If a father believes in the benefits of circumcision, the son has a right to enjoy those benefits during infancy and childhood. A father who believes in circumcision yet does not have his son cut is actually deciding to act against the interests of his son. He is deliberately leaving the foreskin in place when he thinks that the child would be best served by its removal. He is taking a negative decision.

But these are only my opinions. I would be interested to hear from others about what they think are the rights and wrongs of this question; also from fathers about what they decided about their own sons and why. If I get sufficient response I will do a follow-up report for a future issue of Acorn.

Ivan Goodhart, BM Box 2252, London WC1N 3XX

Dear Acorn

A lot of people who write to Forum quote female preference for the circumcised penis as their reason for getting their foreskins pruned. I'm afraid that's not my experience by a long chalk. The women in my life have all been opposed to my circumcision, or at best indifferent. Attitudes range from 'not interested in damaged goods' to 'poor thing, was there something wrong with it?' and I've yet to find a girl who prefers its appearance. Not surprising I suppose – I'd be the first to admit it does look decidedly shabby with its uneven scar and ugly bunch of red crinkly skin when compared with a sleek tapering foreskin.

The first of my problems manifested itself when I was introduced to the exciting sport of wanking to orgasm at the age of 13. A couple of older girls whose lechery was matched only by their spirit of competition enlisted me one day in a 'boat race'. In this, two equal teams of lads like myself were taken by the girls to a barn after school and were required to 'present arms'. On a signal from the referee each girl commenced a vigorous massage of the first penis in the line, moving on to the next as soon as she had collected the first's deposit in a jamjar. The team to finish first was the winner.

I only lasted a couple of boat races before being relegated to the task of referee. The problem of course was my lack of foreskin (I was the only roundhead in the village). It was not just the time it took to procure an orgasm, but the difficulty the girl experienced in manipulating my organ, the skin having been cut right back so as to leave no mobility (as is so admired by contributors to your columns). It was thus made clear to me that a foreskin was an indispensable asset in this particular little game. As referee I watched with envy as the two girls worked their way down the lines, their fists moving with practised ease to roll the skin the whole length of the penis from the balls to beyond the tip, finally catching each offering in the stretched out tube of skin before milking it neatly into the jamjar.

I came to appreciate how much of a deprivation my foreskin was when in later life I found I had lost all sensitivity as a result of exposure and, let's face it, rough usage. It was this which caused me to lose my last girlfriend who found she got sore long before I reached orgasm, and thereafter suffered a sprained wrist trying to bring me off manually, despite liberal applications of KY jelly. We parted amicably enough – she tried her best to accommodate my demands, heaven knows. But she made it clear that it's cavaliers for her from now on; roundheads are just too much trouble.

For those contemplating the op, I have some advice – don't bother! Those who glibly claim that circumcision makes no difference to sensitivity don't know what they're on about. Anybody know of a good cosmetic surgeon who specialises in foreskin replacement?

J.D.A. – Herts

Dear Tony

A word of warning to all those lads who want to lop their foreskins off but haven't yet got round to it – just remember there's no going back! The woman in your life may be a foreskin phobe who wants you to get rid of it, but what about the next woman in your life? From my experience the majority of women are foreskin philes and some feel quite strongly about it.

Take my ex-husband for example. When I first knew him he had a perfectly presentable penis with a foreskin which could have graced some of the finest boudoirs in the land. Somehow he got infected with this inexplicable yen to sacrifice his prepuce on the altar of fashion, and to my abiding disgust, had himself done a few weeks before our wedding. He didn't realise what an unwelcome wedding present it would be to me – because he didn't bother to ask. And now the poor chap is condemned to a life of bitter regret in the knowledge that he made a dreadful mistake and now has to live with it.

The first problem was, that like one of your correspondents, he popped some of his stitches and finished up with a frill of mangled red scar tissue behind his knob. Now I feel very strongly that the male organ should be the symbol of his strength and virility – it should be an object of respect, if not veneration; whereas the mere term 'frilly willy' makes people fall about and devalues the masculine sceptre to an object of ridicule. My poor husband, what did you do to yourself?

Right from the start he was dissatisfied with his new organ, and then dismayed. His experience did not match those of his so-called friends who had egged him on with tales of improvement across the board. Besides looking horrible, he found the loss of sensitivity quite pronounced. He also spent a frustrating amount of time off the road due to recurrent soreness at the point where the convoluted scar tissue was overstretched by his erection and the use to which he put it. For him, the experience of sex after the chop when compared with sex with a foreskin is like looking at a monochrome photograph after seeing a gloriously vivid and colourful painting of the same subject.

I left him, not because of his mangled cock so much as the depressed and dissatisfied state of mind circumcision had reduced him to. So my advice is – if you've got the slightest doubt, don't!

Yours sincerely, C. Potter

True Female Circumcision

[The next contribution comes with a covering note as follows:]

“As the life partner of an enthusiastic supporter of Acorn, I feel sure your readers would be interested in my account of female circumcision by the removal of the clitoral prepuce.

“All these events took place many years before the recent furore about ritual female ‘circumcision’, from which they differ as much as chalk from cheese. Some details are intentionally blurred to avoid recognition by my friends and family, and for the same reason I prefer to remain anonymous.”

I am afraid some of this may seem a bit boring, but how else can I give the background and reasons leading to my own circumcision, and of the freedom and satisfaction it brings.

As an only child, my interests were reading and walking in the lovely country round my childhood home. I matured young but did not go out with boys until the age of eighteen, and as usual with girls of that time, I was not fully aware of the detailed nature and function of the sexual organs. Moderate petting, as it would now be called, was enjoyable but no intimate touching took place. This was how things were in those far off days, and most of my friends acted in the same way. We had many a chat about the boys and our reactions to them. One girl complained that she got a hard lump ‘down there’ if sexually roused, while another said that sexual excitement was actually painful for her (we were all still virgins, but thoroughly enjoyed courting).

I married at twenty-two, and after a few ups and downs (no pun intended) settled to married life with my husband. I enjoyed cuddling and all that went with it, but was unable to ‘let go’ in orgasm, we both thought this may be due to inhibitions left over from the controlled petting of my single days. Now with hindsight I think my tight prepuce was probably to blame.

At this time we were working overseas, hot weather, frequent intercourse, or both caused the formation of smegma under my clitoral hood. This was unpleasant and impossible to remove by ordinary bathing, however we coped by painfully stretching the foreskin and scraping the smegma away. After some years the skin loosened, but frequent attention was needed to keep it really clean, and my orgasms remained difficult. Several children and twelve or fourteen years later (we had read up a lot on the subject in the meantime) I decided to do something about it, and to get rid of the offending skin once and for all.

This was done very simply by removing the skin with round nosed scissors, and a small dressing was applied for a few days. The result was electrifying as the clitoris was open to stimulation, and so easy to keep fresh and clean. My orgasms improved immediately and were often multiple. It was so sensitive that I would ‘come’ from the contact of my clothes when dressing, or even from leaning against the furniture.

Now after nearly thirty years my orgasms remain good and my clitoris is free and happy. And I still thrill to a casual touch on the pubis.

Clearly circumcision is not a panacea for all sexual problems, but I feel that an exposed (or accessible) 'acorn' is very desirable for sexually active persons of either gender.

Anon

Questionnaire Reply

In answer to the questions in Forum 21(6), I think that the majority of uncircumcised men do not clean their penis carefully enough. The foreskin should always be pulled back before peeing. Although I was not done until I was 15, I think that all boys should be circumcised before the age of one, as this minimises trauma and cures any problem before it starts. It should be a normal routine for all boys, so that they do not have to find out that they need to be circumcised later in life, which can be embarrassing. If a man wears tight swimming trunks you can usually see the glans' outline showing through them. Circumcision doesn't discourage masturbation: in fact it is better, as I can make it last longer. But most doctors discourage circumcision and only do it if they think it is necessary. I think any man who wishes to be circumcised should have it done, and the doctor should accept his decision about his preference. Circumcision is certainly necessary if the foreskin can not be retracted properly, or if it becomes infected. When I did finally manage to retract my foreskin it tore and never healed up properly, but became infected. I had constant irritation under it, but this has been cured now that I have been circumcised. Being circumcised was the best thing I ever had done. I am only unhappy it wasn't done till I was 15. Ten days after a school medical examination I and four others in my class had it done in the Jewish Hospital at Bethnal Green, East London. The rabbi did a perfect job: all the foreskin was removed and the stitches dissolved away. The only discomfort was from the local anaesthetic, and I was in hospital for two days. Being circumcised, I find that my glans is harder and not so sensitive. This is an advantage, as I think I last longer before coming and there is no foreskin to get in the way. Also a partner is more likely to suck a circumcised penis than one that isn't done.

R.J.M. – Walthamstow

ACORN

1989 Issue No 2

(Formerly Issue J)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Piercing	R.A.	Page 2
Initiation	Bill	Page 3
Exercises	D.K.	Page 3
Women's Interest In Male Circumcision	Anthony	Page 4
Reg Has The Last Laugh		Page 5
Life And Frustrations Of An Acorn	V.J.V.	Page 6
Elation And Success	Henry	Page 8
Growing Awareness	Keith	Page 8
Availability Of Circumcision	B.H.	Page 9
Overhand Or Underhand?	T.A.	Page 10
Step-Mother Knew Best	C.W.	Page 11
Inside Leg	T.A.	Page 12
Dear Editor (2 letters)		Page 13
Acorn At 70	Harry	Page 15
Tight Skin	Dennis	Page 15

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to another issue of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in everything phallic: the penis, the foreskin, piercing, circumcision (male and female), and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. The owner and/or his partner should be the judge of what is 'best', of course!

Subscriptions: Whether you join in January or at any time later in the year, an annual subscription pays for all the issues published this year, 1989, including back copies. This makes it fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. If contributions come in as they did in 1988, we hope to again manage 8 issues of 12 pages in 1989: this is the second issue.

Renewal Receipt: Receipt of this issue is acknowledgment that you have renewed your subscription for 1989. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, blank or payable to Acorn. They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Contributions: The response to starting the Newsletter in 1988 was far greater than expected. This is your newsletter, and its success depends very much on your contributions, so please keep sending your ideas, anecdotes, comments, information, observations and stories. We will include fantasy as well as factual contributions, provided only that the contributions relate to our broad theme. Readers will use their judgement to decide which is fact and which is fantasy. As well as personal accounts, we'll include contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit). Future contributions would be especially welcome on masturbation techniques and on things to do with a foreskin as well as ways of trimming one to shape!

T.A.

Piercing

I had my nipples pierced last year. After six months I have just decided to remove the rings as, unfortunately, the piercings never completely healed. I was still getting a discharge and bleeding: not much of a turn-on for an erotic piercing! Personally I don't think I'd have a piercing in my cock, but I still think it is an interesting subject. In fact I'm interested generally in anything to do with the cock and balls and would certainly be interested to hear more about piercing. I frequently use a scrotum stretching weight that I bought from Mr Sebastian in London. I'd also like to hear more about using weights, ball dividers, cock rings etc, or any other ways people have found to stimulate and maintain an awareness of their cock and balls. I guess this could widen the coverage of Acorn beyond just circumcision and foreskins, but I'm sure it would be interesting.

R.A. – Brighton

Initiation

I was interested to read in Newsletter 7/88 about the initiation aspect of circumcision. As probably the oldest operation known to man, circumcision goes back to the stone age when most probably the operation consisted of a dorsal slit to make the glans more prominent and accessible for intercourse, and thus was connected with fertility.

A dorsal slit requires less skill than full circumcision: it is doubtful if stone-age man had the required equipment to carry out a radical circumcision.

Circumcision is not confined by any means to Judaism, but the fact that circumcision is mentioned a number of times in the Bible has meant that the operation has become closely associated with the Jewish people. I have always considered that circumcision was primarily connected with hygiene: tribes living in a hot climate with a lack of water found circumcision very desirable. Coupled with all the Kosher dietary regulations, including the prohibition on eating pork, the hygiene theme predominates. Many of the troops serving in the North African desert during World War II, both Rommel's and Montgomery's, were circumcised for similar reasons.

Genesis Ch 17 v9 onwards gives very clear guidance to Abraham as to the circumcision procedure, and even requires that slaves should be included. This strong edict gives rise to the superstition that circumcision must have been favoured by women. Many women who favour a roundhead have said that they experience more sexual excitement from a roundhead rather than a cavalier, and it is often mentioned that a roundhead can withstand considerably more stimulation before climaxing. Research in the USA does appear to show that women who experience intense sexual stimulation tend to ovulate sooner and be fertile for longer periods each month, and hence have a greater chance of becoming pregnant. So Genesis 17 may be concerned less with hygiene and more with increasing the tribe of Israel. I am not entirely convinced that this is not reading more into the text than is reasonable, but what do other members think?

Bill – Kingston

Exercises

I read your letter in Forum (February 1989) with interest, and wondered whether it would help a 66 year old like myself to regain some peak with suggestions, exercises etc. I am not circumcised, but keep my foreskin pulled back as far as possible, not always successful.

D.K. – Winchester

[Any ideas for exercises which would help our friend? — T.A.]

Women's Interest In Male Circumcision

The recent input from ladies interested in circumcision confirms my own impression that they are often curious and fascinated by it: few mentioning the word in my hearing have ever been neutral about it.

My mother was an unswerving circumcisionist, presumably as a result of contact with American servicemen during the war. Her attempts to get me circumcised after my premature birth met refusal and the comment "It wouldn't look nice under a kilt." After years of forced attempts at retraction, it finally took paraphimosis to grant her request. She first mentioned to me that I was circumcised when I started work in industry and commented that it was 'easier to keep clean'. Later she advised my sister to get her boys 'done', and even broached the subject on local radio. My father never discussed any bodily matter with me, but after his death I was told he was uncircumcised.

Before a girl, one of my contemporaries, left school, she and a friend asked me if I knew what circumcision was, having heard of it in a scripture lesson and that "it might be seen during a baby brother's bath". For long she remained oblivious to the physical distinction, having only preputial acquaintanceships until the scalpel's intervention after her second son's paraphimosis at 4.5 years. She remarked that the end was so fat that someone one day would love 'that twiddly bit' underneath, and that all boys should be 'done'. Nevertheless, despite a succession of births, no other brother was operated on.

At work one girl said that circumcision was 'something done to Jewish babies' and wondered what it entailed. A second added that 'gentlemen who are circumcised can prevent their wives getting cancer'. Later a more knowledgeable but friendly clerk described her one-year-old son's circumcision and asked me if I was, following my answer with a sensuously spoken 'I like men who have been under the knife'. Unfortunately for me, theory and practice did not overlap. But she confessed a longing for 'someone with no sense of smell and a 12" tongue'.

My ex-fiancee worked as a secretary to a group of doctors. I recall her speaking excitedly of a coming Saturday morning operation: nail varnish removal, scrubbing up, and setting out instruments, without mentioning what was to be done. Weeks later after another such Saturday morning she mentioned that the patient was a strong baby. A cube of sugar in a bag had been used as a pacifier, the operation was bloody, and there were more than two stitches. It was only when she first handled my penis and traced the scar with her finger that she revealed 'We have a circumcision tomorrow'. Then came the details of previous surgery, how she held the baby's legs apart on the couch so tightly she feared loss of circulation, that not much had been removed, and her bandaging the wound afterwards. She never once used the terms foreskin or penis. Later she discussed circumcision with a female doctor, who stated a preference for the Jewish method, but not why.

Last year near a building which had once been a women's hospital, two ladies passing by openly discussed a son's circumcision there long ago. Lockyer Street Hospital had been used for other than gynaecological purposes in wartime, and he and I both had our foreskins despatched there. My grandmother worked as a domestic for a surgeon's family and her estranged husband, a sea captain, was presumably circumcised. It was she who was baby-sitting on the night of my operation; she was with me during etherification and surgery, but never once spoke to me about it.

I overheard a 16-year-old punk girl boasting of oral sex. When a man jokingly offered to 'slip her one' she replied "I've had enough cheese". Within a year she had given birth to an illegitimate son. More secure in her ignorance was the barmaid, caught in a risqué conversation, who said her foreskin was on the end of her nose. The male response was 'You need a handkerchief for a blow job', followed by, 'Actually, its not to be sniffed at.'

It is ironic that open interest and fascination with circumcision by women are socially acceptable, whilst the current incidence of circumcision for today's young has fallen to scarcity rate.

Anthony – Devon

Reg Has The Last Laugh

The body of war hero Reg Kendall has been at Finchley Mortuary since last Christmas, because of confusion over his religion. No one doubted Reg when he said he was Jewish – but no-one knew he hadn't been circumcised. Reg died at his home in Granville Road, Barnet, on Christmas Day. No relatives of three-times married Reg could be traced to claim the body, so drinking pal Arthur Connelly took over.

A retire French polisher, Reg won the Military Medal while serving in the Royal Scots Greys during the Second World War. "I contacted the Burial Society of the United Synagogue, and they were really helpful", Mr Connelly said. The society arranged the funeral but as the body was being prepared it was obvious that he had not been circumcised. "They couldn't really deal with it then", he said. The funeral service had to be cancelled.

"One side of me was laughing and the other was quite worried – funerals cost hundreds of pounds." To Mr Connelly's relief, Barnet Council has stepped in to foot the bill. Mr Kendall will be cremated at Hendon Crematorium. "This is just the sort of tale that Reg would have loved telling. If he's up there looking down, he'll be laughing himself hysterical", he said.

Hendon and Finchley Times, 19 January 1989

Life And Frustrations Of An Acorn

The penis has always held a fascination for me. I used to get erections and masturbate by 'fucking' the bed while lying on my stomach at the age of four and a half. I well remember my mother catching me doing it once and saying 'Never do that again. It will make you very ill.' By then I knew it did no such thing, and I carried on but took care not to be caught again. I cannot remember how often I did it, but it was quite regularly.

When I was five and a half I went to stay with two cousins, one a year older and the other a year younger. We were all bathed together and I still remember my intense surprise and wonderment when I saw their pricks. They were both uncircumcised, one with a short stubby foreskin and the younger with a long narrow one. There was I with my circumcised one: why were they different? Nothing took place between us but the experience started my lifelong interest in the phallus. It was only after I had gone to boarding school at 8 that I learnt 'the facts'.

At school it was not long before another boy, who was uncircumcised, obviously was just as puzzled by my lack of foreskin. We examined each other and I learnt that he was the same as me when his skin was pulled back. That only half satisfied me because it did not explain why my knob was bare. It was only much later that my education was completed! The 70 or so boys used to go into the swimming bath naked, and with my fixation on pricks I spent much more time watching my companions than I did learning to swim. In my time there I had quite a few liaisons with my fellows. All but two of these were circumcised so my experience of foreskins was still limited. Most of our 'activity' was playing although a few progressed as far as oral sex and mutual masturbation. It was here that I finally discovered that the hand was the most effective means of wanking. About half the pupils were uncircumcised and I never once saw anyone wearing his skin retracted.

At 13 I went to a day school where the opportunities for viewing were almost non-existent except in the loos, where I took every chance. The majority were uncircumcised and all pissed with their foreskins in position over their glans. During this time my phallus reached its present size (6.25" x 1.125"), and I grew a good ginger-coloured bush. I masturbated to climax nearly every day. Sex sessions with colleagues were rare but I had three friends with whom I had occasional sessions of mutual play leading to ejaculation. While I came to like having my prick sucked, I found the orgasm ruined by the glans being over-sensitive. The three friends were also circumcised and found the same.

At 18 I went to college in London and at one stage digged with another student with whom I developed a good sexual relationship. He had a longish narrow foreskin which he had difficulty in drawing up again once he had got it withdrawn behind the rim, so he normally kept it up. He loved being sucked off, presumably because his knob was protected against too much friction.

We used to spend a lot of time just fondling one another's pricks and balls. Even today I love doing this.

I took no interest in girls except to enjoy seeing their boobs and bottoms wobbling as they walked. I certainly never went out with one. In my last year at college I joined up with another student, Fred, who had an unusually shaped prick with a very short foreskin which only half covered the glans when limp. When erect his phallus had a very pronounced upward curve which rather detracted from the pleasure of sucking. He had another pal who was an ardent TV. We used to have threesomes in which Fred's pal was so female-orientated that he never once achieved the slightest trace of an erection, however much we played with and sucked his prick. He was uncircumcised and is the only person I have ever seen who wears his skin retracted all the time. He feels this is more in keeping with his femininity. In our sessions he always took the woman's role in liking deep kissing, having his breasts fondled and being fucked, all of which we enjoyed.

By the time I went to work I was entirely gay. However, due to lack of opportunity this faded and I became interested in girls and eventually married. This has worked out well except for sex. My wife is very uptight and regards the penis as little more than a rude method of getting pregnant. She seldom even fondles me, let alone plays or sucks. I am lucky if I can get intercourse more than once a fortnight, and then it is a very formal business. We have two sons whom we left uncircumcised, on the basis that they could always have the foreskin removed later if they wanted to.

Due to my wife's attitude to sex generally, I am reduced to regular masturbation which I find I still need every other day or so. I invariably fantasise about foreskins, wishing I had one mainly, I think, because I always imagine one can rub the glans if it is covered by the skin and therefore obtain a far more satisfying orgasm than just by pumping the shaft.

Quite often when my prick is really flaccid I push the glans right back so that the skin of the shaft forms a kind of foreskin. By working the glans, thus covered, rapidly between fingers and thumb I can achieve orgasm before much degree of erection has set in. The quality of orgasm is far far better than any obtained by hand or even in a vagina.

I shall be very interested to hear other people's opinions on the value of the foreskin and whether I am missing as much as I think I am by not having one.

V.J.V. – Shropshire

Elation And Success

I was very interested to read in Forum (February 1989) about the creation of the Acorn Group. Well done! For many years I wondered if my fetish for circumcision was obsessional, being uncircumcised from birth. It was not until I placed an ad in the Classified Column of Forum two and a half years ago that I realised how many fellow men (and women?) were as sexually aroused as me by the appearance of a smooth, naked, cut penis.

Through regular correspondence with similar devotees, both circumcised and uncircumcised, I came to the decision to be circumcised myself. I can tell you that I went through a lot of soul-searching, wondering whether the finished result would be worth the pain of the operation. When a friend of mine went ahead with the cut two years ago and described the feeling of elation that he felt, I stopped fantasying and took the first step towards my goal. In February 1988, at the age of 25, I got in contact with the excellent Dr Sifman, a Jewish GP who for the modest cost of £100 would circumcise any adult, teenager or baby without reservation, provided the reason was not for conversion to Judaism. Thank God!

The operation was a success despite my erection throughout the period of local anaesthetic, which meant less foreskin could be cut off than I planned. The result is that when my penis is detumescent (eg after a swim), half my glans is covered by foreskin which has slipped forward. But that's a minor detail which might have been a blessing in disguise. The fact that I have retained my frenulum (good Jewish tradition which developed from the practice of the mohel of circumcising boys at eight days old), plus some surplus skin around it has led to excellent masturbation. What are the experiences of other Acorns?

After experiencing my own circumcision and taking part in that of a 6 month old baby boy, I'd love to meet a young Jewish woman, possibly through Acorn, as I think we would have much to discuss.

Henry – Cambridge

Growing Awareness

Dear Tony: I'd like to renew my subscription to Acorn, and enclose a cheque, which also covers a subscription for a friend of mine, whose address I enclose. I thought you might be interested to know that during 1988 two of my friends have had revisions (i.e. second circumcision operations) performed. Also two pen friends have been circumcised and another has had a revision done, although before we started exchanging letters. There definitely does seem to be a growing awareness of circumcision, and its practice is becoming more common. Best wishes for 1989.

Keith – London

Availability Of Circumcision

I have enjoyed all the past copies of Acorn: it gets more professional every copy. It is also a pleasure to read the more sensible attitudes both for and against circumcision, instead of some of the rather weird paragraphs we read in some other general publications. I would like to see a list of doctors and surgeons who are in favour of circumcision and who will circumcise both children and adults, with an indication of their fees, as I am sure that my fellow readers as well as others would like to know where to go, who to see, and how much the cost would be. It would also be useful to include Edna's doctor, who would circumcise a woman where there is a need. I say this because so many of the medical fraternity are so against routine circumcision and it is difficult to find the expertise we expect in this delicate operation. It would also be nice to hear the opinion of a medic as to the reason for this antipathy in the medical profession.

I am of the opinion that the decline of circumcision is a retrograde step and any person who is against should consider the problems that it helps to prevent. In a child these include a tight foreskin, phimosis, and inflammation (balanitis). Sometimes the result is difficulty or inability to urinate. You try to explain to a boy in considerable pain why he can't pee and has to go to hospital to be circumcised. If this happens in an emergency the operation may well be done by a surgeon who is not well practised, and usually the job is unsatisfactory in such circumstances. In the adult, phimosis and balanitis are quite common, but penile warts less so. The condition of thrush can be transmitted back and forth between sexual partners unless the foreskin is kept sterile and medicated until the bout has cleared up. Although it has not been proved, there is a link between the finding that cancer of the cervix is less frequent in females who have always had sex with circumcised males: in this case circumcision may be a useful preventive. Lets face it: having all males circumcised routinely could save the health service many thousands of pounds and, more important, could save a considerable number of women's lives. To all our female readers with an uncircumcised male at home I would say, get him the kindest cut of all; it may also be doing a female a life-saving favour. I look forward to the 1989 issues of Acorn and enclose my cheque for 10 pounds, which I consider well spent.

BH - Leeds

[Thanks for your letter. In Canada or Spain it is apparently quite common to see newspaper advertisements for circumcision. The problem in Britain is that, for a long time, doctors have been forbidden to advertise their services, and their professional organisations may impose heavy penalties if they do. However, The Surgical Advisory Service, from time to time in the Observer newspaper advertises circumcision in a one-hour brief visit to their clinic, for 190 pounds. They cater for adults, and some Acorn readers have been quite pleased with their results. Their address is Marie Stopes House, 108 Whitfield Street, London W1P 6BE, (tel 01-388 1839).

Another source of information is The Initiation Society, which will send out a printed list of currently approved mohalim (Jewish circumcisers). The list is kept up to date annually, with some names removed and new ones added from time to time. They are trained mainly in the religious and ritual aspects, but must also have the necessary surgical skills to circumcise infant boys. Many are not otherwise medically qualified, although some are, and they are the ones to contact for an adult or adolescent circumcision: while they look primarily to serve fellow Jews, they are generally sympathetic to circumcision for non-Jews. It would be as well to make it clear from the outset whether or not one is considering conversion to the Jewish religion. Most are in London or Salford/Manchester, but there are a few in other parts of the country. The address is Alex Minn, Secretary, The Initiation Society, 16 Berkshire Gardens, London, N13 6AB, tel: 01-289 2573 (office), 01-888 1382 (home). It would obviously be courteous to enclose a stamped and self-addressed envelope for a reply.

If other doctors/surgeons would like to have their name made available to Acorn readers, they are welcome to suggest an appropriate wording. It would be interesting to have a contribution on current attitudes in medical schools and the medical profession, if any member wishes to offer one.

Obviously, neither Acorn nor its editor can make any recommendation to a particular circumciser, and it is entirely the responsibility of any reader to satisfy himself that the individual consulted is suitably qualified. He should also ensure that in any consultation it is clearly established what type of outcome is desired, how much inner and outer foreskin is to be removed, and approximately where the scar-line should lie. The anaesthetic should be discussed (risks and side-effects of a local anaesthetic are far less than for a general anaesthetic), and so should the aftercare. — Tony Acorn]

Overhand Or Underhand?

When peeing, how do you hold your penis? Most men I have observed hold the penis with the fingers underneath and the thumb on top, but a minority have the fingers on top and the thumb underneath. The latter style is more 'modest' or secretive, since little or none of the penis is visible to an observer standing next to the person concerned. Have other readers made similar observations? Does any reader remember being told or shown (by a parent, for example) which way to hold it? What comments were made at the time about whether or not to hold it a particular way? It does not seem to differ between cavaliers and roundheads. But from a rough impression (deceptive though this may be), the overhand hold seems to be more common among men of working class appearance? Is this impression shared? More observations please.

T.A.

Step-Mother Knew Best

I started to take an interest in the difference between circumcised and uncircumcised penises in the school changing rooms at about the age of 11 or 12. Most of the boys whose cock was cut were (with hindsight) shy, and the uncut ones were envious. Secretly I became more and more interested and, I suppose, jealous that this cut had not been done to me.

When I was 17 my father remarried (my step-mother was then in her late 40s). My father was uncircumcised but my step-brother was circumcised and my step-mother was a keen supporter. One bath-time she 'accidentally' (I thought at the time, although I was later to find out I was wrong) walked in and saw me as I was towelling myself dry. Laughingly she told me not to be shy as she was now responsible for me and we were both adults. She asked me if I had any problems or questions about sex, and later asked me to remove my towel. At once she became concerned about my penis and asked me if it wasn't uncomfortable with a foreskin. Feeling so natural, I told her my thoughts and at the end shrugged my shoulders and said "Anyway, its too late now, but I wish they had done me when I was a baby." She told me not to be silly, it could be done at any time, and proceeded to move it to see if it was OK. As it happened my father, who was in the services, was away and not due back for some three months – this too I later was told by my step-mother was no accident, as she had picked that time to arrive unannounced in the bathroom. She apparently had already a good idea that I was not circumcised as she had seen me in my bathing trunks. My step-mother said not to worry, she would take care of everything.

The next evening saw me lying on my bed with my legs over the side, on a plastic sheet, in the presence of my step-mother and her mother, a retired district nurse. It was her mother who circumcised me. She used a cold spray which was very stingy, and cut me with scissors and a scalpel. Afterwards she put in stitches and left me in the care of my step-mother, who changed my dressings. At the time I was frightened by the amount I was cut, but now I wish more had been taken. Although it was sore at the time, and there was discomfort with the stitches, I healed up within a couple of weeks. After I had healed my step-mother used to rub in surgical spirit onto the glans every night to 'harden things up'. At the time we were both pleased with the result, although my step-mother was upset that more skin was not removed and that my frenulum had been left untouched. With hindsight I now agree, as that really is the only untidy consequence of that night.

Most of the females I met after school liked the penis circumcised. My wife is largely indifferent on the issue, however, or rather is slightly 'anti' due to difficulty in mutual masturbation: my wife's masturbation technique of my circumcision is the least satisfactory aspect of my sex-life. We have sex about once a week, and I masturbate daily, usually accompanied with a circumcision fantasy.

The scar-line is about half an inch from the glans rim when my penis is limp and one inch when erect. The scar is parallel to the glans rim, and this is the thickest part of my penis, with a diameter of 4.5 inches when erect and only slightly less when limp. I've often wondered if it would be worth finding somebody to remove that bunch of skin underneath, but I don't know how practical that is as I have heard that this area can bleed severely, which I presume is why it was left in the first place.

To me, the advantages of circumcision are the appearance, the cleanliness, and an awareness of masculinity: probably one is more confident when circumcised. Sado-masochism does not turn me on, but I now regard circumcision-pain as an essential to manhood.

C.W. – Fife

[Thank you for your fascinating letter, C.W. Your final comments may well ring a bell with other readers who were circumcised as teenagers. One of the most difficult things to explain is the sense of relief to be circumcised at last, of added confidence, of masculinity, which some readers have felt and continue to feel after circumcision. If other readers have shared this feeling, please write in with your stories and a description of your feelings, both at the time and since. — T.A.]

Inside Leg

Tailors estimate that 60-70 per cent of their customers 'dress' on the left. Some Doctors believe that this changes when a man is suffering from some physical problem, when 'the penis always points to the side of the lesion'. Stephen Gwyther and Christopher Coates of Charing Cross Hospital, London, decided to study 120 patients suffering either from a fracture to the necks of their thigh bones, or who had entered hospital for a hip joint replacement. They discovered that the penis points to the left in about 75 per cent of the cases, irrespective of the side of the body where the damaged bone was. A further 15-20 per cent point to the right, and in the final 5-10 per cent the penis lies straight. The doctors, reporting in the British Journal of Hospital Medicine, also established that the penis did not change direction when men had operations on both sides.

But how did they classify those who wear their penis tucked upwards in a tight pair of pants, I wonder?

Tony Acorn

Dear Editor

Having had a number of boyfriends, both circumcised and uncircumcised, a roundhead husband and now an intact partner, I feel myself qualified to participate in the discussion over the relative merits of the foreskin. Although it wouldn't do to overstate the case, it is pure balls to claim that there is no difference in the sensitivity of the circumcised penis when compared with that equipped with a foreskin. A point which no one has bothered to make so far is the extent to which the foreskin can be used to act as a sensitivity regulator. Whilst in my experience a freshly peeled glans is sensitive in a way a permanently exposed one can never be, a glans which is totally encapsulated within the foreskin is usually less responsive to certain direct stimuli than the bare glans of a circumcised man.

In my view sensitivity to touch decreases in direct relation to the amount of exposure it is subjected to. One of my uncircumcised boyfriends used to leave his foreskin retracted for days at a time and it was noticeable that his glans soon took on the dry, pinkish-grey appearance of the circumcised knob. My present partner is concerned to retain the exquisite sensitivity of his glans and never uncovers except for specific sexual activities which demand it, and occasionally for hygienic reasons, although his foreskin seldom collects. He is lucky in that he is equipped with a foreskin which stays where it is put: if stretched forward beforehand it keeps the glans fully covered throughout the sex act and if withdrawn so that the tight opening nips in the groove behind the glans, it will stay back until pulled forward again.

I find the degree of sensitivity of the glans is reflected in its appearance. My present partner who keeps his glans covered retains the moist, shiny, liver coloured knob you see on a young boy in contrast to that of the boyfriend I mentioned who used to train his foreskin back.

My preference? You have to be a cold fish to judge a penis in isolation from the man as a whole, but I certainly have no plans at all for depriving my little boy of his cute little willie-cozy. If you consider the matter dispassionately, I think most people would agree that nature knows best. With my present boyfriend I have the choice between a fast response or a slow one. My circumcised partners were never able to experience the explosion of feeling my present man gets when I stimulate his glans with my tongue. Equally they were unable to experience the long term satisfaction I can give to my present partner when I find him fast asleep beside me with a huge erection (which is often the case). I love to lie there holding it gently in my hand, slowly moving the loose skin in circles over the sensitive surface of his knob. I can keep this up for ages before the pleasure finally wakes him up whereupon I milk his sperm into his pinched off foreskin before squeezing it like toothpaste from a tube, into his belly button. Can you think of a better way to start the day?

Yours etc.,

A.S.B.

Dear Tony Acorn

I enclose herewith my subs for the 1989 year – a £10 postal order.

I think that it has been good to bring out a subject which obviously interests many people, but which has always been somewhat taboo under normal circumstances – since I left school I have not discussed in detail the subject of circumcision with any friends or inspected any cocks at close quarters because of the fear that it would be taken the wrong way.

A few comments:

- from several letters in Acorn recently, men are complaining of their foreskins coming forward during intercourse. Although I have a fairly loose foreskin which covers the complete knob even when erect, I am certain that during sex the skin stays back.
- can we have some information on masturbation methods from cavaliers – I almost always now wank with the skin held back, and using some form of lubrication, usually saliva or KY jelly, stimulate the knob directly. This has tended not only to provide better sensations, but also toughens the skin of the knob with an improvement in staying power in normal sex. I find that using the foreskin and pulling it back and forth is less satisfactory and also irritates the foreskin, which funnily enough is probably now more tender than the knob itself – and you will all ask the question, why not have it off? Well, there are advantages of having it both ways.
- having a loose foreskin and a not very pronounced rim on the knob, I find it difficult to keep the skin pulled back, unless I am wearing a jockstrap or tight underpants – this has also helped to toughen the knob and I can now hardly feel any difference whether I have the skin back or forward. I would like to be able to keep the skin back almost permanently, but have not found a method of doing so satisfactorily.
- has anyone with a long foreskin any experience of having it shortened, so that part of the knob is exposed? – it would be interesting to know.
- what proportion of members are cavaliers/roundheads? And, of the roundheads, how many have been circumcised in adulthood and for what reasons?
- when I was a small schoolboy, we used to refer to bottlenecks or policeman's helmets for cavaliers and roundheads – are there any other terms used?
- I recently saw an article in a motoring magazine on the new Vauxhall Cavalier headed 'A rounded Cavalier': I wonder whether this was a conscious play on words?

I look forward to the 1989 issues of Acorn.

Yours sincerely,

J.H. – Beckenham

Acorn At 70

Dear Tony: I was most interested in the Nacton reports and the two opposing views expressed by ladies on the subject of circumcision. As to the suggestion of a survey of members on Nacton lines, I can contribute the following. I was circumcised at about 3-4 years of age as an anti-wanking measure. Although done at the local hospital, I believe the Jewish method was used, since there is no surplus skin on top or at the sides. The scar is now almost invisible, but a bunch of nicely sensitive skin surrounds the intact frenulum. A moistened fingertip vibrating the fleshy 'string' will produce an orgasm.

70 years ago peeping at one's own organ, let alone anyone else's, was taboo, so I didn't feel uncomfortable about it socially until at about 9 when curiosity about girls overcame taboo. Here I was definitely at a disadvantage. Knowing why I was cut, I thought anyone who saw it would know my 'shameful' secret, so chances to see and explore on the basis of "show me yours and I'll show you mine" were almost nil. Swimming lessons with the school helped, with the inevitable horseplay behind the masters' backs in the changing boxes. But rigid segregation of the sexes at school made intersex relationships extremely difficult for a diffident child: we were much less mature, self-confident and independent in the 1920s and 1930s.

As to personal preference, I have never found the lack of a prepuce a handicap sexually, but have often wished I had an 'accommodating' one on occasions, as there are so many things one can do and have done with it. I suppose the best of both worlds would be enjoyed by those fortunates able to train a medium foreskin to remain behind the glans rim at all times until deliberately pulled forward to cover the glans. Hygiene would be almost automatic.

Harry – Colchester

Tight Skin

The report in Forum vol 22 no 2 is of great interest because of my own particular problem in the past. For more years than I care to remember I found myself with a foreskin so tight that it just would not pull back over the glans and I thought that circumcision must be the only answer to what was often very painful. Indeed on one occasion having sex I actually suffered torn skin and had to stay in hospital a few days to stop the bleeding. This episode turned me off sex with a partner for several years and I reverted to gentle wanking. About two years ago on the nudist beach I met a fellow who I thought had a very handsome cock with flared glans well displayed. I had to ask if he had been cut. He explained that he was intact but when young he had been taken to his doctor and the skin had been stretched. His son had now had the same treatment. I had never heard of this method and had my doubts. But little by little I have managed in a period of two years to force back the skin, often with pain and of course soreness on newly opened skin so that now it uncovers the shiny knob and by forcing the skin right back it looks as though I am circumcised. Of course it won't stay right back; indeed it rolls forward over the cock head, but now I can fold the skin under, so revealing the now much tougher glans – the far more interesting Acorn effect.

My nephew tells me he has had the same problem and is giving serious thought to being cut, even though like me he does not really want to lose his foreskin. I will have to show him how I am able to tuck under the loose skin so as to harden off the lovely glans.

Now I have it held back for most of the time I have become much more virile and randy. Dare I confess it? One gets a much more prominent manly appearance in tight trousers. What a pity that all men and boys with foreskin problems are not made aware of the stretching possibilities. I know quite a few who suffer this problem.

While I have not had piercings myself as yet, I would like to hear from those who have had this fascinating experience.

Dennis N. – Deal

ACORN

1989 Issue No 3

(Formerly Issue K)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Meeting In Weston-super-Mare		Page 3
Full Frontals In Films	M.M.G.	Page 4
Genital Modifications	T.A.	Page 5
Frenulum Modifications	S.S.L.	Page 10
Enthusiast	George	Page 10
New Member 1	J.B.	Page 11
New Member 2	E.S.	Page 11
Skin	A.W.	Page 12
Interests And Fantasies	P.B.	Page 12
Circumcision Of Newborn Boys
Cuts Kidney Infections By 90%		Page 13
Yoga And The Size Of
The Flaccid Penis	M.M.G.	Page 14
Observations	V.	Page 15
Advertisement		Page 16

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to another issue of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in everything phallic: the penis, the foreskin, piercing, circumcision (male and female), and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. The owner and/or his partner should be the judge of what is 'best', of course! This issue includes a long survey of possible modifications to the penis, plus the usual large postbag.

Acorn: Why the name? In Latin it is glans, which applies to both cavaliers and roundheads, but it is also sufficiently anonymous to make a convenient name for us. We are a Group recognised by the Forum Society (which also recognises a range of encounter and other Groups), and they are kind enough to forward mail for us. There is also an Acorn Group in the USA (from whom we have borrowed the name), but the only connection otherwise is in our shared interests.

Subscriptions: Whether you joined in January or at any time later in the year, your £10 annual subscription pays for all the issues, including back copies, published in 1989. 1988 back copies (about 100 pages) are available for £5. This makes it fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, blank or payable to Acorn. They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Contributions: The response to starting the Newsletter in 1988 was far greater than expected. This is your newsletter, and its success depends very much on your contributions, so please keep sending your ideas, anecdotes, comments, information, observations and stories. We will include fantasy as well as factual contributions, provided only that the contributions relate to our broad theme. Readers must use their own judgement to decide which is fact and which is fantasy. We'll also include contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit). If contributions come in as they did in 1988, we hope again to manage 8 issues of 12 pages in 1989: this April issue is the third, for publication in late March. Issue 4 is planned for publication in mid-May, and issue 5 is due in late June/early July.

Information: It must be clearly understood that any information given out, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes any recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any such information does so at their own risk, and must rely on their own judgement in doing so.

Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or to give them advice specific to their condition. The membership of Acorn includes doctors who have said they are willing to help other members.

A copy of the list of approved (and annually reviewed) Jewish circumcisers (mohelim) is available from The Initiation Society or from the Editor of Acorn. Most only operate in a religious context, and only on infants, but some are additionally qualified and may be willing to help adolescents or adults in non-religious circumstances.

It is planned to contact Islamic circumcisers with a questionnaire, the results of which (if significant) will be compiled and made available. If any member can help with this survey by sending in the addresses of mosques in their area, please do so: they are sometimes listed in the phone book, or are available from local public libraries or (tourist) information offices.

Confidentiality: Contributions will be identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Letters may be forwarded anonymously if you wish. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with these guarantees in mind.

T.A.

Meeting In Weston-super-Mare

At the meeting in Oxford in September last year, seven Acorn members were present, which was rather disappointing. Another meeting is proposed and will take place at Weston-super-Mare on the weekend of June 17th-18th at the residence of David, one of our members. Bed and breakfast accommodation will cost about £9, plus Saturday evening dinner and drinks for another £5, with no worries about drinking and driving. Sunday lunch will cost £5 or under, so the weekend should not be expensive.

The Oxford weekend was taken up mostly with the technicalities of various methods of circumcision and, although very friendly, for much of the time was rather stilted regarding personal feelings, possibly due to it being a first meeting with everyone not knowing really what to expect. It is hoped that this coming meeting will be more down to earth, and to ensure that all participants feel comfortable, enquirers are asked to complete and send in the questionnaire below. The meeting will follow the lines required by the questionnaire answers.

We are not a one-sex group, so ladies, wives or partners are quite welcome and can be assured that they will be completely respected. Please bring along any material, print or film (VHS video available) that you think might be of interest to other people. Social nakedness and touching will be permitted, but Forum Society rules will apply regarding body fluids. If you are interested, please write with replies to the following questionnaire (your letter will be held in strictest confidence), and keep a copy of your answers for your own reference to bring with you. Include your name, address and (if possible) phone number, so that the organiser can contact you direct with details of the venue.

Weston Meeting Questionnaire. Write in on the following lines, keeping your own note of what you have said:

1. My name is ..... and I am ..... years old
2. I belong/do not belong to the Forum Society
3. I am heterosexual/mildly bisexual/bisexual/gay
4. I still have my foreskin/I was circumcised at the age of .....
5. I am pleased/displeased with my present state
6. I would like to discuss and see (where appropriate):
  - a) different types of foreskin
  - b) different results of circumcision
  - c) tidying-up methods
  - d) before and after sensations
  - e) piercing
  - f) attitudes to sizes
  - g) masturbation methods
  - h) other sexual subjects (specify):
7. I would be happy/unhappy to undress in front of other people
8. I would be happy/unhappy to touch and be touched by other people
9. I would be happy/unhappy to demonstrate my masturbation technique

Don't forget to include your name, address and telephone number. Reply to David, via Acorn

Full Frontals In Films

Does Britain lead the world in the number of movies in which there are full frontal views of males? I can think of:

Yugoslavia: Mystery of the Orgasm

Sweden: I am Curious

France: Pink Narcissus

Britain: Room with a View
Sebastiane
The Tempest (Jarman)

USA: Is there one? Does Richard Gere only bare his buttocks?

M.M.G. – N. Yorks.

Genital Modifications

The central aim of the Acorn Group is to provide a discussion forum for the exchange of information about ways of getting the phallus into the best possible shape. This article is a brief survey of a range of processes relevant to this aim, with the intention of stimulating responses from members. It will start with some quite minor, non-destructive modifications. Some of the major modifications towards the end are highly destructive. They are included, although not advocated, to show the lengths to which some men have gone. Readers must decide for themselves where the boundary lies between interesting experiment and masochistic excess.

The simplest modification is to remove the pubic hair. Removing hairs on the penis shaft may help to make it look longer. There are various methods of depillation. Shaving is an obvious way, but is difficult to do without nicking the skin, and the prickly stubble which soon follows is uncomfortable. Pulling out hairs individually avoids these problems but is slow. A frequent danger with creams is soreness and a skin rash. Recently a new device for home electrolysis has been advertised at about £30, and sounds promising: has anyone had any experience with it?

If the foreskin can not be retracted (phimosis), that is obviously a high priority. Try steadily pulling it back in frequently repeated sessions until the glans can be bared. But if you do this, it is vital to know about the risk of paraphimosis and how to deal with it. Basically this is when the tightest band of the foreskin slips behind the glans rim, becomes trapped there, and threatens to strangle the glans. The remedy is to interlock the fingers around the penis shaft with the palms towards the glans. Use the thumbs to press the glans between them and keep up this pressure until the blood has been forced out of the glans, then use the fingers to grip the foreskin and ease it forward over the glans rim.

The foreskin is highly elastic and can be variously modified by stretching, perhaps with the aim of lengthening it to produce an overhang beyond the end of the tip of the glans, or perhaps stretching the opening to widen it. It also varies extensively: some foreskins are long and some are short. Some are thick and wrinkled; others are tightly stretched, so that the outline of the glans' rim is easily visible through the foreskin. Some men are able effectively to choose whether to wear it pushed back to bare the glans whenever they like and for as long as they like. Most, however, find that it slips forward again to cover the glans as soon as the penis is no longer erect. In that case it may be worth experimenting with a rubber band or a cock-ring – the sort that goes around the scrotum (first) and then the base of the penis. But always use a ring made of a material which you can cut through if necessary: some are made of steel, which could be highly embarrassing if you find it is too tight to get off.

The shaft skin of the penis is also very elastic, and some circumcised men have had success stretching it forward and taping it there (using a nonallergenic tape such as 'Micropore'). An erection applies further tension. In this way it has sometimes been possible to train the remaining cuff of foreskin to cover at least part of the glans, at least when not erect. An American organisation (BUFF: Brothers United for Future Foreskins) has collected experiences and provides mutual support for this activity. There have been various attempts at surgical restoration of the foreskin (the earliest recorded was by Celsius, some two thousand years ago), but results are unpredictable, much depending on how thorough the original circumcision was. Jewish mohels soon introduced a second stage to their operation, tearing and turning back the inner surface of foreskin, to prevent recourse to such a trick.

The frenulum (or frenum) is the little bridge of skin between the foreskin and the underside of the glans, sometimes referred to as the cock-string. Again it is very variable, hardly noticeable in some men, but in others very tough and tight, so that when the foreskin is pulled right back it pulls down on the tip of the glans. If it is a problem it can be cut, and may often be torn by vigorous masturbation or intercourse, and then may bleed quite copiously, but this usually stops quite quickly when the erection subsides, especially if the foreskin can also be pulled forward to cover it. It is also very easy to pierce, as the skin is very thin and heals very quickly. A ring worn in such a piercing can easily be concealed or revealed according to the wearer's choice, and if a ring diameter is chosen which fits around the glans rim, this can sometimes considerably enhance the shape of the penis. One way of demolishing the frenulum is to pierce it, using nylon monofilament (fishing-line, for example), then tie this tightly and tension it: over a period of a week or so the stitch will cut through. The Nuer tribe of the Upper Nile are said to do this, using a hair from the tail of a giraffe: the result is often a very long, loose foreskin. The foreskin can also be pierced in various ways, to hold it back or to keep it forward, perhaps with a chastity lock. It would also be possible to experiment with stretching a piercing by wearing increasingly heavy objects in it.

Various cuts can be made in the foreskin, to achieve a variety of effects, obviously culminating in complete removal by circumcision. But there are some other interesting possibilities as well. For example, some East African tribes make a buttonhole slit in the foreskin, longitudinally or across, about level with the glans rim, and then push the glans through this slit. The result is to bare the glans without removing any skin, and the foreskin then hangs under the glans, giving it a double-ended appearance. It must be held in place with a stitch while healing, but then the owner is free to decide whether to keep his glans bare or to tuck the tip back into its old foreskin 'sleeping-bag'. The dorsal slit (a cut in the foreskin on the upper – dorsal – side from its opening for a variable distance) bares the glans without removing any foreskin, and was sometimes done by British doctors instead of circumcision: the loose foreskin gathers under the glans and may form a soft lump, or may largely disappear.

Circumcision is obviously the most common surgical modification of the penis. Again a wide range of variation is possible, leaving the shaft skin loose, or tight as a result of radical circumcision. The placing of the scar-line can also be varied: in the sulcus (the valley immediately behind the glans rim), or, by leaving plenty of the inner layer of foreskin, well back from the glans rim along the shaft. If a slack outcome from an initial circumcision is unsatisfactory, revision is possible: a second operation removes a band of skin wide enough to achieve the desired tightness and the two edges are rejoined. This is a large topic and will only be touched on here. But it is important, if you are thinking of having a circumcision, to find out about the various ways it can be done and the consequences for different appearances, and to find an operator who will talk these over with you and find out about your preferences.

Piercings are a widespread device for modifying various parts of the body, including the penis. They may be temporary, or may be kept open by leaving a ring or stud in place so that they become permanent. Items worn in the piercing may be simple, or elaborately decorated jewellery can be designed. The piercing may be left small, or stretched: pictures of tribespeople with pierced and heavily stretched earlobes are not unusual, and the same principle can be applied to piercings elsewhere. As with any operation (and especially in view of the risk of AIDS) it is essential to use only instruments, jewellery and dressings which are sterile, though this can be achieved by boiling in a pressure cooker or heating in a dry oven to 150 degrees C for at least 20 minutes after temperature has been achieved.

Piercings may be single or multiple, and there are many possible male genital sites, including the foreskin, the shaft skin or the pubic area at the base of the penis. An interesting combination is a piercing at each side at the base (known as a hafada) and one in each side of the foreskin. When linked by one ring at each side, the foreskin is held back. The frenulum is easily and safely pierced, as the following story relates:

A school-friend showed me a book he had found in his father's chemist shop, which mentioned that in North Borneo a man would pierce his penis and keep the hole open with a quill. As we were very much at the stage of getting a hard-on at the slightest provocation and comparing dimensions, this intrigued us mightily. Inspection (against a hand torch) of the ligature connecting the foreskin to the knob showed that it might be possible to pierce it without hitting a blood vessel.

One early closing day when my friend's parents had left the shop we met there. Tommy had already taken a bodkin from his mother's sewing bag, and there were quills (tooth-picks) and iodine in the shop. The piercings took about ten minutes each, but it was some weeks before the holes became scar-free and usable. We wore large (about 3") safety-pins in the holes, which not only kept them open and clean but established us among our class-mates as braves, as they imagined the piercings to have been an ordeal. It certainly added a new dimension to us (literally). In those pre-Y-front days we were forever trying to arrange erections so that they would show, especially in football shorts. In the end the piercing became a godsend when I discovered I could use it to hold my penis upright, hard or limp, with the aid of a key-ring through the frenulum and the lowest button on my shirt. I eventually chose a size that was a snug fit behind the rim of the glans when limp, but which on erection strongly emphasized that rim by deepening the sulcus (dip). My partner positively moaned for it to be moved slowly in and out of her lips, and it doubled my own orgasm as well, without limiting ejaculation in the slightest. In short, my piercing is a quiet success: a delight for everyday wear and an enhancement of my masculinity. [Condensed from Forum 15(9) 1982: 88.]

The glans can be pierced in various ways: a 'Prince Albert' allows a ring to be worn through a piercing into the urethra beside the frenulum. An apadravya is a piercing through the glans from front to back (as described in the Karma Sutra) and an ampallang is a hole from side to side, while dydoes involve piercings in the glans rim. In each case a short rod with a fixed ball at one end and a screw-on ball at the other is worn to keep the piercing open. It is essential that this keeper stays in place for at least two months, and scrupulous care is needed to keep the area clean, though this is assisted by the normal action of urine.

Other sites for piercings are the scrotum and the perineal raphe (the loose skin between the scrotum and the anus): a ring worn there is known as a guiche. Control over sexual activities can be conceded to a partner by using piercings for infibulation: a lock or ring can be inserted in two foreskin piercings, or in Prince Albert and guiche piercings, or in an ampallang. Various other restraints are also possible, including cock-ring(s) at base of penis and scrotum, a leather harness etc.

Bead implants can be used under the foreskin or the shaft skin to produce a knobbly effect (as with some 'fun' condoms), perhaps in a double line along the dorsal shaft, where they will best stimulate the clitoris. The pubic-hair area, the glans or the shaft skin can be tattooed: it is essential, however, to go to a reputable tattooist, as this is one way that AIDS can be spread. It could be fun to work out an appropriate design, using waterproof felt-tip pens. The best designs involve detailed design, and make use of the changing shape of the body and its muscles to give 'life' to designs of snakes, dragons, birds, butterflies, etc. There is a journal called Body Arts which gives ideas and addresses of suppliers of jewellery to wear in piercings.

Various modifications are possible to the urethra (the pipe down through the penis through which urine and semen are conducted). The opening is usually quite small, but the urethra then widens out substantially for about the length of the glans before narrowing again. The opening can be cut to widen it (meatotomy, pronounced me-ate-ot-omy), either to let in surgical instruments (for a prostate operation for example) or to improve the flow of urine. The diameter of the urethra can be quite surprisingly large: well over 1cm. It can be stretched to widen it further by inserting various objects, though it is important for these to be smooth and non-breakable (interesting effects have been reported using the tall thin sort of candle). There is a risk of infection by doing so, but several cases are in the medical journals of men who have repeatedly done so, as an active form of auto-erotic sexual gratification and/or to obtain attention in hospital. [T.N. Wise, 'Urethral manipulation: an unusual paraphilia', Journal of Sex and Marital Therapy 8(3) 1982: 222-7]

Most Australian aboriginal tribes practised both circumcision and sub-incision, an operation by which the underside of the penis is cut open from the meatus (the natural urethral opening) for a variable distance. Some tribesmen later had this cut further extended as far as the scrotum. Early anthropologists thought subincision was done as a means of contraception, but it does not have this effect and is much more concerned with tribal myths and rituals of initiation.

Operations to the scrotum and testicles are more serious as they may affect fertility. Scrotal reduction involves removing part of the scrotum so that the testicles do not hang so loosely; if the scar-line followed the mid-line raphe it would be indistinguishable, but the reduced ability to keep the testicles cool could reduce fertility. An operation is sometimes necessary (before a boy reaches puberty) to correct an undescended testicle: the testicle is sewn into place and subjected to traction until the spermatic chord grows sufficiently to allow it to remain where it belongs. Vasectomy is a minor contraceptive operation which involves cutting and tying the spermatic chord. The Bushmen of South Africa used to believe that having two testicles made twins likely: this was to be avoided in their harsh climate, so routinely boys had one removed (orchidectomy) in a tribal initiation.

There are also reports of male genital self-mutilation by splitting up the penis or partial or complete amputation. These are reviewed by Greilsheimer and Groves, Archives of General Psychiatry 36 (1979): 441-6, who conclude that while some are psychotic at the time others are not, but are motivated by premeditated gender conversion or by feelings of rage towards themselves or women, sometimes urged on by their own sense of rage or guilt to attempt to apply the biblical command: 'If thine eye offend thee, pluck it out'. But everyone else would agree that that is going too far.

T.A.

Frenulum Modification

Lovely to hear of your Acorn phallic group from Forum. Like you, I enjoy wanking to keep my penis strong and healthy. I enjoy a full and satisfying sex life with my wife and have over a number of years used a vacuum developer which has increased the length of the erect penis from 5" to over  $6\frac{1}{2}$ " : my wife is over the moon about this, but expresses a desire to feel it much thicker to fully satisfy her – any suggestions? To attain a good suction whilst using the developer I remove all the hair from the penis root, and in summer weather also remove all body hair from legs, belly, chest, and armpits, as well as from my pubes, penis and testicles of course. I find this not only exciting to do using a razor or depilatory cream, but I also find it fresher and more hygienic.

I am also interested in the piercing of the penis: can this be done oneself, using sterile equipment? I would love my frenulum pierced and ringed, and also either side of the foreskin. Whilst talking of foreskin, is it possible to stretch the frenulum so as to allow the foreskin to be completely pulled back without pulling the knob down, as is the usual case?. My wife is also interested in this and asks could it be cut surgically to allow much more movement during masturbation, which she loves doing?

S.S.L. – Durham

[Some interesting questions there, many of which are answered in the article above on penis modifications. It is difficult to stretch the frenulum without tearing it, so it is probably better to pierce and tie it, or cut it. A Prince Albert piercing is quite easily done oneself: it bleeds quite copiously, but this does not take long to stop. The difficult thing is to insert a stud or ring, unless you know the tricks. The foreskin is also easy to pierce, but other penis piercings are more difficult. There used to be a piercing operator in Durham: he moved to the Lake District but is now retired. Piercing operators known to your Editor are in London or Gloucestershire: write in for names if you want to go ahead with this. It is also important to get the right type of ring or stud first: normal ear-rings are usually too insecure and easily bent: there are suppliers both in Britain and the US. Sterile equipment and techniques are essential in view of the possibilities of infection with AIDS, hepatitis, etc. It is also necessary to work out carefully where you want the piercing to be, and to hold the skin firmly (eg with forceps) while working, especially where there are two surfaces, as with the foreskin. — T.A.]

Enthusiast

I was extremely interested to read about the Acorn group in Forum. I have been a cock enthusiast for several years and my fascination with things phallic grows ever stronger. My cock is circumcised so my glans is always exposed. I regularly enjoy several types of phallic fun, including lubrication with various oils, wearing cock rings, wearing short shorts, maintaining an erection for hours etc. I live on my own, which gives me great freedom and I enjoy occasional visits from four like-minded guys (ranging in age from 30 to 50) who are also enthusiasts. Three of them are uncircumcised and have covered glanses when they are soft. Yours like-mindedly,

George – Perth

New Member 1

Dear Acorn: I read with interest your leading letter in the current edition of Forum. The theme of your group seems simple, and yet for me it fills a gap in the market: sometimes the most obvious things are the most overlooked.

Although size, shape and performance are jokey subjects amongst one's friends, I think men often feel the need to discuss, what in reality is a quite delicate matter, in depth and seriously. Perhaps correspondence and via a newsletter is the best way to do this. Your membership figures, while not overwhelming, seem to confirm the need to exchange views and opinions.

My main interests have focused on wearing extremely brief underwear, sometimes tailor-made by an understanding manufacturer, and often a size too small to give a constricted feeling. I've also tried padded briefs in various materials and garments in both rubber and leather specifically designed to either restrict or enhance. I find both sensations, although opposite, equally stimulating. An arab strap, for example, although intended for stimulation, can quite easily be modified to be a restrictive device. A developer, although very pleasurable to use, has not in fact been particularly effective. In the short term, whilst using it, the results are quite startling, but they wear off quite quickly.

I much look forward to hearing from you. I'd be more than willing to give you any information you require for the interest of other members or for analysis, confidentially of course but quite frankly.

J.B. – Canterbury

New Member 2

Dear Acorn: When one's own particular interest seems to be unusually specialised it is easy to assume that there is no-one else in the world who shares it, so it was really very exciting to read in this month's Forum about Acorn. On the subject of keeping the glans uncovered, I doubt if anyone will have devoted more time and effort to investigating the possibilities. Maybe I'm not alone in this either.

E.S. – Salisbury

Skin

Let glans and clit be bare
Exposed to the fresh air

Remove redundant skin
Enhance the slipping in Hygiene and manly pride

Together will abide

And satisfaction hit
The girls who show their clit

The clean and pretty slot
Will always be 'red hot'

So add to staying power
And let orgasms flower

Exposed to the fresh air
Let clit and glans be bare.

A.W. – Sussex

Interests And Fantasies

Dear Acorn Group: I was most interested in your letter in the February issue of Forum. I am basically heterosexual, but have lately got more and more interested in your subject. I have no particular interest in men as such, but a great deal of interest in penises. I don't know if this is common, but there it is. Through Forum I have met one or two people: one was revoltingly dirty, one was enormously fat and had a tiny organ, and the last was fine but circumcised.

This brings me to the subject of circumcised vs uncircumcised penises. To me a roundhead looks like a very bald man, and is extremely boring. On the other hand, a cavalier has so many aspects, depending on its mood, especially if the foreskin is a good length: shrivelled when cold, graceful when normal, beautiful if semi-stiff, and really virile when fully erect. When uncircumcised it is really graceful and elegant. I have not had much experience of others, but mine, though I don't want to boast, has been described as beautiful. It is no more than average (about  $5\frac{1}{2}$ "). I have a fairly long but not tight foreskin which will still cover the whole acorn when stiff, if I want. I keep the glans covered most of the time.

As to fantasies, my favourite includes both sexes. I am doing a 69 with a woman, myself underneath licking her clitoris and she over me with me in her mouth. A man then kneels behind her and starts fucking her dog-fashion. Just before he comes he takes his prick out of her cunt, rams it into my mouth and shoots his load down my throat. It remains to be seen if this is physically possible, but I'd like to try it. I am sorry your group's main activity is simply to publish a newsletter. It will be read, I am sure, with interest, but by a lot of isolated people who will probably wank over it. Is that all there is to life? Could we not have a get-together? I know there is the danger of AIDS and other infections, but anyone who joins could first go and get checked out by his nearest relevant clinic.

Yours sincerely,

P.B. – London

[Thanks for your letter. Look earlier in this issue for details of a group meeting in Weston-super-Mare. Clinics are fairly fussy about who they test for AIDS, but Forum rules ensure caution but permit non penetrative sex. — T.A.]

Circumcision Of Newborn Boys Cuts Kidney Infections By 90%

Based on The Independent, 16.3.1989, p.3, reporting an article by Jan Wunberg et al in *The Lancet

The rate of infections of the urinary tract of baby boys is reduced by 90% if they are circumcised. When a baby boy is born in hospital, hostile bacteria may colonise the foreskin. The bacteria may then spread from the foreskin up the urethra (the urinary tube) to the kidneys, where they may cause serious infections. In the US, neonatal circumcision prevents some 20,000 cases of urinary tract infection per year. In the face of this evidence the American Academy of Pediatrics is under pressure to revise a statement it made in 1975 that there are no medical benefits to be gained from routine circumcision. A result of this has been a sharp fall in circumcision rates in the US from about 90% to nearer 50%. A Swedish team of doctors say that soon there may be pressure for a programme of circumcision of babies in Europe where, until now, circumcision has been rare except for religious reasons and among certain of the British upper classes. As is well known, the queue for kidney treatment in Britain is a very long one. If patients are fortunate, they obtain a kidney transplant, with all the attendant risks of major surgery and the possibility of immunological rejection of the transplant. Otherwise for the rest of their (shortened) lives they face the uncomfortable and very time-consuming process, perhaps twice per week, of renal dialysis.

Dr Jan Wunberg and colleagues from the Karolinska Institute in Stockholm argue, as an alternative to circumcision, that a baby should be deliberately infected with bowel bacteria from his mother, against which, they argue, he should have passive immunity received while in the womb. This argument is based on an old experiment, from the days before antibiotics, when babies were said to be protected from serious infections of the umbilicus (belly-button) if they were deliberately infected with benign bacteria. From this they argue that 'Attempts to manipulate the faecal flora might in the long run be a more physiological approach than to remove the prepuce from all newborn boys'. Thus Swedish opponents of circumcision, rather than accept American evidence of the value of circumcision, are advocating deliberate infection of newborn boys from the shit of their mothers.

Yoga And The Size Of The Flaccid Penis

Dear Acorn Group: At times my penis shrivels down to the size of almost an acorn (never mind it being the latin for just the glans). As I like nude beaches, I find this a little embarrassing. One dodge is to pretend that my penis is very sensitive to the sun and rub it frequently with sun tan cream to restore vitality – the rubbing, I mean, not the cream. I've found no cream, even a so-called 'Erection Cream', has any effect.

I have a foreskin and I prefer to keep the glans covered for most of the time. If it is uncovered, it rubs against underpants, which is mildly exciting for a while, but then becomes physically irritating. I find that a pleasant sensation is to spray the uncovered glans with a hand shower-unit turned full on, and I often achieve an erection this way (it turns me full on!)

A few years ago I tried the Chartham Method for penis enlargement: exercises, massage, and the vacuum tube. Just recently I found a copy of Dr Brian Richards' book The Penis, in which he describes the Method and typical results.

I managed an increase in length of a mere  $\frac{1}{4}$ " compared with a typical one inch, and this came in the first fortnight, not after four weeks as Dr Richards describes. I did notice an increase in girth, however, and my wife felt the difference, with her hand in the first instance. But after about 12 weeks I noticed a bit of a discharge from the 'pee-hole'. It was rather smelly, so I stopped the course, pleased with the extra thickness and hardness but disappointed by the hardly measurable increase in length. There was no difference in size when flaccid, compared with the start of the course. What results have others had?

It is supposed to be possible using Yoga to train yourself to control the normally involuntary muscles which control blood supply to the penis. Can anyone give me any information or references to writing about this?

M.M.G. – N. Yorks.

Observations

Dear Tony: Thank you for enrolling me as a member of Acorn. To one who has had an insatiable interest in the penis since I discovered at the age of 5<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> that I was 'different' from my cousins, the dialogue on circumcision was just what I was hoping to read. As I rather suspected, the whole question of Cavalier vs Roundhead boils down to a very personal matter depending on experience. Hence I find myself among those who consider it entirely wrong to circumcise at birth, as I was. Boys should be left to decide for themselves in later life. I see, too, that opinions differ sharply between the ladies as to whether the bare or covered glans gives them the greatest pleasure in intercourse.

In issue 1/89 of the newsletter you ask for statistics along the lines of Nacton's survey. While I have no longer any real opportunity for observation, I had a spell of about a year working in London some ten years ago. On my way to work I usually called in at a 'Gents' which was very busy at that time of day. The urinals afforded some good views but it could be misleading to attempt to classify the penises in the way you suggest because of the many variables inherent in this situation. For example many obviously pulled their penis forward when peeing so that the shaft formed a short foreskin, giving the impression of a cavalier, whereas it was probably really a roundhead. All I can safely say is that, of the 300 or more I saw over that period, there were very few with elephant trunks and about 75% were roundheads.

The cubicles, which had peep-holes in the partitions, were very much more rewarding. There was a problem finding one vacant, so I was not able to take as much advantage of the potential as I would have liked. However, I reckon that I saw the intimate detail of at least 30 pricks. There was a common pattern among those who did not block the holes. They toyed with their prick to attract attention and then, satisfied that they were being watched, worked up to full erection which they proudly showed off before beginning to masturbate. Most went on to orgasm so that I had every chance to witness the full sequence. These encounters were completely impersonal and never once was there any suggestion of face-to-face meeting. But a few expected me to reciprocate for their benefit.

Of the 30 or so, I was very surprised and disappointed that 80% were roundheads. Of the 6 cavaliers, two had 'elephant trunk' foreskins which gave a slight overhang even when erect, and the rest shorter ones which just showed the tip of the glans. There was little variation in penis size: most were an average 6"; a few smaller, at 5.5", and I never saw any which could be called 'well-endowed'. All the roundheads had been very cleanly circumcised, with all traces of foreskin removed. The shaft skin on the cavaliers appeared to be much looser and bunched-up over the glans on the outward stroke of the wanking. Generally the glans was sharply defined even when flaccid, but a few were wrinkled except when the penis was very hard. The cavaliers with shortish foreskins had knobs which were redder in appearance and moist enough to glisten. Neither of those with elephant trunks would (or could?) strip them back further than to just expose the very tip, which in both cases was paler and very moist.

All the roundheads wanked using one hand around the shaft well behind the glans. The cavaliers kept their foreskins up all the time and rubbed with their thumb over the glans. There was little difference in the time required to reach orgasm in either group. The amount of spunk varied quite a bit, from a few drips to three or four really good jets. It was impossible to determine the ages but this could have been a factor. All were white. I noticed a few very interesting variations:

1. several of the roundheads had shaved their bush
2. two of the roundheads ceased rubbing once they had triggered the orgasm: I have tried this but the result is disastrous!
3. one of the roundheads seemed to have a two-part orgasm; he shot just two jets of a nearly clear fluid, followed 15-20 seconds later by a normal ejaculate.
4. one of the cavaliers pinched the end of his elephant trunk so that the spunk was contained within the resulting 'condom'.

I hope my recollections may be of some interest. I did not keep notes, so what I have related cannot be called a scientific survey.

V. – Shropshire

Advertisement

Circumcision: an Ethnomedical Study, by A. Thomas. Are you fascinated by the different surgical techniques of circumcision and their varied results, by personal accounts of the effects, and by the tribal initiations using circumcision as the initiation test in Africa, Australia and the Pacific? Have you ever wondered whether circumcision is for you or for your son? Then this book will answer more questions than you ever thought of asking. This is the second edition, revised and expanded to over 200 pages, extensively illustrated with drawings, pictures and statistical tables. Send £20 cheque or postal order to Tony Acorn, addressed as for Acorn replies, to cover cost plus secure packaging and postage.

ACORN

1989 Issue No 4
(Formerly Issue L)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Puerile Attitudes To Male Sexuality	J.W.	Page 3
Physiotherapy	W.M.	Page 4
Against Infant Circumcision	R.B.W.	Page 5
Pleased With A Dorsal Slit	I.M.	Page 6
Improver Brings No Improvement	Fred	Page 7
Tight Foreskin	Steve J.	Page 8
Making Comparisons	J.R.	Page 10
Circumcised At 20	S.W.	Page 11
Hygiene	E.R.	Page 13
How To Keep Your Foreskin Back	A.R.	Page 14
Isle Of Man Man	I.K.	Page 14
Some Survey Results	I.G.	Page 15
Contacts		Page 15

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to another issue of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in circumcision, foreskins and everything phallic: the penis, piercing and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. Of course the owner and/or his partner should be the judge of what is 'best'!

This issue is the fourth, planned for publication in mid-May, and issue 5 is due in late June/early July. It is intended to publish an issue about every 6 weeks, but the gap over the summer may be longer, until mid-September for Issue 6.

Acorn: Why the name? The Latin for acorn is glans, which both cavaliers and roundheads have in common. Those who know this meaning know what we are about. But Acorn makes a convenient name because it is sufficiently anonymous: it could also apply to people interested in anything from computers to naval history. We are a Group recognised by the Forum Society (which also recognises a range of encounter and other Groups), and they are kind enough to forward mail for us. There is also an Acorn Group in the USA (from whom we have borrowed the name), but the only connection otherwise is in our shared interests.

Subscriptions: Whether you joined in January or at any time later in the year, your £10 annual subscription pays for all the issues, including back copies, published in 1989. 1988 back copies (about 100 pages) are available for £5. This makes it fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, preferably blank: receipt will be acknowledged. They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Contributions: The response to starting the Newsletter in 1988 was far greater than expected. This is your newsletter, and its success depends very much on your contributions, so please keep sending your ideas, anecdotes, comments, information, observations and stories. We will include fantasy as well as factual contributions, provided only that the contributions relate to our broad theme. Readers must use their own judgement to decide which is fact and which is fantasy. We'll also include contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit). If contributions come in as they did in 1988, we hope again to manage 8 issues of 12 pages in 1989.

Information: It must be clearly understood that any information given out, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes any recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any such information does so at their own risk, and must rely on their own judgement in doing so.

Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or to give them advice specific to their condition. The membership of Acorn includes doctors who have said they are willing to help other members.

A copy of the list of approved (and annually reviewed) Jewish circumcisers (mohelim) is available from The Initiation Society or from the Editor of Acorn. Most only operate in a religious context, and only on infants, but some are additionally qualified and may be willing to help adolescents or adults in non-religious circumstances.

It is planned to contact Islamic circumcisers with a questionnaire, the results of which (if significant) will be compiled and made available. If any member can help with this survey by sending in the addresses of mosques in their area, please do so: they are sometimes listed in the phone book, or are available from local public libraries or (tourist) information offices.

Other Members may be contacted by sending your letter to Acorn and asking for it to be sent on to the person named. Thus your address will only be disclosed to the person you write to, and it is their decision whether to reply or not.

Confidentiality: Contributions will be identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Letters may be forwarded anonymously if you wish. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with these guarantees in mind.

T.A.

Puerile Attitudes To Male Sexuality

Dear Acorn: I was interested to read about your group in Forum. Modern religions have brainwashed us into such warped attitudes to sex that I wonder if your newsletter might not turn out to be 'tacky' and puerile, but if anyone can rescue men's most powerful symbol from nursery language, schoolboy sniggering, adult furtiveness and 'puritan' spite, they will do us all a favour. The obvious way to resolve any doubts is to subscribe: please send me your newsletter for a year.

J.W. – Swaffham

[Dear J.W.: Thank you for having the courage of your curiosity. I hope you like the contents, and will write in to explain your views more fully. — T.A.]

Physiotherapy

Some thirty years ago, when I was a young teenager, I sustained a football injury, colliding with an opposing player and severely bruising the top of my left thigh. The school doctor prescribed a course of six therapy treatments.

The physiotherapist was a young, attractive Indian woman, who I surmised was shortly to qualify. She was conscientious and ever mindful that I was in considerable discomfort. The treatments necessitated my removing my trousers and underpants while she administered alternate treatments of heat and light massage. At first she spoke little, and only to ask me how I felt the treatment was progressing.

By the time of the fifth treatment the injury had improved considerably. I found her light touch erotic, and quite suddenly found that I had an erection. I remember being embarrassed and wondering if I should comment on the situation, and if so, what to say. But then she said: 'You have a healthy skin', and lent over and pulled my foreskin back. I later found out that she meant to say that I had a long foreskin.

My embarrassment was instantly replaced by curiosity as the treatment became much more relaxed and informal. It was soon clear that she much enjoyed manipulating and playing with my foreskin, pulling it right forward, then back, and then feeling my frenulum. She became much more talkative, telling me that she came from a tribe in North India on the borders with Nepal. She told me that the boys there were born with short foreskins, so that by adolescence the glans was permanently exposed. In childhood the foreskin was either lightly tattooed or pierced to indicate the individual's status in the tribe. Never before had she seen anyone with such a long foreskin, and asked if this was usual in England. I told her that my foreskin was probably longer than average, but that the length did vary considerably from one individual to another. She appeared never to have heard of circumcision and thought it most odd and unfortunate for anyone to have an operation like that. She continued to fondle my foreskin and penis, and soon I climaxed, covering her hand with semen, at which she giggled with delight.

I was naturally looking forward to the final treatment the following week, and kept wondering what to expect. After a brief examination and treatment of my thigh, she was soon eying my penis, and the erection which grew as she did so. Again my foreskin intrigued her, and she found it difficult to keep her hands off it. Quite suddenly she asked me to stand up. For a brief moment she turned away to unbutton her white coat and lift her dress to reveal that she was wearing no knickers. Without further ado, and saying nothing, she mounted my rampant erection, which soon disappeared into her moist pussy. She clasped her arms around my neck, while my arms supported her bottom. When the tip of my penis felt her cervix I thought she would knock me over. Her arms were tight around my shoulders and she buried her face in my neck. At the moment I climaxed, I sensed a further shudder down her slender body. As she felt my erection beginning to lose its vigour, her grip on me tightened: she was having repeated orgasms. I had never experienced anything so erotically ecstatic. But then her grip loosened, she eased herself back onto the floor, and we stood looking at each other in exhaustion. What an introduction to the delights of sexual intercourse! What a physiotherapist!

W.M. – Kingston

Against Infant Circumcision

I must congratulate Ivan Goodhart on his send-up of the circumcision scene entitled 'Have I the right?' in Issue 2/89. At first I was incredulous when I thought he was seriously advocating that, because some very few neurotics might have difficulty in finding a doctor daft enough to entertain their whim in the absence of a medical reason, that because the occasional low-grade lad neglects to wash under his foreskin, that because a father has to take decisions on his son's behalf, he should therefore have the right to mutilate him, and that all boys should be circumcised at birth. Hello, I thought, we have a right ayatollah here. But then I realised that this sort of bigotry and arrogance, in his absolute conviction in the rightness of his cause, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary, just can't be for real.

As one whose anguish at having his sex-life ruined by the psychological and physical effects of circumcision in infancy to satisfy someone else's obsession has gone on record, I do tend to be appalled by the lip-smacking relish with which some people contemplate a mutilating operation which they will probably never have the bottle to undergo – but I've no quarrel with them if it is only themselves they have in mind. Those who advocate the wholesale mutilation of infants too young to protest, to satisfy some perverted inner craving, are guilty of unconsidered barbarity and a total dereliction of another person's human rights.

R.B.W. – Bedford

[Dear R.B.W.: How sad that you feel so threatened by Ivan Goodhart's carefully argued viewpoint, and that you should have found it so difficult to come to terms with what must have been a fact of all your own life, especially as your perception of your own problem seems to have prevented you from experiencing the pleasures and worries of trying to make the best decisions for children of your own. Those of us who have tried to do so, knowing the great advantages of circumcision ourselves and wishing to ensure them for our boys have encountered much opposition and elusiveness from the medical profession. This is the reason that Acorn exists: to make available information and advice and to give space to the arguments on either side from which conscientious parents can draw, and from which individuals who have made their own decision about the value of circumcision can benefit. So that we can better understand what has given rise to your own sense of bitterness about being a roundhead, I hope that you will write in again with an account of when and how you discovered that you were circumcised and how this came to have such traumatic significance for you. — T.A.]

Pleased With A Dorsal Slit

I wish I could thank the doctor who circumcised me when I was about 5 days old, but logic tells me that he is probably long-since dead. In my opinion he did an excellent job. It would appear that the foreskin was cut just once, along the top side. This means that there is loose skin on the underside of my penis which is full of sensitive nerve-endings and is very useful as I can rub it against the frenulum when masturbating. No extra lubrication is necessary, as in the case of men who have had most or all of the foreskin cut away. I have observed that the glans of my erect penis is much larger than average. I have also noted that this is the case for men who have been circumcised in infancy. Is this the exception, or the rule?

As far as adults are concerned, circumcision could be regarded as a form of cosmetic surgery. I have often wondered why people are not shown pictures illustrating the various ways in which circumcision can be done and the resulting appearance of the penis afterwards. As I have not encountered many men with my form of circumcision, if any reader wished to create such a book, I would volunteer myself for photography. Patients are shown the types of nose they can have after an operation: why should another part of the body be treated any differently?

According to statistics I read somewhere, I am one in ten thousand. At the age of 14, I discovered that by bending over I could easily put my penis in my mouth. This made an interesting variation when it came to masturbation. It increased my knowledge of the anatomy of my penis and taught me to overcome the problems encountered when indulging in 'souxante-neuf' (69). I am sure that members of the Acorn Group are already aware, but it is not common knowledge that in such a position it requires dexterity of the tongue and the ability to keep the teeth out of the way in order to achieve the maximum sensuous results. Ideally fellatio should be carried out when the frenulum side of the penis is against the tongue.

Having visited numerous saunas, nudist camps and beaches in England and Europe, I have observed that among men under 40, circumcision is becoming rarer. This is a pity, as I think that an exposed glans is one of the more pleasurable sights on a naked male body.

The practice of drawing back the foreskin is not so common amongst Germans, and they form the large majority of nudists. Perhaps a reader could satisfy my curiosity on one point. While visiting a nudist camp in Corsica, I met a very nice couple (man and wife). I happened to notice that whenever I saw them on the beach, the man's foreskin covered his glans, but as soon as he saw me he drew it back. This happened on a daily basis. Was there some significance? Was he trying to tell me something? I have asked several people, but so far no-one has been able even to hazard a guess. I can report that amongst all the Continental men, there are more circumcisions in Switzerland than in any other country.

One unfortunate difference between Englishmen and men on the Continent is cleanliness. I refer specifically to uncircumcised men. The English leave a lot of cleanliness to be desired. I have had the pleasure of having quite a variety of cocks in my mouth, but have learned to make a thorough inspection of both appearance and smell before treating an Englishman, which is one reason why I am very partial to a circumcised penis. Some nudist camps have open bathroom/showers (mixed), and I have observed many men pull the foreskin back and clean the glans as part of their daily washing procedure, but this is rarer among the English.

I.M. – Crawley

[Dear I.M.: The man you met in Corsica may have shared your preference for the appearance of a bare glans, but may also have been worried about the risk of sunburn in the Corsican heat – or he may have been hoping that you would make the next move. — T.A.]

Improver Brings No Improvement

Four or five years ago, having seen an advertisement, I thought that my vital statistics could perhaps do with improvement, so I sent for a penis developer. Oh, yes, it worked! For a while, to see one's member enlarge inside the plastic tube was quite fascinating. It was also rather uncomfortable having it drawn out in all directions.

After each session, however, His Nibs reverted to his normal humble self within an hour or so. The user is told to keep up the treatment for a while, which I did: a year at least. In the end I gave up, a sadder and wiser man, and the developer went. Not a millimetre's difference anywhere. Trying was fun, but really it was a waste of effort and money. Indeed, I blame the developer for a loss of much sensitivity which I have not since recovered, probably as a result of damage to blood vessels or nerve endings.

Fred – Barnet

Tight Foreskin

This talk of therapeutic foreskin stretching under anaesthetic is all very well, but is it necessary? Anyone who has read the first chapter of Walter's Erotic Memoirs will see how quickly and effectively a bit of energetic sexual activity at puberty can relieve a tight foreskin. I found the same thing. I was blessed (cursed?) with a prodigiously long foreskin which defied all attempts on my part to retract it. A classmate with a similar condition had come to the attention of the district nurse, who had the reputation of being a rapacious foreskin collector. I had been disturbed to watch him suffer after he was given the chop, and to see his poor little cock when he showed it to me the next day – though within ten days he was wanking again, and proudly showing off how far he could pee. Unlike him, at the age of 13 I had still not set eyes on my knob, although I wasn't particularly worried as I'd never had any trouble with it.

Then one Monday during a football game I got a terrible crack on the hip: it hurt like hell and gave me a 'dead leg'. A woman who lived nearby was watching and saw the incident took me home for first aid and a cup of tea. She helped me off with my muddy football shorts, and, while I stood in front of her in my underpants, she sat on a stool and studied the bruise. She bent my injured leg, putting my foot on the stool between her legs, told me to put my hands on her shoulders to steady myself, and started vigorously massaging my hip bring the life back. At once I became aware of my cock shaking and leaping about inside my pants. Her large breasts were doing the same thing under her blouse and, most exciting of all, her wrap-around skirt fell away on either side to reveal her thighs and the dark bulge at the front of her skimpy knickers, just inches from my toes.

To my embarrassment I felt the front of my pants lift as I got the inevitable erection. Then, to my abject horror, it suddenly burst through the slit in my pants. There it was, in a state of disgraceful rigidity, wagging about in front of her face. She flicked it with her finger and then burst into peals of laughter; but seeing my stricken look, she did her best to soothe me. "It's not your fault," she said. "I suppose it's mine, for showing my knickers" (though she did nothing to hide them). "Anyway, that's the nicest willy I've seen for years", and, with that, she took hold of it and examined it carefully.

By now my erection was almost painfully tight, and my cock looked like a long white sausage. Through the taut foreskin the knob was sharply defined and was visibly darker in hue, while the foreskin hung from the end in a long, narrow tassel with a pink bud at the end. She commented on how long it was, and asked, "Do you have trouble pulling it back?" I just shook my head, speechless with my own excitement and with her familiarity, mentioning such a thing. "I wonder?", she said, and holding it firmly, she started to slide the skin back. But she never even succeeded in uncovering the eye. "Uh O", she said, "I thought it was a bit tight". She then started asking whether I had been examined by the school doctor, whilst gently sliding the skin forward and back again as far as it would go. I revealed my fear that I might have to submit to the same operation as my school friend. "Nonsense", she said. "No one needs be circumcised. We'll soon put it right."

With that she started stretching the tight opening by repeatedly pulling the foreskin forward and then energetically pushing it back again as far as it would go. Under this repeated pressure, the elastic skin gave a little, and eventually the pee-hole came into view. But at that moment the delicious sensations caused by her hand movements overwhelmed me, causing my first ever orgasm, and I splattered the front of her blouse with my emission. Before I could be embarrassed by this, she said "don't worry about that. The important thing is to get your skin loosened up. We'll need to stretch it a bit more than that, so come back tomorrow. If you leave it too long it'll only tighten up again."

I went back the following day after school. Once we were in the bathroom, she extracted my penis from my flies and again stretched my foreskin back and forth over my erection, this time revealing a little more of my knob. Inevitably the lascivious handling of my sensitive penis caused me once more to swoon with delight. This time she caught my emission deftly in the wash-basin. But instead of letting me tuck my subsiding willy away in my trousers and sending me off, she picked up a knitting needle with a small knob at the end, inserted this under my foreskin, and pushed it back as far as the rim, then moved it first to the left and then to the right. She could not move it far before it stopped, and I cried out. "Looks as though you have got a bit of a problem with adhesions there", she said, taking out the knitting needle, which was covered with a whitish substance. "And a smegma problem", as she rinsed it off under the tap. Then she told me to try and pee into the basin. After a few moments I began to do so, and as I did, she pinched the tip of my foreskin tightly. The mounting pressure of the urine caused it to swell up, until even her firm grip had to give way and the urine flowed into the basin with a jet like a fire hydrant. "That's my boy", she said, as she allowed me to tuck my willy away, feeling like a piece of wet string. "Same time tomorrow."

My visits continued every afternoon for the rest of the week, and followed the same pattern. Eventually the last of the adhesions was freed, whereupon the whole foreskin ballooned out like a big wobbling golf-ball, with every vein visible. Commenting, "success at last", she let it go, but instead of letting me put it away afterwards, she pushed the foreskin back. This time it went on, right back behind the glans rim and on down my shaft to form a bunch of ruched skin in front of my balls. "There you are. The district nurse can't touch you now – but make sure you wash it every day and you'll find the girls won't be able to resist it! But you had better come back again on Monday after football."

This time, when I eagerly hefted my erection out in front of her, the tip was red. I pulled back the foreskin to show her proudly what we had achieved together while my tumescence continued to mount. Her call of “careful” came too late: when I tried to pull it forward again, I could not get it back over the rim. “Never mind. I’ll show you what to do”, she said, clasping her fingers around my red and throbbing cock. With a weekend’s abstinence, it wasn’t long before I climaxed, despite the unfamiliar and supersensitive feel of my bare glans. Then she opposed her thumbs and used them to squeeze my glans between them. After a few minutes my erection subsided and the foreskin slid forward to its accustomed place. “You’ll have to be careful of that, and keep on stretching the opening, or you may get it caught there”, she said.

Thanks to the efforts of this kind and knowledgeable lady, I find myself the proud possessor of a fully mobile and supple foreskin which is a delight to all the girls who have handled it, and of course to me. I have kept up the habit of ballooning my foreskin quite frequently when I pee. I find it produces a pleasant sensation of tension and helps to keep the smegma to a minimum. Is this habit widespread, and is its value as a means of reducing adhesions generally recognised, or was it just a flash of inspiration on the part of my lady friend? I’ve never seen the subject mentioned before, but there must be others beside me who have experienced it: let’s hear from them!

I sometimes wonder if it was really necessary for me to keep going back to the lady for all the rest of the school year for further stretching, and if she really needed to pull me to orgasm each time. But I didn’t complain!

Steve J. – London SW10

Making Comparisons

In issue 3/89, V (Shropshire) certainly seems to have done his homework, or rather his fieldwork, on the matter of cavaliers and roundheads. I had not realised there were such opportunities for regular viewing of others wanking, and without any awkward personal contact. His findings about the relative numbers of cavaliers and roundheads, however, I find completely contrary to my own experience.

Like many of your readers, I am sure, I have been fascinated by other’s private parts for as long as I can remember. At Grammar School during the 60s the showers and changing rooms gave ample opportunity to satisfy one’s curiosity and, I suppose, enjoy a little exhibitionism oneself.

I think it was in the second year, aged 12 to 13, that I was particularly keen on ‘cockspotting’. I would attempt to observe every other boy in my class and year in the nude and to gauge what sort of cock he had. At that age there was a very wide variation in development and characteristics to observe. Some were still little boys and others were definitely young men.

Every cock was different: Roundhead/Cavalier? Knob partly exposed? Short/Long? Thin/thick? Was the knob pronounced? Pubic hair: how much, and what colour? Were the balls conspicuous? A special treat, of course, was when perhaps a few Sixth Formers would be showering and you could watch their long cocks flop and sway as they walked. I wasn't the only one who showed an interest in that.

I took down one of those long school photographs I have. Twenty years on, I can look at the faces and remember the cocks of 53 of the faces on the photo. Ten of them were roundheads. I wonder whether being a roundhead himself, our correspondent made sufficient allowance for the fact that for many of us cavaliers our foreskin retracts naturally as soon as we start to become erect. I sometimes observe myself in a mirror and watch the knob gradually revealing itself fully as my cock stiffens and grows.

Around that age I was always ready for any fun and games with anyone who was interested, either in a quiet corner at school or at Scout Camp. I have very fond memories of those times. Are there any readers who would be interested in swapping accounts of exciting experiences at that age?

J.R. – Telford

Circumcised At 20

Dear Tony: Many thanks for my membership in Acorn. I have been looking for a group in which I could join in a discussion about circumcision and related issues with informed, reasonable people. I am 27, married for three years to an American, and am living in the Boston area until we move to Britain, hopefully within the next 12 months. I discovered your group through the entry in Tuppy Owens' 1989 Sex Maniac's Diary.

Shortly after I was born my parents took me to the doctor and asked whether circumcision was advisable. To their disappointment (I think), they were told that it was no longer considered necessary so I was brought up in a state 'au naturel' with a foreskin that fully covered my glans, although there was never more than an eighth of an inch or so of overhanging skin. I was never aware that other males were equipped significantly differently: in school I did not notice that anyone was different to the overwhelmingly foreskinned majority. Looking back, if anyone was circumcised, he was very discreet, maybe through awkward feelings of not being the same as the rest of us.

I discovered masturbation when I was 14 and over the next few years I perfected the art of gently rubbing the prepuce backwards and forwards for the best orgasm possible.

The earliest recollection I have of the mention of circumcision was when Jimmy Young had it as a topic of interest on the 10am-1pm slot on Radio 2, in about 1975 or 1976. About the same time it was discovered at school that someone in the class a year ahead of me had been circumcised, which was used as joke/embarrassment material but the last laugh turned out to be on the joker, as the boy concerned suddenly found that the girls were more interested in him.

Throughout my teen years I gradually found out more and more, expanding particularly in February 1981 when I read an article by Keith Gordon in Knave vol 13 no 2. It was as a result of this that I first seriously considered having myself trimmed. I didn't do anything for over a year: the problem was finding a doctor willing and able to perform the operation, and I certainly wasn't going to approach the family GP. Eventually I wrote to Keith Gordon somewhere in Cumbria, and I also wrote to Forum. Both advised me of the name and address of a Harley Street physician, so in November 1982 I finally got up the courage and made an appointment. He sent me a prescription for anti-erection pills, so the stitches wouldn't pull out in the early days after the operation. On Saturday 20th November 1982 I masturbated with a foreskin for the last time, and took the first of the pills. The following Friday at noon I arrived in Harley Street. I was extremely nervous, as I am sure many other Acorn members may have been, but the doctor was very matter-of-fact and he got on with it.

The only discomfort was when he injected the local anaesthetic each side of the base of my penis. He asked me whether my penis was its normal size and proceeded to draw a line around it. This was followed (I wasn't watching) by the odd sensation of scissors cutting away at me. Suddenly it was over, and I was stitched and bandaged. It took a total of half an hour. I dressed, noting his advice that tight underwear (necessary on this occasion to keep everything in place) could be harmful to fertility. I then paid the £50 and left.

The first 6 hours were a little messy as I bled a little more than I expected, but nothing serious. I faithfully kept myself clean and used the sterile bandage the doctor had given me. This lasted 4 to 5 days, and the stitches started to fall out after about a week. Masturbation was possible a few days later, 10-12 days after the operation.

On balance I was very pleased with the outcome. I would never again have to bother about smegma, which had never been a serious problem but always seemed to be there unless I was freshly bathed or showered.

The appearance was much neater and cleaner-looking. As aesthetics were a prime motivating factor, this was important to me. And it satisfied a long-term curiosity. There were draw-backs of course: I had to modify my masturbation technique to rubbing the shaft gently, and only just touching the glans as I did so. Over a period of time I found that I tended to masturbate slightly less, but the orgasms were more intense. When urinating I found it necessary to learn the technique of shaking the drips off, instead of pushing the foreskin back and forward to wring it out.

Some of your correspondents seem to have been immediately aware of the sensitivity of a newly bared glans rubbing against underwear. I must say that this didn't happen to me: it didn't feel significantly different. I didn't get raging erections through friction with the cotton, although over the six and a half years since, there has been some loss of sensitivity.

My main regret is that I didn't have sex with a woman before I was circumcised. Looking back I wish I had, just so that I could contrast the two states even better. The only outlets I had had at that time were normal wanking or rare mutual masturbation sessions with my younger brother through my mid-teens.

I also wish that I had found out more about the various techniques of circumcision before the operation. The doctor removed sufficient skin so that I can now only pull the skin on the shaft far enough forward to partially cover the glans, and this is when I'm flaccid. If I had known, I would have asked him to remove as much as safely possible. Indeed, I want to know more about a revision or a re-circumcision operation. Has anyone had a revision? I'd like to correspond with such a person, and maybe see photos before and after. And when I return to Britain I'd like to attend one or more of Acorn's meetings to discuss the matter further.

S.W. – Boston (USA)

[Dear S.W.: It sounds like Dr Newell who did your circumcision. He used to prescribe stilboestrol to prevent erections, but others do not think it necessary. He retired 4-5 years ago, and so did Keith Gordon more recently. It would be interesting to hear why you want the revision operation which you mention. But be reassured: tightening up is probably even simpler than an initial circumcision. There are at least two medics in London doing revision operations, and one Acorn member has been tightened up by each in turn. One charges in the region of £100 and the other about £200. I look forward to hearing more from you, perhaps on masturbation methods before and after, your impressions of the incidence of circumcision in the USA compared with Britain, and women's attitudes. I regret not hearing the Jimmy Young show you mention: do other members remember it? — T.A.]

Hygiene

Dear Acorn Group: I would like to join. As a small comment, I would like to suggest that there are in many families still remnants of the Victorian attitude to children summed up in the comment: "Don't touch yourself 'down there'." Superstitions take several generations to die out. If a child, boy or girl, says "My big toe hurts", the nearest adult will say "Show me your foot". But if a small boy says "My penis (or willy, or cock or whatever) is sore", does he receive the same sensible reply in all families? No. The conclusion is that washing the penis is probably much less thorough or frequent than washing the feet (and, by the smell in some changing rooms, that is not very frequent either). Perhaps that is why circumcision used to be recommended. Now that it is rare in Britain, what price hygiene?

E.R. – London NW10

How To Keep Your Foreskin Back

I was very interested to read the letter from E.S. in Acorn 3/89 concerning the possibility of keeping the glans uncovered. I too have made many attempts to do this from time to time. It is a most enjoyable feeling and gives those of us with foreskins the best of both worlds. The method which works best for me is to use a piece of foam rubber (as used for packaging/padding) about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " (1cm) thick, cut to a disc about 3" (7.5cm) diameter, with two  $\frac{3}{4}$ " slits cut at right angles in the centre. Then simply pull back the foreskin and push the glans through the slits so that the foam rests behind the glans rim, forming a collar to hold the foreskin back. So that the foam stays in place, the slits should be only just long enough to let the glans through when the penis is flaccid. The foam expands enough to allow the penis any degree of tumescence from flaccid to rock hard without any discomfort. I find this an effective, simple, cheap and comfortable way to keep the glans uncovered when I want.

A.R. – Hampshire

Isle Of Man Man

Dear Tony Acorn, Like so many others, I must congratulate you on the great work you have done with the Newsletters. I have been away since early December, but now enclose a cheque to continue my membership. When I can get a little quiet and privacy I derive much pleasure in re-reading the 1988 newsletters and with more time would write for a book. The 8/88 Issue idea of a survey is good, but probably difficult to achieve widely. I suggest each member provides his own data. Mine are: Size: av. Circumcised: yes. Shaft skin when erect: tight. Age 70, Christian, white.

I was never able to find out why I was circumcised. In my early 20s my mother commented that doctors had been against it, then changed their minds, so I was done at three years old with my elder brother. Later he told me: "Mother wanted you done, so I had to be done too." The ignorance among both cavaliers and roundheads amazes me: many who only have a broken frenulum think they are circumcised. Like one of your earlier correspondents, I like to know if friends and acquaintances are done or not, and it's surprising which ones are shy and which not. I am proud to be one of the roundheads and like to see and be seen.

I.K.

Some Survey Results

I think your idea for a foreskin survey is a great one. I am enclosing my results for January, all of them from a Health Club in North London: not very many, I'm afraid, as the club was closed for a lot of the time. I hope to do better next month.

Person no:	1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10
Size	av	we	av	av	av	av	av	we	av	av
Circumcised?	C	C	C	C	U	U	U	U	U	U
Glans cover	F0	F0	F0	F0	F12	F8	F10	F4	F10	F12
Opening	0	0	0	0	T	S	T	T	T	T
Age	47	19	24	28	34	34	17	22	34	24
Religion	C	J	?	?	?	?	C	C	?	C
Colour	W	W	W	BL	BR	BR	W	W	W	W

I.G. – BM Box 2252, London WC1N 3XX

Contacts

London And S.E.

Male, 49, circumcised, cheerful and sensitive, seeks masculine male (50+) for discussions of mutual interests and possibly friendship. Massage, nudity, travel, writing and bridge are just a few of my interests. Photograph and telephone number guarantees a reply.

I.D.M. – Sussex.

Leeds

I would be very interested in making contacts to further my Acorn interests. I have already collected some information on the subject, not least a wide range of 'rare' videos. I am 38, white, a company director, single, able to travel and accommodate. I am well endowed, and love anything connected with the penis.

D.P. – Adel, Leeds

ACORN

1989 Issue No 5
(Formerly Issue M)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Penis Survey	T.A.	Page 3
New Member	Dick S.	Page 4
My Ultimate Experience	R.H.	Page 4
Frenulum Modification	Iain	Page 6
Frenulum Problem	T.A.	Page 8
Medical Examinations	M.A.L.	Page 11
Literary Foreskins	R.B.W.	Page 14
Foreskin Stretching	D.N.C.	Page 16
Circumcision Rings	E.S.	Page 17
Balanitis	Bill	Page 18
Keeping The Foreskin Back	E.L.	Page 18
Feminine Attentions	H.R.	Page 19
Scottish Yearnings	L.J.	Page 20

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the June issue of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in 'cockspotting', circumcision, foreskins and everything phallic: the penis, piercing and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape', whatever that means to you. This issue is the fifth of 1989, planned for publication in June. It contains the usual interesting range of letters, with modifications of the frenulum as a recurring theme.

Past issues have gone out about every 6 weeks or maybe more frequently. But there will have to be a gap over the summer, maybe until mid-September for Issue 6. To compensate, this issue runs to 16 pages, 4 more than our usual 12. We'll catch up over the autumn, especially if you keep sending interesting contributions for inclusion. Some readers have commented on the rather cramped layout of past issues. Unfortunately there are technical difficulties in achieving a two-columns-per-page layout, but this issue has more spacious headings to items, which I hope will help.

Contributions: Please keep sending your ideas, anecdotes, comments, information, observations and stories, fantasy as well as fact, provided only that the contributions relate to the theme set out above. This issue includes a survey of Members' members: please respond, indicating clearly whether you are a cavalier or a roundhead. Replies will be analysed in a future issue. We'll also take contact requests (which may be edited if they become too long or too explicit).

Confidentiality: Contributions are usually identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Otherwise no name or address will be revealed to another member, but letters will be passed on if you wish to contact another member. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with these guarantees of confidentiality in mind.

Subscriptions: Whether you joined in January or later in the year, your £10 annual subscription pays for all the issues, including 1989 back copies. 1988 back copies (about 100 pages) are available for £5. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order payable to Acorn: receipt will be acknowledged (generally by supply of what you have requested). They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Information: Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or to give some specific advice. Acorn membership includes doctors who have said they are willing to help other members. However, it must be clearly understood that any information published, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes a recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any such information does so at their own risk, and must rely on their own judgement in doing so.

A copy of the list of approved (and annually reviewed) Jewish circumcisers (mohelim) is available from The Initiation Society. Most only operate in a religious context, and only on infants, but some are additionally qualified and may be willing to help adolescents or adults in non-religious circumstances.

We are contacting Islamic circumcisers with a questionnaire, the results of which (if significant) will be compiled and made available to members.

T.A.

Penis Survey

Dear B.B.: Many thanks for your letter. I am glad that you have found Acorn Newsletter interesting. Your suggestion of a penile survey is excellent and I have added a few questions to the ones you suggest. If all members co-operate, we should have a sample of almost 100. The usual confidentiality will apply. Members should, please, write in to Acorn with the following information:

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scar line from glans rim.
6. If uncircumcised, how much (10ths) of glans is covered, flaccid.
7. If uncircumcised, how much (10ths) of glans is covered, erect.
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight or loose.
9. When standing against a wall with erect penis, what is the distance between glans tip and the nearest part of your stomach?
10. Your height.
11. Your age.
12. Your identification (eg initials and place).

T.A.

New Member

Dear Acorn: I wish to be made a member and receive your regular newsletter etc. What a great idea: I have often thought that a movement dedicated to adoration of the penis would be a step in the right direction, and the guy(s) in charge must be really dedicated. My congratulations. Once I have seen the layout, I think I might have some fascinating items to offer.

To introduce myself: I am 46, bisexual, hairy with moustache and sideburns and light brown hair. I usually have my foreskin over the head when working or whatever, but any sexual reaction automatically makes the skin retract. I have only a medium sized cock with a movable foreskin, and love to masturbate in every way, sometimes with the skin back, but other times I draw it to a tight close and then right the way back. When I piss, I choose on the spur of the moment whether to have the skin forward or back: sometimes I slide it up and down whilst pissing. If you ever want to do a full survey of penis habits, I shall be happy to answer all questions. While waiting to hear from you I shall indulge in my favourite pastime...

Dick S. – Southport

[Dear Dick: Glad to have you aboard. Perhaps existing members would like to suggest the rituals in which a future new recruit should be 'made a member'. At the very least, he should supply a full set of the measurements requested in the penis survey, I think. — T.A.]

My Ultimate Experience

Dear Acorn: I am pleased to be able to contribute what I hope will also be of interest to other readers of your newsletter. I am particularly interested in the strength, volume and distance of ejaculation, and especially the intensity of the satisfaction it gives. I have also used penile exercises (muscle flexing, 'twitching', and 'weight-training' – walking around the house with a wet towel draped over the shaft) to enhance the state of my erection. Now, at the age of 38, I have a penis 5" long by 4" round when limp, and 7.75" long by 5.25" round when erect. I can enhance the latter dimensions slightly by constriction, as described below. I have practised a very satisfactory masturbation technique for a few years: abstinence, followed by prolonged manipulation. If I apply constriction either to the scrotum or to the base of the penis this has a prolonging effect which makes the eventual orgasm exceptionally satisfying. If it follows a long period of abstinence, the result is a powerful and copious ejaculation. The best constrictive device I have found is a lady's stocking, as there is some 'give' in it.

I hope that my ultimate experience is not too shocking to your readers. I must emphasise that I have never and will never indulge in this scene in Britain, but in Brazil, where it happened, such things are both perfectly legal and quite common. My partner in this adventure was female, looked incredibly lovely, was skilled in the arts of sex, and was only twelve years old! I must start by admitting that I have always been turned on by the idea of having sex with a girl of this age, so during a recent visit to Brazil I was determined to indulge myself in a way which would be unthinkable in Britain. I wanted to combine this with experiments in masturbatory techniques.

I began with a period of abstinence: about two weeks is the right length. During this time I tried to find the right girl: I love sheer beauty, and I needed time to find the best. Eventually I was introduced to a madam who kept a photo album of her girls with all their details: she had about twenty. I spent some time looking, and then chose a stunningly lovely little girl shown wearing a black leotard and described as: Betina, aged 12 (this had been altered twice, indicating the early age at which she had started on the job), white, blond, long-haired, 137cm tall, with a figure 77, 48, 76. I quickly converted these figures to the more familiar 4'6" tall and 30", 19", 29.5".

I soon found myself sitting naked on a bed in a suburban house in Sao Paulo, waiting while Betina splashed in the adjoining bathroom. When she entered the room I gulped in astonishment at her overpowering prettiness: her picture had not done her justice. She was a real flower-fairy of exquisite loveliness. She was quite naked except for a straggly bunch of narrow pink ribbon which fell down one side of her long golden hair. Her breasts were as small as two rosebuds, her legs long for her height and beautifully sculptured and slightly athletic. Only the faintest golden blush of soft down tinged her pubic mound. She came towards me and stood between my open thighs. I reached out to touch her, and as I spanned her waist with my trembling fingers I thought I would come at once, so great was my lust for this thin little beauty. I explained to her that to start with I wanted her to prolong my coming as much as possible. Only after I had come 'in the open' would we have full intercourse. There was no hurry, as I had booked her for the whole evening. As a start I got her to tie a stocking around the base of my shaft. Then I lay back against the bed-head with Betina sitting on my thighs so that she could wank me like a boy would his own prick. Despite her young years she was almost an expert, and within two minutes I was on the point of coming. I tugged on the two ends of the stocking and she ceased her manipulations for a few moments. When my feelings had subsided a little, I allowed her to carry on. Betina interrupted her gentle wanking by stroking my cock against her belly. Then every now and again she would slide her bottom back towards my knees and, bending forwards, would give a few sucks to my aching, tender penis. I had to pull even tighter on the constrictive binding. This caused the veins on my penis to swell and gave the whole shaft a gnarled appearance and made the head grow remarkably.

We had been at this for about half an hour, and it was almost impossible to restrain myself any longer. Loosening my grip on the stocking, I just let nature take over. Betina stroked me against her belly for another half-minute or so, then I felt the most fantastic sensation bursting through the whole of my lower body. My penis jerked twice then erupted in pumping great spasms as enormous squirts of semen jetted about three feet in the air, spattering Betina's belly, breasts, face and hair with the creamy white fluid. I yelled in ecstasy as my penis continued to squirt its load. Each squirt must have contained as much as a normal ejaculation, and in total there must have been enough to fill a small egg-cup: the ultimate experience had been well worth the fortnight's abstinence! Having waited so long, I was soon erect again: within less than half an hour I was entering Betina. This was an incredible experience, due to her small size, but she urged me on until I was fully embedded in her tight, hairless cunt. Now she really showed her skill: we had a slow and wonderful fuck, resulting in a mind-blowing orgasm for me. I made Betina come herself by indulging in a prolonged 69. She had absolutely no inhibitions, and although I had no come left she kept me firmly erect throughout this.

Perhaps I should feel guilty at having satisfied my lust on such a young child; but in Brazil such things are common and perfectly legal, and what I paid for my pleasure kept her warm, fed, and away from the Square where so many orphans gathered to steal and sniff glue. One guy I met regularly picked up girls as young as nine who would willingly suck him dry for an appropriate payment.

R.H. – Kent

[Dear R.H.: Despite the justified clamour in the press against child sexual abuse, this is just the kind of (s)exploitation to which destitute teenagers are being driven by the collapsing British welfare state. At least you seem to have treated Betina with some consideration. Your comments on your constriction and masturbation experiments are likely to be of interest to other members; so would a mention of your cavalier or roundhead status. — T.A.]

Frenulum Modification

Dear Tony: A few years ago I pierced my frenulum (usual method) and ended up with a well-healed hole about 5mm in diameter from which I suspended a gold ring. As I am still uncut and have difficulty with trapped pubic hairs in the rolled-back foreskin, I decided to go one step further and cut the frenulum. This I did by 'strangling' it in two places with catgut, applying a liberal amount of 'Solarcaine' and cutting the dead middle portion with a razor blade. As both ends were tied, there was little bleeding. What should I do about the ends of the frenulum, which are still 'alive' but are unattractive. Should I tie and recut them closer to the shaft and glans, or is this best left to the surgeon when I go for circumcision, which I plan to do soon? And do you know of any useful anaesthetic which can be bought over the chemist's counter, other than Solarcaine and Wasp-eze?

The glans is more exposed now, which is what I had intended. But I am left with two 'stumps' which, several days after they were cut, are still extremely painful to touch during erection. It seems to me that this is because there are some sensitive nerve endings exposed. I have come twice since severing the frenulum by rubbing the sides of the glans only. The loss of the frenulum has altered the pre- and post-ejaculatory sensations altogether: sensitivity is reduced, which is what I wanted anyway. Is this unusual? I can not find reference to retention of the frenulum being of any significance in any of the books on circumcision.

Iain – Oban

[Dear Iain: So long as the sensitivity of your two little frenulum tags is not due to infection, there is no cause to worry: the pain will go once healing is complete, which should be within a couple of weeks. The two anaesthetics you mention are useful for such minor operations, but not for long term use afterwards. Wasp-eze includes an anti-histamine, which helps to keep down inflammation. If the two tag-ends of frenulum are still prominent and unsightly some weeks after the operation, they can be dealt with as before, by tying and cutting. But they are likely to shrivel and merge into the shaft skin. A circumcision operator is likely to leave this area untouched, so you are best to achieve the result you want first by your own method. — T.A.]

Dear Tony: It was reassuring to know that I had not created a life-long problem for myself by cutting my frenulum. You were quite right: both ends of the cut frenulum have healed. The one nearest the glans has almost disappeared and the other has shrivelled up to be almost invisible, although I can still feel a small lump where it was, so I think I shall ask the surgeon when he does the circumcision if he will tidy it up for me.

By cutting the frenulum I have greatly reduced the sensitivity of my glans before and after ejaculation, which I am pleased about. Previously as I brought myself off I reached a peak which was so 'sharp' as to be painful. Now there is a much slower build up to the point of no return, taking longer, and followed by a more 'gentle' downward arc.

The initial objective in cutting the frenulum was to help keep my foreskin off the glans. This has been successful when I am erect. I also find that when I masturbate with my hand I am able by using the thumb and forefinger to massage the area between the back of my glans and the top of my cock, which of course wasn't possible before and now creates a pleasant feeling.

I am sure no one cock resembles or feels like another, but I wonder if a cut frenulum might help others who have a sensitivity problem and suffer from acute premature ejaculations. I can personally say that they have nothing to lose by trying it.

Iain – Oban

Frenulum Problem

Dear B.B.: I hope that I can help you with your question about your frenulum, though of course you must rely on your own judgment in deciding whether or not to follow these suggestions and advice.

Your photo shows a very neat circumcision with a fairly unobtrusive scar-line about an inch from the glans rim and no loose skin on the shaft when erect: as you say, a quite severe circumcision, and one of which to be very proud. From the appearance of the scar, I'd guess it was done in infancy: am I right? Do you remember anything of having it done? The photo also shows the very pronounced web of prominent frenulum, stretched tightly and causing the head of your penis to turn downward. The short answer to your question is that if you cut through the frenulum, I doubt very much whether there would be a problem with it rejoining as it healed, especially if you ensured a daily erection while it heals to prevent the scar-line contracting. But there is also a more interesting long answer.

Whatever you do, I must emphasise some important precautions.

- (1) preparation: collect together all the equipment you need in advance, and ensure that you have a good couple of hours free of interruption in which to work. Choose a well-lit place to work, provide a seat for yourself and a table (a tray will do) within easy reach for your instruments. Have a wipeable cover for chair and table (a plastic pedal-bin liner is excellent; if new it will be clean).
- (2) sterility: all instruments must be sterilised, if metal by heating to at least 140 degrees C, either in a pressure cooker or (even better) in a dry oven, for at least 20 minutes at full temperature. Plastics etc should be soaked in an antiseptic solution (Savlon, Dettol etc), overnight.
- (3) cleanliness: you should sit and soak in a hot bath with antiseptic fluid in it (not excessively strong: follow the instructions) for about 20 minutes before operating.
- (4) bleeding: if cut accidentally, do you stop bleeding fairly quickly, and heal up well? Unless you do, you may encounter problems and should not go ahead.

First, have you thought of piercing the frenulum? The piercing could then be stretched, which might well reduce the tension which is bothering you, as well as offering other interesting possibilities. Obviously if this solution proved unsatisfactory you could cut it later. The frenal area tends to bleed quite freely, especially when the penis is erect, so don't be alarmed by this. The blood supply is from very small blood vessels which stop bleeding quite quickly, especially when the penis becomes flaccid again. There is no artery in the frenulum: any danger lies in a deep cut into the spongy tissue which forms the bulk and structure of the penis, and which produces an erection when filled with blood; but working carefully and using scissors rather than a scalpel can easily avoid this danger. Bleeding can generally be stopped by compression: simply cover the bleeding area with a piece of gauze (which can be left in place later) and grip the bleeding area very firmly between finger and thumb, or even between opposed thumbs with your fingers interlinked to strengthen the pressure. If 20 minutes of this is unsuccessful, try cauterising (see below).

A piercing should be made as close as possible to the underside of the glans, so as to involve as much as possible of the frenulum. A 'keeper' is necessary to keep the hole open while it heals. Several materials are suitable for this (a plastic 'quill' toothpick, for example) but probably the best is to get yourself a stainless steel ring closed by a ball (a Barbary ring); the ball is sprung into place with a pair of circlip pliers, and is then secure. Ordinary ear-rings are too easily bent and lost. I don't recommend a key-ring, as it is difficult to get on and difficult to keep clean where the surfaces touch. The advantage of a ring is that it can be moved in the piercing. Choose a fairly thin one, of a diameter which will stay neatly behind the glans rim if you want it there rather than hanging free. The piercing should be made with a needle of the same diameter as the ring. A large sewing needle will do, but if you can get a suitably large hypodermic needle (perhaps from a veterinary supplier) that is even better. You will need something firm (ideally a rubber cork) to press against, and will need to push the needle through far enough for the hole to be the right size. The ring is inserted as the needle is withdrawn: this can be tricky and may need some determination: don't panic! Once in, it helps to stop the bleeding. Keep a good supply of absorbent toilet tissue to hand, as it is excellent for catching any blood, and can be effectively disposed of in the wc. The ring must be kept there until fully healed and until any inflammation or swelling has subsided: don't attempt to take it out for at least a month and preferably three, or you probably will not get it back in again. You are unlikely to need much of a dressing on it, but some Fusidin ointment and a single strip of gauze could be used, held together and in place by a little sticking plaster. The ring can be moved around to keep it clean and prevent a scab forming. If the area needs washing to dissolve away any matter adhering to the ring, use a weak solution of peroxide in water, but not an antiseptic solution: the antiseptic is sufficiently corrosive to damage healing tissue and to set back the healing process. Once fully healed, you can start stretching it by applying tension. It is possible to use a weight, but probably better to use a rubber band anchored either to a shirt button or to an elastic garter worn just below the knee. You can also get a tapered ring and gradually stretch the hole by pushing more of the ring through. Fusidin ointment can be bought at a chemist: it is Vaseline based and helps lubricating and healing, or sterile Vaseline would probably do. I found that there was considerable pleasure arising from the tension on the frenulum, which kept me aware of the area. Once stretched substantially, the downward pull on your glans will be eliminated. You can either keep it as a loop or cut it off.

If you want to cut the frenulum, either after piercing it as above or directly, a single cut will probably leave a couple of tags of skin hanging loose, which would spoil the streamlined appearance which you have gained with circumcision. In a boy, the tags would probably disappear with the growth at puberty, but in an adult such as yourself it would be better to cut the frenulum away (excise it) rather than just divide it. Because of the mobility of the skin, it is best to grip it firmly with a pair of locking forceps (obtainable in electronics shops such as Tandy, as well as from medical suppliers). Then two cuts, one from the direction of the tip and the other from the direction of the base of the penis should be made, forming a very wide V with the ends of the cuts meeting at the point of the locking forceps. The best instrument would be a very sharp pair of scissors: check first on a piece of paper that the blades close very firmly on each other, to avoid a pinching effect. Scissors also have a slight crushing effect, which helps to reduce bleeding. But your problem will be to stop the bleeding. If it continues copiously, this can be done by cauterising it: carefully touch the bleeding points with the fine tip of a hot soldering iron and the heat will coagulate the blood and stop the bleeding (the heat of the iron will ensure that it is sterile). A similar Fusidin or Vaseline and gauze dressing can be used, and will need to be changed whenever it gets wet with urine. It would also be wise to use an absorbent pad to protect your clothing from blood: either a pad of toilet tissue, or part of a disposable nappy or a female sanitary towel would serve well, held in place with tight Y-front pants.

A piercing probably does not need any anaesthetic, but excision may well do. Whatever happens you want to be able to complete the job and not be prevented from doing so by pain. Waspeze can be obtained over the counter from chemists, and contains an anaesthetic and an antihistamine: the latter will help to keep down inflammation and swelling; it is sold for wasp stings and is sprayed on from an aerosol can. It stings a little initially, until the anaesthetic takes effect. Ralgex may be worth trying as an alternative, as may be other such sprays sold for treating sports injuries. Try experimenting first, and have two cans available in case the job takes longer than you expect. If it comes to the worst and you end up with a half finished job or really uncontrollable bleeding, your best course is to go to a hospital accident dept, and to say it tore during unusually active sex with your wife (to avoid suspicion of homosexuality/AIDS). But I think there is more than enough advice here to avoid that eventuality.

You can get rings from the following addresses, of which the best is probably Carter, who has quite a good range, including the Barbary rings and the tapered rings: measure yourself up (flaccid & erect) for diameter first (use a pen and a piece of cotton, then a ruler), and phone for current prices.

Mr Sebastian, 321 Panther House, 38 Mount Pleasant, London WC1X 0AP. Tel 01-837 3226

'Have your erotic piercings carried out by recommended piercing specialist. 38 years experience.' (Forum advert) Martin Spencer, tel. (0285) 72350 (Gloucestershire).

Personal Jewellery: V.J. Carter, PO Box 14, Winsley, Bradford on Avon, Wilts BA15 1YW tel. (0221) 222240

Edward J. Fenster Jr, 1922 Hoover Road, Zephyrhills, Florida 34248, USA tel: (813) 788 0147.

The essential thing to remember is that it is all very simple really, especially if you know what to be prepared for. I shall be very interested to hear how you get on.

T.A.

Dear Tony: Many thanks for your very informative letter. The details and suggestions are very helpful, and I will let you know how I get on if I decide to take some action against my frenulum.

B.B.

Medical Examinations

Dear Tony: Thank you for all your work in producing the Acorn Newsletter. It is most informative and very interesting. I must confess that I always thought that I was alone in my fascination by the penis in all its shapes and forms, and that I had to be some sort of freak. Now I know that many share such an interest.

Like many of your correspondents, my awareness of the penis in its circumcised and uncircumcised states began in the showers and changing rooms during my teens in the late 50s/early 60s. At my grammar school in Essex, virtually all of my age-group had been circumcised at birth. I was no exception and thus I was especially curious to study the penises of the few boys who had been left uncircumcised. I wanted to find out all I could about the two differing states.

One particular aspect of penis care still puzzles me after all these years since my school-days, and I have seen it only mentioned vaguely in past editions of Acorn. Just what exactly does and should happen to boys and men at medical examinations? In my case, and with all my circumcised school friends, our penises were not examined, but nor were those of our few mates who were still uncircumcised. Likewise, a year or so later at college, a friend with whom I shared rooms, who was endowed with what looked like a tight foreskin, denied ever having had it examined by a doctor, nor ever being questioned about it.

Living in what was predominantly a circumcised community, these young men may have been too embarrassed to admit to having their penises checked out. On the other hand, if they were telling the truth, then surely the doctors were at fault, as uncircumcised penises need more care than circumcised ones. After all, I and most of my peers were done at birth in order to avoid possible problems later in life. If that was not so, then why on earth were we cut?

During the years since I left college I have met two or three men who have admitted to having had their uncircumcised penises examined at medicals. In each case they claimed that they became erect and climaxed as a result of the doctor's manipulation of their penis. All of these men save one admitted to having quite long foreskins. The one exception, whom I saw naked on numerous occasions in the showers, had a very short, loose foreskin. At his medical for entry to the Merchant Navy the young doctor said that all recruits had to have a thorough check-up prior to going to sea. Thus, despite the fact that his prepuce hardly covered his glans when limp, the doctor still insisted in not only retracting it to see if it was free from smegma behind the glans, but also that it was not tight when erect. He added that in conversations with other recruits, they all mentioned that they had experienced a similar ordeal in the hands of this young doctor.

Perhaps the strangest account of a medical was that given by a student, about the last medical at his public school in 1984. Up to this date he had had an annual medical, and never had his penis been checked, nor had he been questioned about it. But at the last one, when he was in the 6th Form, a new young doctor examined him. This was altogether more thorough. At the beginning, he was told to strip off completely, which had never happened before. At the end of the examination, the doctor told him that, as he had a long foreskin, he would have to check that it was not too tight, as so many boys with foreskins as long as his often needed circumcising. This student friend also experienced an orgasm under the doctor's constant pushing and pulling of his prepuce, and he cleaned him up with a tissue. Eventually the doctor told him that he was OK, but that he must always pull it back when peeing. Then he told him to go and have a shower, where he joined the boy whose medical had preceded his. This chap said, "Not you as well?", for his cock was also very red from the doctor's manipulations. The remarkable thing was that the second boy had been circumcised at birth: the doctor had held his penis shaft and pulled down on it, telling him that he was testing the scar tissue.

I find it hard to believe that circumcised men need checking out in this way, but perhaps medical opinion has changed since my school days, as indeed it has on the whole subject of circumcision. On the other hand, I can accept that uncircumcised men and boys should have their penises examined to see if their foreskin can retract easily and that hygiene is being maintained.

Perhaps Acorn readers would write in with accounts of their experiences at medical examinations. It would be especially interesting to hear from men from other countries. I have heard that in the USA great pressure was put on uncircumcised recruits to the armed forces to get them to have a circumcision. Could you, Tony, let us know exactly how a boy or man, circumcised or uncircumcised, should be examined at the various stages of his life, so as to keep our cocks in the best possible shape.

M.A.L. – Ware

[Dear M.A.L.: At birth a boy is checked for undescended testicles and other abnormalities of the genitals, but since the 1950s the foreskin has generally been left out of this examination. My advice would be that by the age of about five his foreskin should be checked thoroughly. In 90 per cent of boys it should be fully retractible by the age of four, but that is psychologically not a good age for him to face circumcision, so it is better to wait at least until he is well established at school if circumcision is required. At this stage it is important to check that there are no adhesions between foreskin and glans, especially at the glans rim. Any that are found should be stretched gently but repeatedly until they part, since if they are left they will become progressively tougher. It should also be impressed on the boy and his parents that he must pull his foreskin back to pee, and must also pull it back to wash under it thoroughly every day.

A similar check at the age of about 12 should see if he is starting to show signs of pubertal growth of the genitals. Again at 15 or 16 a lad should be examined thoroughly to ensure that the growth and developments of puberty are virtually complete. If not, hormone treatment with testosterone should be considered. This is also an important age for a check of the foreskin, to ensure that after the glans has grown the foreskin can still be fully and easily retracted over it. With the additional secretions of adolescence, another purpose of this examination is to see that he is keeping on top of the smegma problem. Should circumcision be thought necessary, it is obviously better to arrange it at this age rather than to allow a potentially far-reaching problem to develop later through frustrations in his sex life, whenever that should start. The opportunity should also be made for him to say for himself if he would like to be circumcised.

Clearly there is much less to worry about if a lad has been circumcised, but I would still wish to check that the outcome of the circumcision gave even tension at each side and that there was no twisting effect from faulty apposition of the cut edges when stitches were inserted. Sometimes a poor circumcision leaves unsightly tags of skin which it might be advisable to have tidied. Sometimes the shaft skin may have become so slack that the glans is covered much of the time, raising the possible need for a revision circumcision. This is often a problem with an obese boy, whose penis may almost disappear in the fat: in such a case, both the foreskin problem and the weight problem have to be tackled. It is as important for roundheads as for cavaliers to check that the penis and testicles are developing as they should at 12 and that they are functioning normally at 16. — Tony]

Literary Foreskins

Dear Tony: Here in the UK we seem to be very coy about the subject of circumcision compared with the States where lively exchanges of correspondence take place in the media. Occasionally you see a daring article in a quality paper here, such as that reproduced in Issue 6/88 from The Independent, or a previous article in The Times reporting on the growing anti-circumcision movement in California. Other than that it is difficult to find informed comment on the subject. Even Forum goes through patches where it hesitates to discuss the subject, hence the popularity of Acorn.

Very occasionally you see the subject discussed, usually in tantalising brevity, in works of fiction or biography here. A notable example is Brian Aldiss' Hand Reared Boy, in which he describes at length his fascination with foreskins, in particular the variety of those of his three wanking companions in boarding school and his resentment at his father for depriving him of his. Another classic is Molly Bloom's famous soliloquy in James Joyce's Ulysses, in which he describes her burning curiosity to see whether her new boyfriend is circumcised and her fascination in rolling his foreskin back when she finds he is not. In his God of the Labyrinth Colin Wilson describes how a governess unwittingly provokes her charges' erections during a caning and then adopts the habit of retracting their foreskins 'for health reasons' whenever possible thereafter.

To continue, Anthony Burgess describes his irritation with a doctor who pesters him to get himself circumcised to correct a tight foreskin in his autobiography Little Wilson and Big God, and Mary Macarthy in one of her earlier novels reflects on the disadvantages suffered by the Jews on seeing the raw-looking genital of a friend's circumcised son. Marie Stopes, the first feminist, enigmatically demands that a playmate for her son, selected from an orphans' home, should not be circumcised. Another famous feminist, Germaine Greer, surprisingly enough is reputed to have declared her distaste for circumcision.

D.W Thomas in his White Hotel describes the discomfort of a Russian who, on going into a sauna in the USA, finds he is the only uncircumcised man there. And finally, although Molly Parkin and Fiona Richmond write purely to titillate, their frequent expression of views on foreskins and circumcision is quite illuminating. Molly Parkin reacts strongly against her father's disapproval of her going out with 'a circumcised sod' (a Jew), and Fiona Richmond, on 'entertaining' a Spanish football team, including the reserve, sees fit to declare that every one of them still had his foreskin.

This list comprises those books that stick in the mind after years of reading. I can't help feeling that there must be many other books in which the subject is aired. How about Acorn compiling a list? Such material is the bread and butter of your readership.

R.B.W.

Thanks, R.B.W., for giving us a good start. I am sure that other readers will be able to add to it, even with a single title, and I hope they will write in and do so, and will also include pro-roundhead as well as pro-cavalier items. There are many books on the travel and anthropology shelves, some of them in libraries and some in second hand bookshops which may interest readers. The following is a selection of some of the most easily found:

Barley, Nigel (1983). The Innocent Anthropologist. (Penguin, 1986)

Barley, Nigel (1986). A Plague of Caterpillars. (Penguin, 1987)

Basedow, H. (1925). The Australian Aboriginal. (Adelaide)

Bjerre, Jens (1956). The Last Cannibals. (London: Michael Joseph)

Bryk, Felix (1934). Circumcision in Man and Woman: its history, psychology and ethnology. (New York: American Ethnological Press)

Cawte, John (1974). Medicine is the Law: studies in psychiatric anthropology of Australian tribal societies. (Honolulu: University Press of Hawaii)

Edwardes, Allen (1976). The Jewel in the Lotus: A Historical Survey of the Sexual Culture of the East. (New York: Bantam Books)

Edwardes, Allen (n.d.). The Rape of India. (Julian Press)

Edwardes, Allen and R.E.L. Masters (1970). The Cradle of Erotica: a study of Afro-Asian sexual expression and an analysis of erotic freedom in social relationships. (London: The Odyssey Press)

Firth, Raymond (1936). We the Tikopia. (London)

Humphreys, C.B. The Southern New Hebrides, an ethnological record.

Koenig, Oskar (1956). The Masai Story. (London: Michael Joseph)

La Fontaine, J.S. (1985). Initiation: ritual drama and secret knowledge across the world. (Harmondsworth: Penguin Books)

Langley, Myrtle S. (1979). The Nandi of Kenya: Life Crisis Rituals in a Period of Change. (London: C. Hurst and Co)

Layard, John. Stone Men of Malekula.

Leakey, L.S.B. (1977). The Southern Kikuyu before 1903. (London: Routledge and Kegan Paul)

Meggitt, M.J. (1965). Desert People: the Walbiri People of Central Australia. (University of Chicago Press)

Niemoeller, A.F. (1947). Chastity Safeguards: a study of the mechanical means of preventing sexual indulgence, in both men and women, employed in different times and countries. (Girard, Kansas: Haldeman-Julius Publications)

Pavey, Roger V. (1981). The Kindest Cut of All. (New Horizon, 5 Victoria Drive, West Sussex. ISBN 0 86116 121 1)

Remondino, P.C. (1891). History of Circumcision from the Earliest Times to the Present. Moral and Physical Reasons for its Performance, with a history of eunuchism, hermaphroditism, etc., and of the different operations practised on the prepuce. (Philadelphia and London: The F.A. Davis Co, Publishers)

Spencer, B. and F.J. Gillen (1899). The Native Tribes of Central Australia.

Spock, Benjamin (1973. Originally published 1946). Baby and Child Care. (London: New English Library)

Thesiger, Wilfred (1959). Arabian Sands. (London: Longmans)

Wagner, Gunter (1949). The Bantu of North Kavirondo. (Oxford University Press)

Weightman, Gavin. 'These you have lost'. New Society, 17 June 1976: 623-4.

Foreskin Stretching

Dear Tony: Very many thanks for the several issues to date, all quite fascinating in their content. I enclose my cheque for £5 for the 1988 back issues.

Further to my letter on foreskin stretching ('Tightskin', issue 2/89), perhaps my method might be of interest? With the thumb and forefinger of my right hand I draw back my foreskin as far as possible behind the glans. With my left hand underneath my penis I use that thumb and forefinger to hold the bared shaft behind the glans. I then roll the foreskin forward with my right hand, over the fingertips of my left hand, so that the foreskin is doubled back on itself. Then I ease out my left hand fingertips and there it is: the glans fully exposed, and it remains uncovered for as long as I wish. In my case I keep it exposed for most of the time, and it is greatly admired when all the surrounding hair is removed (balls and all).

I can stretch the foreskin further by using a roll of tissue (toilet paper) and inserting this under the foreskin: this can be increased in quantity week by week. Tight foreskin? No problem. Easily stretched. Little by little.

D.N.C. – Deal

Circumcision Rings

About two years ago I had a copy of a fascinating book, Foreskin, by Bud Berkeley, an American who I think was also the founder of the Uncircumcised Society of America, 'USA'. He discussed many aspects of the subject: childhood memories, experiences in the services, and events in adult life, all concerned with foreskins and circumcision. One reference which I found particularly interesting was to the use of 'circumcision rings', but unfortunately no details of these were given. The reference was in the context of the embarrassment which could be suffered by uncircumcised boys in a community where all their contemporaries were circumcised and it seems that the purpose of these rings was primarily to give the appearance of being circumcised. Presumably it would also achieve whatever were supposed to be the advantages of the operation at that time. As I recollect it, the account in the book is by a man who remembered circumcision rings being fitted to his younger brother aged about twelve by his father. The rings were apparently left in place for four or five years and when they were eventually removed, the foreskin remained in the retracted position to which it had become accustomed, with much the same appearance as that of a penis which was actually circumcised.

This seems to suggest that the rings were not only comfortable to wear for long periods but were also fairly inconspicuous and I imagine there must be many people as well as myself who would like to know exactly how this could be achieved. Does any member have information on 'circumcision rings' or, better still, know enough about them to give detailed instructions on how to fit them?

E.S. – Salisbury

[Dear E.S.: Berkeley's book gives very little detail. The fact that the rings were fitted at about age 12 indicates that they must have allowed for the considerable penile growth of puberty, and therefore can not have been fitted around the penis shaft. My guess is that they were fitted in foreskin piercings in a way which held the foreskin behind the glans. This could be easily done by pushing back the foreskin, pinching it together at the side and piercing it in and out parallel with the shaft, inserting a small gold ring there, then similarly piercing the bunched foreskin further round and inserting the same ring there. A second ring would be inserted at the other side of the shaft. In practice great care would be needed to place the rings symmetrically, and it would be best to use a clamp or clip to hold the foreskin in place while the piercings were being made. The bunched foreskin would cover the two small sectors of ring, and to all appearances the lad would have a foreskin which remained permanently retracted. With growth of the penis and disuse of the foreskin, it would probably shrink considerably, and after some years the rings could probably be removed. But it would be essential to keep them in place for a long time, since if they were removed they would be very difficult to put back. They would have to be much stronger than ear-rings, not capable of being pulled apart under the considerable strain of a powerful erection, and made of a non allergenic metal (gold, surgical steel etc). They should give many of the advantages of circumcision, with reversibility. — T.A.]

Balanitis

Dear Tony: I always thought that balanitis was caused by poor hygiene and an accumulation of smegma. But from several items in the newsletter it seems that those with a tight foreskin and an accumulation of smegma often do not have a balanitis problem. There also seems some doubt as to the origin of smegma and why some men accumulate more than others. I do think that urine can irritate the glans and foreskin: perhaps acid urine is the main cause of infantile balanitis? I think that if it is necessary to retract the foreskin each time one pees, then one might just as well be circumcised. Presumably by keeping the glans as dry as possible this would also prevent balanitis. Views, please.

Bill – Kingston

[Dear Bill: Urine is mildly acidic (except with certain illnesses). Balanitis is similar in appearance to 'nappy-rash', which occurs when bacteria react with urine to convert it to (alkaline) ammonia. Bad cases in circumcised boys can result in an ulcer near the tip of the glans, which is why circumcision may be better left until a boy is out of nappies. The problem can usually be prevented by washing nappies properly or using disposables by changing them more frequently. Balanitis is usually confined to the foreskin, and appears to be caused by bacteria (probably from under the foreskin) acting on urine retained by the foreskin. On a recent visit to swimming pool changing rooms, three out of 13 boys aged about 8-10 were seen to have reddened ends to their foreskins, so the problem is fairly common. — T.A.]

Keeping The Foreskin Back

Dear Acorn: From early puberty I have been interested in everything phallic. My own cock is uncircumcised, but I have kept the foreskin pulled back since I was 12 years old. I was brought up in a part of Africa where most cocks were uncircumcised, except Muslims and Jews. However I was taught by black friends to keep my foreskin pulled back as they thought it encouraged one to develop a larger cock. They used to rub a herbal ointment on theirs.

I notice when in the showers after playing sport that most in this country are uncircumcised and if they get a partial erection in the showers their foreskins only come slightly back to reveal the tip of the glans. All of my partners, both male and female, have said they prefer a roundhead. I often fantasise about a mixed group in which all the males have large cocks which have been well developed by frequent use, coupling in every possible position with eager females.

E.L. – Bath

Feminine Attentions

Dear Acorn: I was about nine when my parents were killed in the blitz. I went to live with my aunty for a couple of years. There wasn't much about me that she liked, but what really upset her was my long foreskin. She was a rabid circumcisionist and treated my foreskin as if it were a loathsome excrescence. She would scrub it in the bath until it was raw, and once took me to the doctor demanding that I be circumcised. He checked me out and then told her not to waste his time: I didn't need it.

This wasn't much comfort to me, though, because she then started a campaign to make me realise what a nasty thing a foreskin was. She told me that nice girls wouldn't look at me: only low-grade girls would have anything to do with a boy with a foreskin. Under aunty's verbal onslaught and frantic cleansing I developed a neurosis about my foreskin and wondered why my parents had been so negligent in not having it removed.

Then my luck changed, and I was evacuated to the West Country. Things couldn't have been more different. I found myself in a friendly household run by three large jolly women with a number of smaller kids. From an atmosphere of fear and worry I was transformed into a happy cheerful environment.

Saturday night was bath night and the three ladies supervised a communal bathing session. The kids were done first and then it was my turn. I dreaded being undressed in front of the women and letting them see my hated foreskin, and so I was horrified when the older one told the daughter not to forget my willy. To make matters worse I immediately got a rigid five-inch hard-on; mindful of the harsh treatment I had received from my aunt, I cowered away, clutching my balls. They weren't having that nonsense! The older one pinioned my arms and held me up straight whilst the younger one bent down to inspect me, chiding me for being silly. When they saw my erection they shrieked with laughter and started tweaking and twanging my rigid plonk. Then the older one handled my foreskin (which was so long that it still completely covered my knob), stripping it right down my shaft as far as it would go, while the other two watched with interest. After a quick inspection she poured a mug of water over it and slipped the foreskin forward again. Not a word of criticism or disgust. I was amazed.

Afterwards the daughter, sensing that I had some sort of hang-up, asked why I was so shy. I told her tearfully about my aunty's views and how I wished I was circumcised. She told me my aunt was a wicked woman to say such things, and that my cock was a perfectly normal specimen and any girl would be happy to have such a well-equipped boy-friend.

She tried to bolster my confidence in my organ in a number of ways, saying that circumcision was a 'townie' fad. Besides, the foreskin was a valuable protection for a man's knob, and a plaything the girls would never tire of. She practised what she preached, frequently slipping a hand down my waistband to fondle the little spout of skin on the end of my cock, and at night when she tucked me in, she would put her hand under the bedclothes and squeeze and tug it with the expert hand of a milk-maid until I had an erection, then praised my development (five inches wasn't bad for an eleven-year-old). The waves of gloom and neurosis which had enveloped me in aunty's house slowly disappeared, but I still yearned for my foreskin to disappear. One night, as she tucked me up in bed as usual, I had the unexpected and unbelievable pleasure of my first climax. I thought I had wet the bed, but she simply congratulated me on becoming a man, and wiped it with a handkerchief. I was never entirely convinced by her remark about 'townies', but I it wasn't until I returned to London to work that I had the chance to get myself circumcised and, finally, achieve the roundhead status which aunty's attentions had convinced me was essential to a proper state of cleanliness in a man.

H.R.

Scottish Yearnings

Dear Tony: I can't tell you how much I have enjoyed your Acorn newsletter and how much I look forward to each new issue. I think you provide a much needed service for young cavaliers contemplating surgery. I am a cavalier, but have fantasised all my life about what it might feel and look like to be a roundhead, while never having the courage to do anything about it. My fear is that I would not have a second chance, and I might be disfigured for life instead of becoming a sexy glamour-boy. Last year you had a letter from a man who was displeased with his first circumcision. He described his ideal and intended to have a second operation to achieve it. That I admire.

In the sauna I have observed that some unfortunate men have been butchered, while others have found a sensitive and skilled surgeon who took a pride in his work. I have seen many examples of sculptured perfection that look so natural, it is difficult to accept that they weren't born like that. They just can't help radiating male sexuality: what a waste it would be if they had not found such a good surgeon. There are also the many handsome devils with beautiful bodies who have retained their thickly padded foreskins, giving not a hint of what lies below. What a waste – he might as well be fully clothed: if he were neatly and sensitively circumcised, he would be an adonis.

L.J. – Glasgow

ACORN

1989 Issue No 6
(Formerly Issue N)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
News Items		Page 2
Circumcision In
Simon Raven's Fiction	Jim T.	Page 3
Wee Willies	Dick	Page 4
Penis Hygiene	M.D.	Page 5
South American Encounters	E.L.	Page 5
Circumcised, And What A Relief!	M.H.	Page 6
USA — The Uncircumcised
Society Of America		Page 8
Revision: And Attitudes To
Circumcision In The USA	S.W.	Page 8
NO-CIRC	R.B.W.	Page 10
Another Medical Examination	I.M.	Page 12
Incidents When Young	J.H.	Page 13
Contact	A.R.	Page 19

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Hello Again: Here's another good long issue of Acorn. This one includes: contributions on medical examinations, a long article from an Acorn who circumcised himself, information about the Uncircumcised Society of America, another encounter in South America, comments about penis hygiene, the significance of circumcision in Simon Raven's fiction, plus some replies to the penis survey: as usual, many letters both pro- and anti-circumcision too. Please keep writing in with your own ideas, anecdotes, comments, stories and observations, information, fact as well as fantasy, on our general phallic theme: cockspotting, circumcision, foreskins, 'getting the cock into the best possible shape' and putting the phallus to its many enjoyable uses. We also take contact requests (which may be edited): more would be welcome.

Subscriptions: Your £10 annual subscription pays for all the 1989 issues, including back copies. 1988 back copies (about 80 pages) are available for £5. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order payable to Acorn. Receipt will be acknowledged (generally by supply of what you have requested). They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Information: We hope that members will learn much from Acorn. Some may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or give specific advice. Acorn members include doctors who have said they are willing to help other members. It must be clearly understood, however, that any information published, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes a recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any information in this newsletter must rely on their own judgement, and does so at their own risk.

Confidentiality: Contributions are identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Otherwise no name or address will be revealed to another member, but letters will be passed on if you wish to make contact. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with such guarantees of confidentiality in mind.

T.A.

News Items

Turkey: Some 30,000 ethnic Turks have been allowed to cross from Romania (where their religious life and customs have been systematically repressed for many years) into Turkey, where they are being accommodated in tented camps as refugees. Although destitute, one of their first actions is to organise the circumcision of their sons, accompanied by much celebration. (Daily Telegraph colour magazine, 27 July 1989).

Brunei: “Six heads of state from South-East Asia yesterday met to witness a major event in the little sultanate of Brunei: Crown-Prince Al-Muttadeh Billah was circumcised, thereby taking the decisive step into the ranks of adults, according to eastern custom.

The Heads of State from member countries of the South-East Asian alliance ASEAN, which joins Brunei with Indonesia, Malaysia, the Philippines, Singapore and Thailand, were all present for the ceremony. Before submitting to the knife, the 15-year-old prince drove in a cavalcade of cars through the streets of Brunei’s capital Bandar Seri Begawan.” (Aftenposten, Oslo, 4 August 1989). The Indonesian and Malaysian representatives, as Muslims, would understand. But one wonders what the others thought of the occasion: Catholic Mrs Cory Aquino of the Philippines, or the Chinese President Wee Kim Wee of Singapore, or Buddhist King Bhumipol Adulyadej of Thailand.

Circumcision In Simon Raven’s Fiction

Dear Tony: A friend at work lent me some copies of Acorn and I was amazed to see a ‘taboo’ subject so openly discussed, with women, too, making forceful comments. Really, how times change! It struck me that your readers might find it interesting to consider a popular writer’s views on circumcision which have intrigued me for years, and the comparison he makes between men’s and women’s attitudes to the subject. If so, they could do worse than read Simon Raven’s wicked satires on public schools, the army and academia, particularly in his latest series.

The theme of circumcision occurs repeatedly in his later books, and Raven has what I take to be a typical public school love/hate relationship with the foreskin: wildly erotic on someone else, but he wouldn’t want it personally! A number of leading characters in his books start off with foreskins but invariably finish up without them, or insane, or dead. On the whole, the male characters in Raven’s books seem to approve of circumcision, rather than actively disapproving of foreskins.

Those women in his books who express an opinion on the subject seem wholeheartedly pro-foreskin. One such, a precocious fifth-former called Baby Canteloupe, describes the intense enjoyment she gets from playing with the uncircumcised penis of a new boyfriend, and the relish with which she experiments with rolling his foreskin back and forward. The boyfriend later undergoes circumcision and, with it, a character change: from being rather shady, he becomes a pillar of society.

Similarly a lady who is married to a Jewish professor insists on her son retaining his foreskin ‘for aesthetic reasons’, despite the natural objections of her husband, and in fact to spite him: she is slightly contemptuous of him. [But note that, as Jewish status is inherited through the mother, there would be no religious obligation to have the son circumcised. — T.A.] When he has to be circumcised in his early teens to relieve a tight foreskin, despite vigorous manual efforts on her part to free it, she is absolutely devastated. On being circumcised, this boy, too, undergoes change of character and status from a malevolent little swine to Head of School. Raven obviously has a chip on his shoulder if he thinks removal of the foreskin can change someone's character.

From reading letters in Acorn, I think the division of attitudes Raven describes is reflected by your readers. Most of the men seem to go for circumcision, whereas most women who bother to write seem to favour the foreskin. Do you think this is the case in the country as a whole? Acorn is about the only way we'll find out!

Yours sincerely, Jim T. – London N16

Wee Willies

Dear Tony: Recently you asked how the penis is held when urinating. I have observed more men hold their cocks with thumb on top and fingers underneath than the reverse, and they do seem to be the 'working-class' types: taxi drivers, lorry drivers, labourers, etc. 'Businessmen' types seem to prefer fingers on top in an effort to hide their cock from any onlooker, and even qualify their shyness or embarrassment or anti-social behaviour by turning away at a pronounced angle.

Isn't it wonderful, though, to have the good luck to be with a guy who is quite happy to let you see absolutely everything in action, including the exposed testicles! As for myself, I cannot recall any tuition or suggestion from parents as to how to hold it. I have always guided my smallish friend when flaccid with thumb on top or sometimes forefinger. When somewhat stimulated, I piss with thumb on top and one or two fingers below.

I have always enjoyed pissing over myself in the bath. It seems to be, after the purity of soaping and scrubbing, a final act of decadent perversity to raise myself a little out of the water and empty my bladder over myself before turning over in the water and jumping out. I prefer to do this with an erection if possible. I know it is a bit difficult to piss with a hard-on, but if I make sure I'm bursting beforehand, it is much more exciting.

Although many men may regard urinating as a mere bodily function, taken for granted and done when necessary, I feel sure that some fellow Acorn members have more than a fleeting interest in the subject. It would be most interesting to hear of experiments, fantasies and experiences of piss activities. I'm sure you will agree that it is a very important and exciting function of the penis and requires more investigation.

Dick – Merseyside

Penis Hygiene

Dear Acorn: I spent part of my childhood in a boys' home in the North of England. Of this episode, what sticks in my mind is Thursday nights, when 15 naked boys of all ages and sizes were paraded in the showers for their weekly bath, supervised by the nurse, an amiable and dumpy lady whom the boys adored. As I recollect, no attempt was made to teach the boys hygiene of the private parts, but immediately after the bath we were lined up again, naked and shivering, for a 'short-arm inspection'. Nurse would examine each boy in turn, palpating his groin and testicles for hernias before pulling the foreskin right back to inspect the glans. The older boys got erections in anticipation, and so too did some of the smaller ones including myself. Nurse pretended to take no notice, but you could see that she found our response flattering and enjoyed handling so many erect penises.

Two of us stood out from the crowd: one who was circumcised, and myself with an unretractable foreskin. The circumcised lad received minimal attention, but nurse got quite perturbed about my tight foreskin. She would try and stretch the opening over her little finger, provoking a rigid erection, and would then run the skin back and forth, forcing it a fraction further over the glans each time. I found this quite painful but tremendously arousing. She eventually succeeded in freeing the moist purple glans from its hood. I was of course grateful to her, but can't help feeling it would have happened sooner or later anyway.

The question then arises, do we make too much fuss about teaching genital hygiene? I have never found it necessary to wash all the time, and I'm sure that the fact that it was constantly exposed and the foreskin kept mobile with frequent masturbation kept it from becoming offensive. Later, of course, when I started going out with girls old enough to be adventurous, I took a lot more trouble to keep my parts fragrant: only an insensitive clod would fail to do so. But even there I found problems. Too much washing removes all the natural secretions round the knob and until I generate a new coating of moisture I find the dryness quite uncomfortable. Plain water does not help and spit's not much better. Anyone know of a suitable lubricant to relieve a dry foreskin?

M.D. – Harpenden

South American Encounters

Dear Acorn: Your issues this year have been great. I was most interested in the letter from R.H. of Kent (5/89 issue) about his experiences in Brazil. I had a similar experience in Colombia. A chap approached me when I was sunbathing nude on a beach. After some talk he invited me to come along to a fisherman's hut where there were three others and a girl of 14 years. She had beautiful breasts and her skin was copper coloured (she was a mestizo, half white and half Amerindian). Her main interest was sucking cocks and then having one man mount her doggy style whilst she took another cock in her mouth. We had the most beautiful sex in various permutations.

It was interesting to see that all five cocks were uncircumcised. One of them had a string of tiny beads wound around his cock on a long elastic thread to a width of about one inch – he said it kept his cock semi-hard most of the time and gave extra stimulation to a woman when he was fully in her cunt. Another of the men had an erection of 8” with a frilly foreskin edge which only came half way down his glans when erect. Watching him fuck our girl was a beautiful experience in rhythm, and he was penetrated by another cock at the same time. I am interested to know if a survey has been made of racial differences in cock size. I observed that the South Americans of mixed blood (Spanish/Amerindian/Negro) were very wide at the base of the penis, but generally not longer than my own 7.5” when erect. I have kept my foreskin pulled back from early puberty, although I am a cavalier. Perhaps R.H. of Kent would also like to enlarge upon his penile exercises in a future issue of Acorn? Keep it up!

E.L. – Bath

Circumcised, And What A Relief!

Dear Tony: First let me congratulate you on an excellent newsletter. I enjoy it so much! It's not before time that the whole fascinating subject of the penis and indeed circumcision were brought out into the open for discussion. I certainly hope that through the newsletter guys can see that there are many other guys interested in foreskins and circumcision, and that perhaps they will benefit from the knowledge.

My own story is fairly typical. All through my teenage and twenties I struggled with the problems of a tight foreskin. In detail, I had difficulty retracting the foreskin, my glans was super-sensitive to the touch, smegma and smell were constant problems, and the 'rose-bud' of skin at the end used regularly to split and was often sore. My glans was also often very red and sore, which made washing it a nasty experience. I am sure you will agree that I was in a sorry state.

I had hoped the foreskin would loosen over the years, but it didn't. I'm now 34. At the age of 30 I decided to do something about it. So I approached my GP requesting a circumcision for tight foreskin and hygiene problems. Unfortunately the doctor was totally unsympathetic, and would not examine me, still less refer me to a consultant. I was so angry at his uncaring attitude to my definite problem. Shortly after that I discovered the Surgical Advisory Service, and within a few weeks I had lost (most of) that useless piece of skin.

It seems I was cut in the Islamic style, i.e. with most of the inner foreskin retained. I was immediately aware of the new clean look and feel of my cock.

It was truly wonderful not to have to battle with the smell and smegma any more. I also had great fun learning new masturbation techniques. The only problem with that style of circumcision was that the remaining skin tended to partially cover the glans when flaccid. I had hoped when having the operation that the glans would be totally and permanently exposed, which I regard as being of the utmost importance.

Having lived with that style for a couple of years I knew that I had to have it re-done. Eventually I managed to have a revision performed by the NHS in March 1988, having moved and found a sympathetic GP this time. The new style seems to be very similar to the Jewish form of the operation, with most of the inner foreskin removed. It is much better as the glans is now normally exposed and it now has a nice healthy pinkish-grey colour. The glans has now become less sensitive (something I particularly wanted) and I am now able to masturbate for long spells (up to one hour) before having a fantastic ejaculation. I can also now masturbate in a variety of ways: with lubrication (saliva, KY, oil); without lubrication; stimulating the glans only or shaft only, or both. It is now so varied! When I had a foreskin I could only do it one way.

Circumcision to me has been one of the most important events in my life. I do not see any disadvantages, and I certainly feel that those who feel mistreated are unaware of the difficulties a tight foreskin can bring. Some guys seem to treat circumcision in the same terms as, say, castration, i.e. 'poor chap, fancy having your foreskin chopped off.' That seems totally mistaken, as circumcision has brought me the joy of always having a clean cock and much more pleasure sexually, particularly in masturbation. I am certainly proud to be a roundhead and, in communal situations like pool changing-rooms, saunas, and at the naturist beach I do not hide behind my towel but 'let it all hang out', as I want people to see that I am a Roundhead and not ashamed to be seen as one. To me, being circumcised is far more natural than having a foreskin tightly enclosing my glans.

There is still one slight problem. As I am rather small when flaccid, the skin will still partly cover the glans when I bend down or sit in certain ways. As I have previously mentioned, I feel that to be properly circumcised the glans should be totally and permanently exposed, and I now am considering a further revision with that aim in mind. I appreciate that you have to be careful about taking too much and thereby causing erection problems, but it seems to me that as I have quite a lot of shaft skin flexibility when erect I could have another  $\frac{1}{2}$ " to  $\frac{3}{4}$ " removed without difficulty. In issue 5/89, your reply to a letter regarding medicals makes it clear that you are also of the opinion that the glans should be clear of covering skin and I do so agree. In the previous issue 4/89, I note that an Acorn has had two revisions performed in London, and it would be a great help to know the names and addresses of the doctors concerned. I appreciate that you will not be recommending them to me and that it is totally my own decision. I guess that one of them is Mr Hasan of the Surgical Advisory Service, but then I may well be wrong.

I should mention that I have a copy of that priceless, amazing book, Circumcision, an ethnomedical study. It is certainly a book of great value to me and I find it endlessly fascinating. The photos of the two Turkish boys becoming Acorns are instantly memorable. I also find the personal accounts at the end of the book interesting, and often re-read them. I consider the witness to such events to be extremely honoured: how fantastic to see and record the cutting of that useless skin and the person emerge as an Acorn. Actually I have an intense desire to be present at such an operation and I wonder how I may achieve this aim? I wonder whether a detailed video exists? Anyway, keep up the good work.

M.H. – London E12

[Yes, both Mr Hasan and Dr Sifman do revision operations. The revised edition of Circumcision, an ethnomedical study is available from Acorn for £20, to include secure packaging and postage. It runs to 202 pages and includes extensive line drawings, illustrations and statistics. — T.A.]

USA — The Uncircumcised Society of America

Some Acorn readers may be able to get current and/or back copies of FQ, the official journal of the Uncircumcised Society of America. (FQ stands for Foreskin Quarterly). It is an A4 size printed magazine published quarterly at $3.50, illustrated with photos and drawings, with articles and contact adverts about foreskins plus regular reports from US Acorn, the pro-circumcision organisation. The FQ subscription is $14 for four issues from Desmodus Inc, PO Box 11314, San Francisco, CA 94101, tel (415) 978-5377. USA club membership is $25 (including FQ) and correspondence should be addressed to Bud Berkeley, PO Box 26011, San Francisco, CA 94126. There is also an organisation called ENIGMA 'for persons into genital modification in its many forms on a fantasy or reality level', with a quarterly members-only newsletter: its address is ENIGMA, c/o Lafargewerks, 2329 N. Leavitt, Chicago, IL 60642 (I have not seen this, but it sounds interesting). Be sure to state that you are over 21 years of age in any correspondence to any of these organisations.

Revision: And Attitudes To Circumcision In The USA

Dear Tony: It was Dr Newill who originally circumcised me, and it appears that I am not the only Acorn member to have paid him a visit. Though no longer in practice, it was to him that Forum used to refer enquiries for circumcision in the 1970s. He used to prescribe stilboestrol to prevent erections, a precaution no longer followed.

So why am I considering a revision? Again, the principle reason is cosmetic, for the same reason that I never particularly liked my foreskin in the first place. My circumcision is relatively loose, with about 15mm of inner foreskin remaining on the upper side of my penis, and slightly more by the frenulum. This skin tends to bunch up behind the rim of my glans, and when I am completely flaccid I can pull it most of the way over the glans. This isn't quite what I was looking for, although I didn't know enough to realize it when I first visited Dr Newill.

People tell us that moderation is a good thing in most matters, but in this case my feelings are not moderate: I wish to be completely, utterly circumcised. Including the removal of the frenulum, although I want to know much more about the method and implications of such an excision.

Masturbation methods? Before my circumcision, my customary position would be lying on my back on the bed. I would fully grip my penis, firmly but not tightly around the shaft, using the same grip as you might use to pick up a can of pop (not that I'm anywhere near comparable in thickness!) I would then pull the foreskin back and forward over the glans at a steady rate, maybe 2 or 3 strokes a second. This would speed up as I neared orgasm, of course, and I always tried to time my ejaculation on a down-stroke. I found that this produced a more explosive orgasm, especially if it had been two or three days since my last wank. It also ensured that the semen would shoot further, and it made wiping up afterwards easier as less semen tended to get on my hand or penis. I would normally place a pair of underpants on my stomach to receive most or all of it, to avoid having to go to the bathroom afterwards.

And since my circumcision, the basic position and grip remain the same. The only difference is that now I rub the loose shaft skin up and down, gently rubbing against the glans rim on each stroke. I don't actively touch my glans apart from this, nor do I use any lubricants. Masturbating doesn't take any longer: the speed I reach orgasm is entirely dependent on mood and the length of time since I last came. One thing, though: I find that I am at my 'quickest' after about four days of abstinence. On the rare occasions when it has happened, I have found that after 7-10 days of abstinence it can take a while to remind my genitals of their capabilities. Has anyone else noticed this?

Circumcision in the USA is of course still very popular. Recent statistics indicate that about 60 per cent of boys experience either the Gomco clamp or the Plastibell before they leave hospital. It is a subject of widely differing views, and every once in a while the subject is discussed in the papers or on TV. The rate has dropped dramatically, however, since peaking between 90 to 95 per cent about 15 years ago. There are many reasons, such as:

1. Medical insurers generally won't cover the $100-$150 cost.
2. Information and advice, most of which indicate that circumcision is not medically beneficial.
3. Parental concern over possible pain and suffering.
4. Rare but well-publicised mishaps.

5. Lawsuits, notably in California, where parents and doctors alike have been charged with everything from assault to child abuse.

California has a state law that forbids unnecessary surgery without the written consent of the participant. This is a contributing factor to the circumcision rate falling below 50 per cent there. In general the rate is highest in Eastern and Midwestern industrial states, and lower in rural areas. Delaware is the champ, at 96 per cent. Parents tend to opt for the operation for many reasons, such as:

1. So that Jimmy will look like the boy next door and won't be embarrassed in the locker room in years to come.
2. Family history. Your father is circumcised, your grandfather is, your uncles and cousins are, etc.
3. Cleanliness. This reason is magnified, since the vast majority of American women have never seen a foreskin and have no idea how to care for an intact penis.
4. So that it won't have to be done later in life.
5. Disease. Rumours that wives of foreskinned husbands have a higher rate of cervical cancer circulate: they have largely been discredited. However the American Academy of Pediatrics on March 6 1989 altered its policy and indicated that circumcision can prevent some urinary tract infections early in life.
6. Recently a Boston hospital provided another reason. They have developed a procedure that uses circumcised foreskin in the treatment of burn victims.

Women's attitudes? I have the impression that the woman tends to be the decision-maker about circumcision. In some ways this reflects a society that is matriarchal in some respects. Generalization isn't fair of course, but in the normal American family structure, responsibility for health care tends to fall on the mother: just an impression.

As for women's attitudes towards sexual partners, circumcision is their expectation, it's the norm, and no big deal. The few women with whom I've discussed the subject seem to have a quiet, amused curiosity about foreskins, though. Maybe that's why European visitors are sometimes very popular!

S.W. – Massachusetts, U.S.A.

NO-CIRC

Dear Tony Acorn: Before World War II any excuse was good enough to have your little boy circumcised. After the war circumcision was no longer an option: the doctors declared in their collective wisdom that such justifications as health, social class, preventing of bad habits, cleanliness, were not valid. In the 1970s even those most ferocious of foreskin removers, the Americans, have been undermined by a band of women who formed NO-CIRC. They gained quite wide support, especially in the western states, in their crusade to preserve the nation's collective foreskin against what they described as an illogical, unnecessary and barbaric mutilation.

But the fanatical foreskin loppers have countered. In a desperate bid to halt the rapid spread of the intact penis, which they condemn as Un-American, they have hit upon a new double-pronged approach, claiming that (1) foreskins make AIDS easier to catch, and (2) foreskins lead to urinary tract infections.

My comments are these: as far as AIDS is concerned, anyone who takes comfort from such a claim deserves to be branded twit of the year. As for the second claim, I'm inclined to believe that the infections concerned are very minor ones which clear up of their own accord. After all, if such infections led to a higher rate of kidney disease deaths, or dialysis demands, don't you think we'd hear about it? As one who bitterly resents a wrecked life as a result of an unnecessary mutilation, I have to ask, what has circumcision done to increase the sum total of human happiness?

R.B.W. – Bedford

[To answer your last question, you need only look back to the letter earlier in this issue, 'Circumcised, and what a relief!' Please let us know exactly how your life was wrecked, since otherwise you simply oppose your assertion to the factual and circumstantial evidence offered by M.H. and the other pro-circumcision correspondents whose letters have appeared in Acorn.

On AIDS, it seems increasingly clear that the strongest factors facilitating its spread are behaviours which allow the HIV virus into the bloodstream. Shared drug-taking needles are obviously one of these. Others are any form of sex in which there is risk of abrasion or bleeding, anal sex especially. It is possible that the circumcised penis may be less easily abraded, because of the toughening effect on the delicate mucous membrane when it is permanently exposed. But any reduced susceptibility to infection is likely to be only very small: certainly not worth trusting your life to.

On urinary infections and kidney disease, both of them are unpleasant, debilitating conditions. The latter is sometimes fatal, and they are linked. It is a regrettable fact that waiting lists for kidney treatment in Britain are considerably longer than in the US. The US evidence, carefully considered by senior US medical opinion, seems to indicate that the risks of these diseases are reduced by infant circumcision. Why run higher risks for the sake of avoiding a simple surgical procedure? — T.A.]

Another Medical Examination

Dear Tony: Further to Mac of Ayrshire's masturbation method, when I tried it I was damaged inside and out. I must have damaged the urethra, because I remember that having a pee afterwards was a very painful experience. The frenulum, the remainder of the foreskin and the glans all bled.

When I was 28 I applied to work for an American bank as a translator in six languages. To be accepted depended on a medical examination, and I was given the name and address of a specific doctor. I was extremely nervous at the time because I had been ill with duodenal ulcers a few years previously and I was afraid that he would spot something wrong. The doctor in question was well built, a bit like a rugby forward, middle aged, and had a very gruff manner. This indicated that he would stand no nonsense and expected his every order to be obeyed.

First there was a long list of questions, mainly to do with past illnesses: chicken pox, mumps, etc. I told him what, in my opinion, he needed to know. Gradually I relaxed: "This is easy." I thought to myself. Then came the dreaded words, "Please remove all your clothes." With that, he left the room. I stripped down to my Y-fronts, and then paused. Remembering his words, there had been a definite emphasis on 'all'. If I retained my underpants I imagined him returning and saying, "I thought I told you to remove everything." That would have been humiliating, so I removed my last vestige of clothing and lay on the couch. I had never been naked in front of a doctor since the age of nine, and began to feel the beginnings of sexual excitement.

The first job was to weigh and measure me. When on the scales, he moved the weights along the bar. In doing so he brushed his hand against my glans. This excited me, and I had difficulty in suppressing an erection. Back on the couch, out came the stethoscope.

When I sat up for him to listen to my lungs from the back, I noticed, to my horror, that a drop of clear fluid had appeared at the tip of my circumcised penis.

I lay back again and he started to feel around the duodenum and liver area. He asked if I had any discomfort and I said No. With that his hands proceeded to other areas of my stomach, which made my flesh quiver and, in turn, made my penis vibrate. By the time he got to my pubic area I was sporting a full erection. He apologised for causing the erection, but continued to probe around the groin and pubic bone, one hand grasping my penis while the other hand carried out the examination. Then he placed Kleenex tissues on my stomach and said, "I had better leave you to recover." Thus he left the room.

My mind was in a turmoil. I imagined he would write something on the form about me showing 'suspect homosexual tendencies', and that would be the end of that job prospect. The seminal fluid was in full flow, and I thought that if I were to masturbate, it would all be over in a few seconds. By the time the doctor returned I thought that I would have cleaned up and be back to 'normal'. But no sooner than I had started to stroke my penis than the door opened and in he came. "Is everything all right?", he asked.

I mumbled something about not being able to go into the street in my present condition. His next question was, "Do you want to toss yourself off?" With that I started in earnest. The doctor said that he would continue to fill out the form, and walked towards his desk, which was behind me. As he reached the couch he paused, and the next thing I remember, he was stroking my inner thigh and testicles. This sensation was too much to bear, and I ejaculated with a force which surprised even me. I attempted to clean myself up, but he stopped me and offered to do it for me, seizing several more Kleenexes and getting to work, remarking that he had never seen so much ejaculate before. As I left the building I thought that I would have to keep looking for a job. But my fears were groundless, and I started work ten days later.

Since then I have had a few other examinations but the doctors never attempted to give me an erection. It is my opinion that, as far as adult males are concerned, a doctor who induces an erection does it for his own pleasure, and in the hope that it creates mental turmoil in the patient. As a devotee of nudism, now able to see the world in a much calmer light, my attitude is that if that is what they want, that is what they are going to get. So to any doctors who might read this, should our paths cross, you are welcome to play around with my erection to your heart's content. I will just sit back and enjoy the male blessing of the ability to have an erection. When that ability is no longer there, that is the moment I'll start worrying.

I.M. – Sussex

Incidents When Young

The pathway that finally led to my own circumcision had three definitive turning points. The first was an incident when I was nine or ten years old. During one summer, my parents rented two big rooms in a country house near a lake. Several other rooms were rented to other families for the summer holiday. It was quite nice as there were many children with whom we could play all kinds of games. But one of the games was very special.

I don't remember how I got into the situation: I think I had unknowingly trespassed on the bigger boys' secret territory. I can remember a hut they had built in the woods. Anyway, they thought I needed to be punished. I was taken, struggling and terrified, to some kind of basement room while they talked about the punishment. One of the boys called, "Let's draw him on the guts." I had no idea what this meant, but I thought they would hurt me and I was very scared.

In the middle of the room was a thick wooden support, standing from the floor to the ceiling. Suddenly they pushed me towards it so that it was at my back. Then my hands were firmly tied behind the support. I was their prisoner, and they threatened to torture me unless I kept quiet. I was totally at their mercy, and I realised that by trying to fight back I would only make my situation worse, so I did not dare say a word. All the boys stood around in front of me, excitedly urging each other on. Then, with keen hands, one of them unbuttoned my shorts and snatched them down. A moment later my underpants were around my ankles as well and my small, hairless private parts were in the open air for all to see. Then one boy grabbed my prick, and it stiffened a little. I can remember it well, because I had wondered why it sometimes stiffened. All I knew then was that my prick was only for peeing. As he kept on fingering my prick, I looked down in apprehension, wondering what he was going to do to it. Then, all of a sudden, I felt a very sharp feeling; not pain, but like an electric shock, and now my foreskin was pushed back and my bright red, glistening and shining glans was exposed for the first time ever.

I was stunned. I had no idea that such a thing could be done. The boy still had hold of it, and he kept my foreskin pushed back very firmly, while the others all looked closely at my virgin naked glans. The sight of my own naked glans excited me very much, and I got a violently throbbing erection. Only when they had all had a good long look, they released me. I can still remember very clearly how one boy, the smallest, said: "Are you happy now that it's done?" I was bewildered, shocked, but also excited. The incident taught me for the first time that the foreskin could be pushed back. I did not possibly understand why it was like that, but soon I got into the habit of drawing my foreskin back to look at my glans when I was lying in the bath. It was curious how it came into sight. I almost always got an erection while doing this, but I was too innocent to understand how to take the next step.

Incident Number Two came when I was twelve. I went to school as usual one morning in early autumn. When I entered the classroom, at once I noticed that something was going on. All the other boys were ominously silent, not shouting and calling to each other as usual before the lessons began. I had been off school with a cold for two days, so I knew nothing. Then one boy said: "Don't you know? We've got to have a medical examination during the gym lesson. The gym teacher told us yesterday to wash ourselves thoroughly clean this morning, everywhere. Are you clean?" My heart went boom-boom. Wash everywhere? That was ominous. Then I remembered how one of my friends at another school had told me how all the boys in his class, when they were between eleven and twelve, had had a balls-check, as he put it. It meant that during their medical examination, for which they had to be nude, a woman doctor had very carefully examined and fingered their testicles (I guess to find out if they were properly descended). One of his class-mates got an erection, but the doctor just smiled and told the boy to relax. Now we were all aged 11-12: would it be our balls-check? I was a bit frightened, but also in some way I wanted it to happen: it was a thrill.

Then it was time for the gym lesson. We sat on the benches in the changing room, waiting for what would happen next. Our gym teacher came in with the doctor, a friendly-looking young man. The teacher asked what clothes, if any, we were to keep on. "Underpants only", said the doctor. So we all undressed to our underpants. Then our teacher explained. "You, next to the door of the gym hall, you'll be first. While he is there, you (that was me) watch the door, so that no-one goes through it before he returns. After that, you go in and you (the boy next behind me) stand by the door, and so on. Do you understand?" We nodded silently, and the first boy went in. After a few minutes he returned and we all surrounded him and asked: "What happened? Did it hurt?" and so on. He was bright red, and looked very embarrassed. He did not say a word, but just began to get dressed. What had happened in there?

It was my turn, and I would soon have to find out. I went in, and the doctor, sitting at a small desk, motioned me towards him. Behind his desk was another at which the gym teacher sat. He passed the doctor my health record card, and the examination began. It was the usual thing, looking in my mouth – say ah! – listening to my heart and lungs. Then a pause. Was that all? No balls-check? My heart was beating vigorously. He was looking at the card. Then he said, "Well, now this." As he said it, he put his hands on my underpants at the sides, took hold of the side seams, and gently but firmly pulled them down to my knees. I saw flames. He looked at my small, hairless prick and balls for a while. Then he touched my scrotum gently with his fingers: a balls-check indeed. Then, saying "Now this", he grabbed my prick with his thumbs and forefingers on both sides, right in the middle, and lifted it to a horizontal position. Then he simply pushed my foreskin back – by now it went quite easily – and looked closely at my naked glans. At once, in my thoughts, I was back in that basement. To my horror, my now-erect prick started pulsating. To make things worse, I could see the gym teacher only two meters away, staring insolently. My prick went stiffer and stiffer. Then the doctor just smiled and said, "All OK there too", and flicked my foreskin forward again. The examination was over. I walked back and got dressed. I don't know why, but I had been strangely very excited when I saw how my own glans came to sight as the doctor pushed the foreskin back. I think this feeling might be one of the many reasons for the origin of circumcision: mankind probably invented it during the Stone Age.

Just a few weeks later Incident Number Three occurred. It was perhaps the most decisive on my road to circumcision. A new family moved into the flat next door. They had three children, a girl of about 20 and two boys, one 14 and one 12, my age, called Peter. I liked him, and we soon became friends, as children that age do. We played all kinds of games together, but sex was never mentioned between us. Then, one day, the boy who had told me about the balls-check said that when they had been weighed and measured at school they had all been nude. They had all noticed how Peter was different. "How?",

I asked, of course. He said, "His prick was different." I was very curious to know more, and he said that it was not that it was exceptional in size, but it was a different shape. He said, "It was not sharp and tapering at the end, but round and blunt, stumpy." Of course I wanted to know more, but he couldn't explain it any better. I had to find out myself.

So, when we were playing one day I simply suggested to Peter that we show each other our pricks. At first he did not like the idea, and refused. I tried to persuade him. I had made a scale plastic aeroplane model of a Fairey Gannet which he thought was marvellous. I promised it to him if he would show me his penis. This did the trick, and he agreed. We decided to meet at his place that evening, when his parents would be out. I rang the door bell, and as he opened the door we grinned at each other. We went to his room and started a game of Monopoly. His parents were about to leave. His mother gave us some biscuits and lemonade, and told us to be good. As soon as the front door shut behind them I wanted to begin, but he said we should wait in case they came back for something they had forgotten. We went on playing, and after about ten minutes he said: "OK, let's go to the bathroom."

I remember clearly that my penis was as stiff as a pencil in my pants, so stiff it almost hurt. When we got to the bathroom I said: "Starkers?" and he nodded. In a few moments I was naked. I undressed much quicker than he did, so that I could watch him. When he just had his underpants on, he seemed to hesitate. I said I had been told that his was different, and he said: "That's right." "Let me do it", I said, and began to pull his underpants down slowly, like the doctor at school. He didn't mind, but commented on how stiff my prick was. As I pulled his pants down he looked down, smiling. When his penis finally came in sight, I was speechless. I hadn't seen anything like it in my life. I was more than stunned to see that there was none at all of the "elephant's trunk" which was at the end of every prick that I had ever seen. The glans was completely bare, the rim and all. There was also a very peculiar ring on the shaft, about 1-2 cm behind the rim. I looked more closely, and it seemed like a scar. "What has happened to it?" "It was cut." "When?" "A couple of years ago. My brother was cut as well. They call it circumcision." "Did it hurt awfully?" "I was put to sleep, so I couldn't feel a thing. But it hurt quite a lot for a couple of days afterwards." "Why on earth was it cut?" "My parents said it had to be done." "Well, was it necessary?" "I don't know, really. They just took me to hospital, and it was done there." As we talked, he, too, got an erection. I touched it and noticed how the skin was taut, not wrinkled along the shaft: so taut that it curved slightly upwards. I was astonished and amazed. Why had they cut his prick? "Does it bother you?" "I didn't like it just after it was done, but it doesn't bother me any more now." "And your big brother was cut as well?" "Yes." "And they just said it was necessary?" "That's right." "But do you like it like that?" "Why not? I don't worry about it any more."

Now it was his turn to examine my stiff prick. Like an expert, he pushed back my foreskin. "You see, this skin was cut away," he said. Then he started sliding my foreskin back and forth, and I got a very strange feeling right in my penis. "What are you doing?" "Just watch." I leant against the edge of the bath tub and watched while he continued. Now my glans was covered, then exposed, then covered, and so on. The strange feeling grew stronger and stronger, then there was a feeling like thousands of ants on my legs, and the tickling sensation right in the end of my prick grew immense. My eyes closed and I saw lightening. Then I was panting for breath, and felt like collapsing. My prick end was bright red, and how it throbbed. "That's a wank", Peter said. "Didn't you know about that?" "A wank?" "Yes. Didn't you like it?" "Marvellous. How did you find out?" "My brother showed me. We often wank each other. Now it's your turn."

So I grabbed his prick, but the skin on his shaft could not move much, so I could just twitch the end. "No. Use this." He took a bottle of some kind of cleansing cream and poured it all over his prick and my fingers. Now his stiff prick was slippery. He told me to concentrate my fingers at the head of his penis. I rubbed his glans to and fro, and as I did so I noticed how his stomach moved in and out. He began to sigh and pant, and then his whole body jerked, and he told me to stop. We stood there a long while, just looking at each other's penises. It was marvellous, my very first time. "Now you know how to do it." "Your brother showed you, then?" "Yes, but he is different. There is hair around his prick, and when I do it to him, his prick squirts." "Squirts?" "Don't you know anything? He squirts semen from his prick, just like a grown up. We'll do the same soon." Having a big brother, he knew so much more than I did.

After that we had these sex sessions quite often. But that very first time was still the nicest of all. To be wanked to my first climax by a beautifully and totally circumcised boy: that was a thing to remember. We wanked and wanked. Soon we both began to squirt, only a drop or two at first, then much more. We started to grow hair. Then he moved away, I was alone, and these happy years ended. But now I knew about circumcision, and I began to look for more information about it. I read everything I could find. I soon realised that each time I wanked, my fantasies were the same, about circumcision. They still are. Circumcision and everything about it excited me erotically. It still does. It wasn't long before I wanted to be circumcised myself. I dreamt of converting to Judaism, or being captured by a gang of furious Arabs and circumcised by force, and so on. Then I saw a picture in an American medical book. It was a close-up photo of the erect penis of a young teenager. But the startling thing was that it was very, very nicely circumcised. Not the slightest bit of loose skin. Everything on that penis was totally bare, for ever. It was too much. I had to get myself circumcised, come hell or high water. The only problem was, how?

Then I got a wild idea. From the stories I had read, I knew that the operation itself was a quite simple and trivial one. After all, primitive tribes practice it successfully. If it was dangerous, the custom would have disappeared long ago. I thought I would do it for myself, or at least try to make a start. At this point I must mention that my foreskin was of the very childish sort: very long but loose and, more important, very thin and elastic, not at all thick and fleshy as is so often the case in adults. In fact, it was a typical elephant's trunk. I decided that I would split my foreskin lengthwise along the upper side, from its orifice to the rim of my glans. As you know, this slitting is sometimes used as a cure for phimosis, at least in emergency. I thought that after slitting it I would perhaps do the circumcision itself, depending on how easy or difficult it was to make the slit. If I could do nothing more and had to seek professional help I could always explain that it had been slit in an emergency. At least then I would also have a 'medical' reason to be circumcised.

I collected all the items I needed: gauze, antibiotic powder and ointment, disinfectant solution, some extremely sharp eye-surgeon's scissors, and, most important of all, some anaesthetizing ointment. Then one evening I decided to go ahead. First I shaved away all my pubic hair to minimise the risk of infection. (I still keep it shaved to remind me about my circumcision.) Then I pushed my foreskin fully back and applied the ointment thickly on my glans and on the inner surface of foreskin. I pulled the foreskin forward again and also applied ointment on the outer surface. Then I wrapped my penis tightly in a small plastic bag so that the ointment would penetrate effectively. I decided to wait for two hours, so watched television and drank some wine.

Then I began. I washed off the ointment carefully. While doing this I noticed how my whole penis, and especially the to-be-wounded part, was well numbed. I pinched my foreskin as hard as I could: I did not feel a thing. Then I cleaned my glans and foreskin, the scissors and everything with the disinfectant solution. Now I started. I pulled my foreskin forwards so that it was on the stretch. I then pushed one of the blades of the scissors in at the opening of the foreskin on the upper side of the penis, until the end of the blade reached the neck of my glans. I could easily see where it lifted up my thin foreskin. Then I waited a second, and began to cut. I was stunned. As I cut my foreskin, I could not feel a thing, and it was as easy to do as if I had been cutting a thin sheet of paper. In a second or two I reached the glans rim and it came into sight. I took the scissors away and looked at it. There was almost no bleeding: just a few little drops. My freshly split foreskin hung down a bit and the upper surface of my glans was bared. I was very much encouraged by this (and by the wine), so I decided to do a total circumcision right away. I grabbed one of the skin flaps on the left side and pulled it taut. Then I put the scissors at the end of the slit wound, a bit behind my glans, and started to cut round and downwards. I soon reached the underside: it was almost as easy as the initial slit. Then I did the same thing on the right, but came to a spot where it hurt like hell. I could only cut bit by bit, a very little at a time. I could not possibly leave it like this, but luckily this sensitive area was not too great and I was able to go on. I reached the underside and cut right through my tightly stretched frenulum: again I could not feel a thing. Now I felt funny and relieved as I saw my cut foreskin fall onto the newspaper on which I was squatting. I sat there a while, staring at my wounded penis: big red drops of blood were now falling rapidly on the newspaper. But I was so happy to have rid myself of my foreskin that I was not at all worried about the blood. I wrapped it with absorbent tissues to dry it, then I put antibiotic ointment on it, then I sprinkled antibiotic powder all over it and bandaged it firmly and thickly. I put three pairs of short tight underpants on and went to bed. Thanks to the wine I soon fell asleep.

As I woke next morning I could see that I had not bled much in the night, though there was a small bloody spot on my outer pair of underpants. I took off all three pairs, and the gauze bandage was totally red with blood, but not too wet. I got into a bath so that the water would dissolve the coagulated blood: I did not want to tear the wound open again as I changed the dressing. I took off each layer of gauze, and with the final layer my glans came in sight. I knew that now it would be naked and bare for all to see for the rest of my life. This made me immensely happy, and the thought gave me an erection. That hurt, and it took some time and self-control before the erection subsided again.

My penis was no beauty: rather swollen, bruised a red-purple colour, and the wound gaping open a little, as I had not put in any stitches. But there was no infection, and it was not really bleeding: there was just some pink-stained clear fluid oozing from the cut. I rinsed away some blood-clots carefully, then again applied ointment and powder and a tight bandage. I did this every morning and evening for about two weeks. Each time the wound looked less and less nasty, the bruising turned blue then brown and faded. After about two weeks the wound was closed by a scab and was so dry that it did not need a bandage. After another two (or was it three?) weeks the scab fell away and my circumcision was completely healed. You will, of course, realise that I had been in an agony of anticipation for it to heal so that I could try out my newly circumcised penis, and now at last I could. I can remember my very first wank without a foreskin as though it were yesterday. I used a lubricant, as I had done when wanking Peter. The feeling of my fingers gliding back and forth over the exposed rim of my glans was ecstasy, and there was the fascination of exploring the new sensations at the scar-line where the inner and outer skin joined. I can not describe the joy I felt then, and ever since.

J.H. – Helsinki

Contact

A.R. – Hampshire would like to hear from any member resident in the south-west Hampshire area with a view to discussion of Acorn matters, particularly d-i-y techniques.

ACORN

1989 Issue No 7
(Formerly Issue P)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Dangers Of Rolling
Masturbation Method	Iain M.	Page 3
Ancient Priapic Religions	J.W.	Page 3
Circumcisers		Page 4
Weight Training As
Penile Exercise	John B.	Page 5
Observations	L.J.	Page 6
Peeing Styles	A.W.	Page 7
Bouvet Island	G.N.S.	Page 7
Naturism	J.W.	Page 8
Hair	A.W.	Page 8
My Hate/Love Relationship
With Foreskins	D.S.	Page 9
Glad To Be Circumcised	K.B.	Page 10
Helmets Or Anteaters	I.D.K.	Page 12

Continued on page 2

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Contents (continued)

Penis Survey		Page 12
Wrinkly, Stubby Or Roundy?	J.H.	Page 15
In The Name Of Tradition		Page 16
What's Yours Called?	T.A.	Page 18
GPs Urged To Improve Impotence Treatment		Page 18
Book Review	T.A.	Page 19
Infibulation And Piercing	D.N.	Page 20
Female Circumcision	W.S.	Page 21
Masturbation Techniques	A.F.	Page 22
Different Strokes	Dick	Page 24
Infibulation	J.McC.	Page 25

Editorial

Welcome: again to Acorn. This is issue 7/89 (originally called P, but there was no issue O, to avoid confusion with zero). It is extra long to include articles on infibulation, masturbation aids, female circumcision, the review of a novel of great interest to Acorn members, plus many letters. I hope there is plenty here to interest you. Please keep writing in with your own ideas, anecdotes, comments, stories and observations, information, fantasies as well as fact, provided only that contributions relate to our general phallic theme: cockspotting, circumcision, foreskins, 'getting the cock into the best possible shape' and putting the phallus to its most enjoyable use. We happily take contact requests (which may be edited): more would be welcome.

Survey: The last issue of Acorn included a survey of members' members: if you have not yet done so, please respond, indicating clearly whether you are a cavalier or a roundhead. The questions are repeated and the first replies are analysed in this issue.

Confidentiality: Contributions are identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Otherwise no name or address will be revealed to another member, but letters will be passed on if you wish to make contact. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with such guarantees of confidentiality in mind.

Subscriptions: Your £10 annual subscription pays for all the 1989 issues, including back copies. 1988 back copies (about 80 pages) are available for £5. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order payable to Acorn. Receipt will be acknowledged (generally by supply of what you have requested). They should be addressed to Acorn at the address on the front page.

Information: Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or give some specific advice. Acorn members include doctors who have said they are willing to help other members. It must be clearly understood, however, that any information published, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes a recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any information in this newsletter must rely on their own judgement, and does so at their own risk.

T.A.

Dangers Of Rolling Masturbation Method

Ian M (Sussex) comments about “Mac of Ayrshire’s” masturbation method (described in Acorn 1/89, p.7), which was to put the penis between the palms of the hands and move them in opposite directions. This was Ian’s first method of masturbating and, he says, “The result was a disaster: there was blood everywhere. I found that I had a number of cuts/tears, including the frenulum. Fortunately an older boy showed me how to do it properly a few months later.” A similar warning has come from another member who tried it. As he has a minor hypospadias (his urethra ends in an opening underneath his penis, level with the glans rim) he was able to inspect his urethra afterwards, finding it very red and bruised. So it would seem wise to use this method only very carefully or not at all.

On peeing styles, if I am on my own or have no objection to the man next to me looking at my penis, I have the thumb on top and the fingers underneath. Frequently, however, I am unable to pee in the presence of other men, or if I do not like the look of the man next to me I reverse the position (so that my hand hides his view of the bare end of my penis).

Iain M. – Sussex

Ancient Priapic Religions

I am interested in reading up on the old priapic religions: Roman, Egyptian, Scandinavian, or whatever. [Concise Oxford Dictionary: priapism: licentiousness; (pathologically) persistent erection of the penis (from the Greek, Priapos, the god of procreation)]. Is there a member who can recommend good source-books or other texts, preferably in English translation – I flunked O-level hieroglyphics and my Scandinavian would make a Norse laugh.

J.W. – Swaffham

Circumcisers

Price Rise: The Surgical Advisory Service, 108 Whitfield Street, London W1P 6BE (tel: 01-388 1839) has regularly advertised in Forum, The Observer and elsewhere: Circumcision available in one-hour brief out-patient visit to our London clinic. In June the price rose from £190 to £210, a figure which seems exorbitant, though they have had many satisfied customers/patients. Their Mr N. Hasan FRCS FICA, has consulting rooms at 22 Harley Street, London W1, 01-637 0491.

The following advertisement was in the Lancashire Evening Post of 23.5.89. Minor surgery: immediate low cost treatment by consultant surgeons for moles, lumps, warts, varicose veins, hernia repair, vasectomy, circumcision etc. For consultation Manchester and Bolton areas call or ask for information pack. The Chesham Clinic, tel: 021-643 7515. Would any reader contacting them please write in with their impressions as to the service offered and the prices charged.

The Initiation Society has moved from its postal address at 16 Berkshire Gardens, London N13 6AB 01-203 1352 (office, 24.5.89) 01-289 2573 (office), 01-888 1382 (home). They will send a printed list of currently approved and annually reviewed Jewish circumcisers (mohalim). Most only operate on infants and in a religious context only, but some (the medically qualified) will operate for adolescents or adults for non-religious reasons. Their Medical Advisor is Dr M. Sifman, 1 Stanley Avenue, Wembley, Middlesex HA0 4JF, 01-902 3887, worth approaching confidentially for consultation, circumcision, and revisions (second or tidying-up circumcisions).

Attempts to contact Islamic circumcisers via a questionnaire have not been very successful: if any member can help, please write in. Dr A. Singh, MB, BS, DLO, of 12 East View, Deepdale, Preston PR1 5AS, tel. 0772 52409, replied that he has been practising as a circumciser for about 22 years. All 150 operations during the previous year were religious, 90 per cent of cases were aged under 1 year and the rest under 5, and the charge was £40-£50 for a boy under two.

Dr Shaikh, of 48 Queen's Road, Walthamstow, London E17, 01-520 2625 (work) 01-505 5790 (home) does Islamic style circumcisions, without discussion as to the type of outcome which will result, but efficiently and inexpensively, charging half as much again for an adolescent or an adult as for a child under about 10.

Dr David Jackson, 63a Moscow Road, London W2, 01-229 3300, is 'willing to discuss problems of the foreskin and its retention, in writing or at surgery, free of charge.' He opposes circumcision.

Weight Training As A Penile Exercise

Dear Acorn: I was very pleased to find that your group is keeping going: so often groups such as this seem to get off to a good start and then, for one reason or another, fade into oblivion. When I initially joined Acorn I must admit I was slightly dubious, but to have these doubts published came as a delightful surprise.

The report in issue 3/89 of the meeting in Oxford was interesting. Although it may have been a little disappointing to you to have to confirm a small attendance and that those who were present were rather inhibited, in fact it re-assured me that Acorn members are genuinely seriously-minded and not just out for a laugh or a quick thrill. The topics and attitudes canvassed in the questionnaire for the next meeting sound fascinating. Unfortunately I don't think I will manage to get there, but best wishes for a successful meeting.

Regarding keeping the cock in good shape, I agree with M.M.G. – N.Yorks, when he says he has not found any commercial products really satisfactory for enhancing size. I've found, like him, that a shower spray, turned full on and as hot as you can stand it, is more effective than any 'erection cream'. I did find, however, that massaging afterwards, when the prick was hot and swollen, using an ordinary 'cold cream' or vaseline, could be done in such a way that girth and length were increased without in fact achieving full erection. It was then very pleasurable to restrict the hot and expanded cock in the skimpiest and tightest of briefs. Other members might feel this is perhaps masochistic – it is hard not to resist the temptation to bring oneself to the ultimate, but with an effort of will it can produce a new sensation which is very rewarding.

Perhaps, even for men with only an average sex drive, one of the most difficult things is to control cock stimulation and I've found a form of 'weight training' very helpful. As members will know, there are no muscles in the prick itself, but there are muscles at the base and between the legs which can be developed. This method is more fun with a partner but can be just as well practised on one's own and does not require any expensive equipment. It may be a little difficult for uncircumcised members, but with a little imagination I'm sure an adaptation could be worked out.

A small strap – possibly an old leather watch strap – is fastened immediately behind the glans with a string attached on the underside. The string is used to tie on graduated weights. Preferably you should stand (but it can be done sitting on the edge of a chair or bed so that the cock is free) and gently apply stimulation, which can be either manual or watching a video or reading eroticism of leafing through a magazine – whatever you find most exciting. As the cock begins to rise, fix a small weight to the string; if it still rises, add more weights. There comes a point when the weights are too much for the stimulation alone and the muscles have to come into play. It can be surprising how strong these base muscles can be. Not only is it a good genital exercise and enjoyable in itself: it is satisfying when you find you can lift greater and greater weights but it also, through control, mitigates premature ejaculation. I hope members find this idea helpful. Incidentally, a survey of the angle of erection related to age would be interesting.

John B. – Canterbury

[Thanks, John, for your ideas and your support. I hope that, if they have not yet done so, readers will reply to the questionnaire in issue 5/89, which will give the information which John has asked about. — T.A.]

Observations

In my youth there was only one boy in my class who was a roundhead: he was Jewish. The rest of us were cavaliers and never questioned for a moment that Jewish boys were not just born with a different penis from Gentiles. He was a curiosity and tried to hide in a corner when changing for games, but the teacher made him undress in full view of the whole class, poor wee soul.

My own foreskin could not be pulled back and it was not until around puberty that another boy informed me that his foreskin could pull back to expose a head just like David's. I must have a similar head if I pulled and stretched enough. I pulled and stretched, tearing the adhesions daily, until the head was exposed. From that day to this I have been turned on by the sight of a well-proportioned roundhead and the knowledge that if I could pluck up the courage, I too could look like that.

In the sauna I have been fascinated by two complete opposites. One man has obviously had all trace of his frenulum removed but the full length of his foreskin is retained at the front. Sometimes the head is completely covered with no opening at the tip for urinating. The foreskin covers the whole head like a hood and the opening is on the underside of the head where there is not even a wrinkle of surplus skin. At other times he uncovers the head and the front skin bunches up in a huge spare tyre like a swelling, while underneath is tight as a drum: it must pull his scrotum up if he has an erection. It is very curious and very interesting, yet he seems unaware that people like myself would love to ask some very personal questions. In Acorn 6/88 you have a letter from a man (F.S. of Hants) who has not been circumcised but has had his frenulum cut. That sounds exactly what this man had done. I would be interested to hear if this allows the foreskin to be kept back exposing the whole head, or pulled over to cover the tip like an anorak hood: I think anorak hood describes it best – very sexy!

The other one has a small but beautifully circumcised penis, tight as a drum with not a wrinkle of surplus skin to be seen at first glance. However on the underside he seems to have retained an outsized over-developed frenulum, sometimes just an empty bag of wrinkled skin and at other times it is swollen and filled with blood like a growth. This is apparently very sensitive. He pulls and stretches it until it hangs like a pigtail of loose skin beyond the tip of the glans. He then does press-ups, allowing just the tip of this skin but not the glans to touch the floor, sensing how far down to go when this skin merely brushes the floor. This induces a semi-hard which seems to bring immense satisfaction.

I have read that one can masturbate by pulling the frenulum and touching nothing else, and I presume that he has stretched his to freak proportions. Then I read about a button-hole method of circumcision, when a hole is cut in the foreskin level with the glans rim and the head pushed through so that all the foreskin hangs under the glans, where it is stitched and left to hang like a huge tassel. You have also had a letter from a man complaining that his surgeon did a neat job but left him with an unsightly tassel dangling from the underside. The reply was that this tassel of foreskin is very sensitive to touch, which his partner should take advantage of during foreplay.

Obviously there is much more to circumcision than just chopping off the surplus foreskin. The subject is fascinating.

L.J. – Glasgow

Peeing Styles

Issue 2/89 raises the interesting question of how the penis is held when urinating. As a boy I only knew of the under-hand hold, and was most surprised to find the over-hand method frequently used by French servicemen during my time at a French Air Base thirty years ago. I only remember seeing the over-hand hold used twice in this country, once at the Exeter service area on the M5 last year, and once in Crawley this month. Maybe a survey to indicate national preference should be undertaken. Incidentally, how many uncircumcised men retract their foreskins when peeing?

A.W. – Burgess Hill

Bouvet Island

This is owned by Norway and situated in the Atlantic, as far south as Cape Horn and due south of Lagos, Nigeria. About 9 km by 7 km and largely covered by an ice-cap, it is uninhabited except by penguins, elephant seals and other wild-life. It was discovered by a French adventurer, Jean-Baptiste-Charles Bouvet, after whom it is named. He sailed round its cape on 1st January 1739, so he named it in honour of the day in the church calendar, Kapp Circoncision. (Scanorama, April 1989, pp 85-94)

With thanks to G.N.S. – Oslo

Naturism

Is there information among the membership to compile a Good Beach Guide? Naturist beaches, that is, either official or unofficial, or else other suitable spots for nude sunbathing/swimming. Apart from how to get there, they could be graded by Surroundings: 1: dismal, 3: satisfactory, 5: excellent.

Welcome: 1: strict antiseptic 'naturist movement' – bring a wife and at least two children, all of them your own.
2: family orientated/couples.
3: all welcome on their own merits.
4: broad-minded.
5: gentlemen should wear a chastity belt.

At one time Forum used to advertise a guide to Free Beaches, but I haven't seen it mentioned for some time.

J.W. – Swaffam

[Dear JW: Try Health and Efficiency: they advertise a 1989 Naturist Guide-Book to Britain, £4.80 from Coast and Country Naturist Publications, 3 Mayfield Avenue, Scarborough YO12 6DF. Most probably rate low on your welcome list, but one which from the ad seems to rate as much as 3 is Eureka, Manor Lane, Fawkham, Kent DA3 8DN tel 04747 4418 or 0474 64207.

Personally, given the British climate even in a good summer, I'd rather hear about Saunas, to which similar ratings could apply: any information on these? — T.A.]

Hair

from Health & Efficiency No 915, 10 August 1974,

Please let this urgent prayer abolish pubic hair.
Let crotches be bereft of all that hides the cleft.

I'm all for depilation and for deforestation:
The vulva should be seen as scrupulously clean.

Let girls be unafraid to wield the razor blade:
If necessary, push the mower through the bush.

Let all stomachic flesh seem elegantly fresh,
Let all the lurking thighs relinquish their disguise.

Let girls who keep their crop remember I've a strop.
I love all girlish hair: on scalps, but not elsewhere.

with thanks to A.W. – Burgess Hill

My Hate/Love Relationship With Foreskins

Dear Tony: Many thanks for making me a member of Acorn. It's great to know I belong to a unique group of penis enthusiasts. With regard to the foreskin, I seem to have had a foreskin love/hate relationship with the subject. I was born with a foreskin which would not retract and, having an intense interest in my cock from a very early age, I found it somewhat uncomfortable and restrictive. As my masturbating increased, so did my frustration.

One day, soon after my tenth birthday, while wanking I accidentally 'unhitched' the small piece of skin causing all the trouble. I was both elated – I could now see the knob of my cock for the first time and frightened – had I done myself harm? My penis bled, of course, and I watched it's progress with daily anguish. Of course the tear healed and masturbation became a joy. I decided I had circumcised myself, but now I know I only tore a part of the frenulum.

As my teenage years continued, I realised I was definitely bisexual, but a new problem arose. I found I disliked cavalier cocks – not only disliked them but hated them! I guess it was some sort of psychological hang-up, but the very thought of touching or sucking an uncircumcised cock made me feel quite sick, so I simply refused all that came my way and enjoyed only the roundheads. This state of affairs continued for some years, until the age of nineteen.

One day, our rented TV set went 'on the blink' and my parents were out when the repair man called. He fixed the set and I made coffee. He said he was dying for a piss and I showed him to the bathroom (we had a bungalow at the time). He kept on talking, so I stayed. I remember thinking: Okay, if he's going to let me watch him, fine. I've always enjoyed watching other men piss.

But he didn't. Still talking away, he stood at the side of the toilet, slowly rolling his foreskin back and forth. I couldn't take my eyes off it, and his foreskin was the extended type that came about three inches over the knob, and when pulled back went right over the glans leaving it glistening and superb! He said, "You like that, don't you?", and when I confirmed it, he told me I could play with it. Well, that was it. I was converted. To think I had loathed foreskins for such a long time, and had now gone overboard for this one!

He rang a workmate and got him to do his other calls, and we spent the rest of the afternoon together, naked, hot and sweating, exploring penises, balls, arseholes, nipples, armpits, navels, feet, one of those wonderful occasions when sexual beauty literally overtakes you. We became friends for two or three years, until my parents decided to move house, taking me with them. But during that time I learned how to love the foreskin. I discovered the thrill of having my cock enveloped in his foreskin and being wanked together in the tight tube of flesh until we both exploded inside his foreskin. I watched, spellbound, as he held his skin up with two fingers of each hand to form a 'tower' into which he would slowly piss until it came to about a quarter of an inch from the top (he had remarkable muscle control): then he invited me to 'drink from the cup'. I should add here that this was reasonably safe as well as enjoyable then.

He would wrap his foreskin over my tongue, my nose, my fingers, my big toes – both together! He was remarkable, the things he could do. I would dearly love to repeat those fantastic experiences. You could sum me up now as simply a cock lover – roundhead and cavalier – and I'm glad and grateful that the things that happened did so when they did. Now I'm 46, and proud to be a wanker. Viva, viva Acorn!

D.S. – Merseyside

Glad To Be Circumcised

Thanks to B.H. – Leeds for sending in the following letter from the US edition of Forum, which is rather better at covering Acorn's area of interest than the British edition:

I was very interested to read in the April 1983 issue of Forum the Open Forum letter on the Pros and Cons of Circumcision by W.H. of Pennsylvania, and would like to endorse the comments he made.

I was born with a long, completely adherent and unretractable foreskin but, unlike most boys in Australia, was not circumcised at birth. At the age of five, when I commenced school, I discovered the difference, and was ridiculed and taunted by the other children. I had no understanding of the difference and thought I must be some rare third sex. I didn't realize that under the skin was a glans like everybody else's. I became extremely envious of the other boys and felt very inferior, especially loathing all sports for which I had to undress in front of them.

Consequently I withdrew from sports and games. When I was seven or eight, I learned about circumcision at Sunday School and then realized that if I could pull the skin back, there would be a red knob underneath. I became very interested in knowing who of all the boys in my class were circumcised and who weren't, and I took note of all of them. I particularly envied any boy who had a large glans and a prominent and conspicuous corona, or one who had had the foreskin completely removed and had no loose skin on his shaft.

When I was 10 I decided that I must try to retract my foreskin, and I did this at night, in bed, with the aid of a flashlight to see. It was a very long and very painful process which took 15 months. The pain of pulling the skin back was comparable to tearing off a finger-nail. I could only pull it a sixteenth of an inch at a time, then put ointment on it and wait for some time until the soreness eased, then try again. I can remember very well the feeling of elation mixed with some undefined fear the night when the last adhesions remaining between the foreskin and the corona of the glans were broken and I pulled the skin right back for the very first time.

It was at about this time that I reached puberty and had my first erections and ejaculations. I developed the habit of masturbating a couple of times a day, and the foreskin, though fairly long, became looser on the glans and could be easily retracted. The glans was very sensitive, however – comparable to the sensitivity of an eyeball, and I found it very uncomfortable when I had a spontaneous erection and the skin peeled back, even if only the tip of the glans was exposed.

In time, as I entered my teens, my penis became much longer and fatter, and I embarked on the practice of keeping the foreskin retracted by keeping it held back with adhesive plaster. The glans became less sensitive, developed a round rather than pointed tip, and became drier. By my late teens, when my penis was flaccid my foreskin only covered half the glans and I could tolerate wearing it fully retracted so that the corona was exposed.

I still had an overwhelming desire to have myself circumcised, and when I was in my early 20s had my foreskin partially removed exactly as described by W.H. in his letter. After that the corona was exposed but residual skin was bunched up behind the glans and masturbation was still possible. Like W.H., I was still dissatisfied and resolved to have the residual skin removed.

I had made a study of the medical texts on circumcision and was very interested in the 'Plastibell' method, which involves no surgery but is based on the process of placing a plastic bell with a hole to allow the passage of urine on the glans, pulling the foreskin over it and tying the excess against the bell. In about a week the skin dies completely, the skin joins automatically just behind the point of tying and the extra skin and plastic bell drop off, leaving a neat, even, scar-free result.

The plastic cans used to hold 35mm film, I found, are ideal for the purpose if the base is cut off, since they have a small lip where the lid clips on and this lip can accurately locate the position for tying the excess foreskin. Using some sterilized cotton, I tied the foreskin, estimating carefully just what amount was needed to be pulled onto the bell in order to achieve the state of total circumcision which I wanted. The process was painless and after about week the tied-off skin had died and came away with the bell to leave a scar-free result.

I then possessed a penis that had a minimum of skin behind the glans when flaccid. Upon erection it stretched tight, but not to the extent that it distorted the glans. There is a sense of freedom from being 'muzzled', and my glans can expand and the corona develop without constriction.

I believe that there are several distinct advantages to being totally circumcised. First cleanliness and comfort. Second, the diminution of sensitivity, which some may question. But this has not worried me: intercourse takes longer and therefore is more pleasurable. Third, the glans, being unconstrained, can assume its full diameter, and this helps to fill the vagina. Fourth, there is lost motion, and friction occurs between the vagina and the whole length of the shaft. Fifth, with a totally circumcised penis, when erection takes place, the slight tension on the penis tends to sustain it in erection, which seems to be a distinct advantage as one grows older.

My penis is now over seven inches long when erect, with a glans diameter of two inches. I have visited England and the Continent, where circumcision is the exception rather than the rule, and have felt conspicuous looks from the others when I have been to changing rooms or saunas. Many women have commented on the excitement of my circumcised organ.

As has been mentioned in your excellent magazine, the only people who can make comments on this subject are the ones who can personally compare being circumcised and not. I trust my experience will be of interest to your readers.

Mr. K.B. – Australia

‘Helmets’ Or ‘Anteaters’

Joseph Wambaugh uses these categories of men in his book The Choirboys: the anteater has a long trunk-like nose or snout.

I.D.K. – IoM

Penis Survey

The dimensions are as follows:

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scar-line from glans rim.
If uncircumcised: U
6. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, flaccid?
7. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, erect?
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight (T) or loose (L)?
9. When standing against the wall with erect penis, how far from glans tip to nearest part of stomach?
10. Height
11. Age
12. Identification (initials and place).

All measurements are in inches (except height in feet and inches), rounded to the nearest 0.1, so  $\frac{3}{4}$ " or 0.75 is given as 0.8, since such measurements are incapable of greater accuracy.

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12
Cavaliers
4.5	6.5	4.5	6.3	U	12	8	L	4.5	5'8"	30	N.T. – Guisborough
3.5	6.3	4	6	U	11	8	L	5.5	6'4"	64	E.S. – Salisbury
3	6.3	4	4.8	U	10	9	L	4	6'1"	26	Anon
5	7.5	4.3	5.5	U	1	0	L	3	5'10"	50	E.L. – Bath
3.3	5	3.9	5	U	13	10	L	5	6'0"	54	M.M.G. – N.Yorks
4.1	6	4.5	5.6	U	11	9	L		6'1"	54	M.L. – Gwent
5	6	5.5	6	U	10	10	L	7.5	5'5"	68	J.T.D. – London
3	6	4	5	U	0	0	vL	1.5	5'10"	57	R.V.A. – Lancs
3.5	5	4.5	5	U	8	0-3	L	4	5'9"	46	D.S. – Merseyside
3.8	5.8	4	5.3	U	10	10	T	3	5'9"	29	J.A. – York
3.5	5.5	3.5	4.8	U	10	8	L	4.5	5'8"	69	A.R. – Hampshire
3	4.7	3.5	4.4	U	10	9	L	4	5'8"	45	J.H. – Kent
3.3	5	3.5	4.4						5'5"	26	Minima
3.8	5.9	4.2	5.3						5'10"	49	Averages
5	7.5	5.5	6.3						6'4"	69	Maxima
Roundheads
5	6.5	4.3	6	1	-	-	-	5	5'6"	49	G.P. – Perth
5.5	7.5	4.5	6	0.5	-	-	-	6	6'1"	63	A.W. – Burgess Hill
3.8	6.5	3.8	5	0.8	-	-	-	7	5'11"	35	A.G.T. – Hornchurch
2.5	5.5	4	5.5	0.5	-	-	-	4.5	5'10"	34	M.H.
3	6.5	3.5	5	0.5	-	-	-	H	6'1"	77	V. – Shropshire
4	6.8	when warmer
3.2	5.1	3.2	4.7	0.8	-	-	-	4.7	5'8"	30	J.H. – Finland
4	7.6	3.5	6	0.5	-	-	-	6	5'10"	56	R.W. – Sussex
2.5	5.5	3.2	4.7	0.5					5'6"	30	Minima
3.9	6.5	3.8	5.5	0.7					5'10"	49	Average
5.5	7.6	4.5	6	1.0					6'1"	77	Maxima

Comments

Numbers are too small for averages to be meaningful, but there was a greater range of flaccid measurements reported from the 7 roundheads than from the 12 cavaliers, while average erect lengths were greater for roundheads than cavaliers. Flaccid diameters were smaller for roundheads, but erect diameters were larger for roundheads than cavaliers. Most foreskins were long and loose, but two of 12 were normally kept retracted.

N.T.: I currently have a foreskin that has been permanently retracted for several years now. I have decided that it is time to get the job done properly. So several of my answers may change in the near future.

A.W.: Frenulum absent: this would be a useful additional item for the survey. Probably absent/loose/short would be sufficient information. As the survey sample is entirely self-selected from an already interested group, I don't think the results can be regarded as representative of the general population, but I await the report with interest.

Anon: It would be interesting to calculate the penis volume, but probably, taking the penis to be effectively a cylinder, with height  $h$  as length, circumference  $c$ , and 12.6 as equivalent to  $4\pi$ , and volume  $v$

$$v = c^2h/12.6$$

M.H.: My scar distance from rim erect varies from 0.5 on the right and in the middle to 1 on the left. This makes it slightly lopsided, but not noticeably so. Additional information: glans circumference flaccid 4", and erect, 5"; rim depth, erect: 0.25". Angle of erection, 45 degrees. Frenulum intact.

E.L.: Pulled-back cavalier.

V.: Flaccid measurements vary depending on whether the weather is hot or cold. My circumcision scar is difficult to see as no trace of foreskin remains. I can't give a figure for (9) because my erection doesn't get above the horizontal (H) these days, worse luck, in spite of frequent exercising (2-3 times per week). Another statistic occurs to me: my average amount of ejaculate is 1.5 teaspoonful.

M.M.G.: Flaccid measurements are rather variable, depending on temperature and whether I need a slash. Measurement 1 is an average over 3 days, min 3", max 3.65". Diameter is also slightly variable so this is an average. Glans coverage: when flaccid, the foreskin forms a 0.3" tube at the end of the glans; when erect, viewed from the front there is a bare circle of glans with a diameter of 0.4".

M.L.: When flaccid, my foreskin adds about  $\frac{1}{10}$ " to the length. It was tight as a child and permanently covered my glans until age 11. As an adult it is fairly loose. I don't understand Q9.

J.H. - Finland: I think that a totally circumcised penis having the circumcision scar well down on the shaft, so that a part of the inner and sensitive foreskin remains, is the most attractive sight, but as far as sexual performance is concerned, then the orthodox Jewish method is the best, with the delicate inner foreskin cut and torn away. I now wish that I did not have the 2cm wide strip of inner foreskin stated in my reply. When having sex, I often cover this over-sensitive part with liquid plastic plaster, so that only my glans gets rubbed. This allows me to prolong my climax as long as I want. When I finally reach it, it is definitely deeper and stronger than without the plaster.

R.V.A.: Having a short loose foreskin, I have been able to keep it permanently retracted. In this condition over the last few years, the skin of the knob is now very dry, similar to a circumcised one.

J.H. – Kent: Flaccid measurements are difficult to get accurately as my cock starts expanding as soon as I touch it and also factors such as heat make it vary. My flaccid length measurement is with the foreskin forward: it adds about 0.4" to the length (the questionnaire is obviously compiled by a roundhead). Mine must be one of the smallest cocks around, so I'll be interested to see how other members compare. However, size makes it no less effective, and I suppose that like many others I am more concerned with locker-room size than bed-room size.

It would also be interesting to know what sort of cocks well known people have, for example sports stars such as Ian Botham or Seb Coe: are they cavaliers or roundheads? I have always had a mental image of famous people being roundheads, and was surprised to see a photo of John Lennon with a very ordinary looking wrinkled cavalier cock.

Having seen much correspondence in Acorn regarding circumcision, in which I still take an interest, I think I still favour my foreskin as it gives me so much fun and versatility.

Wrinkly, Stubby Or Roundy?

Being a 'wrinkly', I find wearing my foreskin forwards in the normal state is both uncomfortable and I think less hygienic, and I always pull it back almost completely to pee. So for some time I have worn my foreskin in what I call the 'stubby' state, half way between a 'wrinkly' and a 'roundy'. I pull the foreskin back completely, then pinch it at the frenulum and draw it forwards again over the knob. In this way it rolls in on itself. According to how tightly I pull the frenulum, the result is a partially exposed knob which gives the cock a 'stubby' look. It also means that my knob is getting some exposure and therefore toughens up, and I also don't have to pull the skin back when peeing.

I still prefer wanking with the skin pulled back tightly as far as possible, i.e. just as a roundhead would, and I stimulate the whole shaft and knob till I shoot, when I take pressure off the knob because of sensitivity. I am trying to overcome this to see if I would get a different result.

J.H. – Kent

THE OBSERVER Sunday 5 March 1989.

FEMALE MUTILATION

In the name of tradition

IN VICTORIAN England, an eminent obstetrical surgeon, Dr Baker Brown, sawed off the clitorises of young women as a cure for 'feminine weaknesses'. The operation, performed with hooked forceps and a hot cautery iron, excised the part the doctor considered 'of little importance whether present or absent'. His patients included a girl 'addicted' to masturbation and a 30-year-old with an extreme distaste for her husband.

Approximately 80 million women and girls alive today have endured similar mutilation, according to the World Health Organisation. Most of those have experienced clitoridectomy, or removal of the clitoris.

Efua Graham, a Ghanaian woman, a trained nurse, and outspoken campaigner against female circumcision, has grabbed this controversial issue by the throat. Ms Graham's organisation, the Foundation for Women's Health Research and Development (Forward), recently organised the first conference for social, health and community workers on female circumcision. On 8 March, Forward will publish a report containing guidelines on female circumcision for every local authority in Britain.

The issue of female circumcision causes enormous anger and emotion. But Efua Graham

The issue of female circumcision provokes enormous anger and emotion. A new report is going to British authorities.

pitals are anaesthetics or antiseptics available. A group of women, often including the mother, hold the girl down.

Women remain infibulated until they marry, when they are opened with a knife or razor by their husband if he fails to penetrate the scarred tissue.

Shamis Dirir, Co-ordinator of the London Black Women's Health Action Project, believes things are beginning to change. 'So many women have stopped and don't care what the community thinks. We tell them it's not in the Koran, it's not culture, it's what men put on us. Twenty years ago I believed it was in the Koran, but now I know it's nothing to do with religion.'

Those who defend the practice say circumcised women are cleaner and more aesthetically pleasing, that it preserves virginity and prevents promiscuity. Most important, it increases a girl's chance of marriage.

I spoke to Fatima, a 25-year-old Somali woman, who has had her infibulated genitals opened. 'An old woman did it to me when I was nine. I couldn't do anything about it because I was young. If you refuse or if you run, everything is against you, race, language difficulties and the right of communities to defend their cherished customs.

Leila, a white British woman married to a Somali man for 35 years, says 'I am against what this country has done and is doing to these communities, not just the Somali community. People who don't know anything about it have made it illegal. And do you think it's not being done? It's still done. Unless they can afford to have it done in Harley Street, they take the children out of the country and bring them back circumcised.'

Leila had her eldest daughter, now 29, infibulated when she was 12, and regrets that she couldn't afford to have her two younger daughters circumcised.

The London Black Women's Health Action Project picks up the pieces by offering counselling to women who are still mentally scarred by their experiences of circumcision.

Efua Graham of Forward acknowledges that a mother who subjects her child to the knife does so from a genuine desire for her child to conform in a society in which uncircumcised women are inferior and unmarriageable.

Forward's report concludes 'female circumcision is cruel and outmoded, psychologically, politically and spiritually crippling and should be eradicated.' The report recommends that the ual argument is difficult. In some cultures they never talk about sex.

Efua Graham maintains it is dangerous to argue against circumcision on health grounds alone. 'Men and women have a distorted view of themselves and unless these distortions are dealt with it's difficult to persuade them of the health dangers. Even educated women who understand the health arguments have not had the courage to break away.

'In areas where clitoridectomy is more common, we don't stand a chance with the health argument, because women don't have problems during childbirth. You have got to get across that this is an interference with human rights and the rights of children. It's only when that's understood that people will feel a revulsion against it.'

Efua Graham is in no doubt that female genital mutilation is a mechanism for the control of women's sexuality. 'This is all about the social control of women. It is shrouded in myths and magic, but we are talking about power games. Our grandfathers were no scientists, but they knew where the seat of a believes the wall of silence around an issue which affects the health and well-being of hundreds, possibly thousands, of children in Britain must be torn down. Though it has been illegal since 1985 it is suspected that hundreds of British children are taken abroad for the operation.

'Black women should be in the forefront of the fight against female circumcision', she says, 'but we need to be aware that we will face attack from our own communities. I don't think it's very progressive to say: "We're not going to deal with this issue because there are racists out there who will say we are barbaric and primitive."'

Some form of female circumcision is practised in more than 20 African countries, from Senegal to Somalia; in Oman, South Yemen and the United Arab Emirates, and among Muslims in Indonesia and Malaysia. Excision and infibulation are practised by Moslems, Catholics, Protestants, Copts, and non-believers.

The most widespread form — excision — consists of cutting off the clitoris and all or part of the labia minora. Infibulation, practised in Senegal, Mali, Sudan and Somalia, is when the clitoris, labia minora and often the labia majora are removed, followed by the sewing up of the vulva. A matchstick-sized hole is left for urine and menstrual blood to pass through.

Old women or traditional birth attendants circumcise girls aged from a few days to 14 years old. The genitals are cut with knives, razors or glass, and thread or thorns are used to stitch the wounds. Only in hosbecause they all believe in it.

'I went to hospital in Abu Dhabi and had it opened. People of my age sometimes do. I am thinking about my health, and it's completely unhealthy. If a man says he is not going to marry me because I have had it opened, I will say: "go to hell".' The health arguments against infibulation are well-documented — retention of urine and menstrual blood, uterine and vaginal infections and complications during childbirth.

Shamis Dirir uses the health argument when trying to persuade women not to have their daughters circumcised. 'The only way you can stop it is to show how harmful it is. It's to do with health and also a woman's sexuality, but the sex-woman's pleasure lies and they damn well chopped it off. Women who have experienced it are mutilated psychologically as well as physically.'

Anna, a 21-year-old Masai woman from Kenya, came to Europe in 1984, but has been unable to form any loving relationships. 'It's like someone loves you and you can feel their love, and suddenly you are closed again. I think my circumcision has disturbed my becoming a woman.'

The banning in this country of a custom central to the traditional heritage of some of Britain's ethnic communities has driven the practice underground. In addition to the already toxic brew of problems surrounding child abuse, are questions of

DOD MILLER

Efua Graham, Shamis Dirir, and Amiria Ibrahim.

DXSS and a new category of the existing six categories of children at risk, Female Genital Mutilation. In addition, social workers, teachers, the police, lawyers, judges, and most critically, their educators, need to be educated.

In 1979, the World Health Organisation organised a seminar for 10 countries where female circumcision was practised. This recommended clear national policies for abolition, setting up national commissions, and more public education.

At the end of the day, Shamis Dirir believes 'It is worse to take the girls away from the family than to have them circumcised.' Everyone involved in this issue stresses that these parents may be very loving and caring. Efua Graham insists, however, that if the family persists despite all attempts to stop them, the children need to be protected. 'If they are aware of the law and still go ahead and do it, they should face the consequences. If you just ignore it, it may take three centuries to disappear. Change may happen quicker outside Britain than within.'

'When you come into this you are going to be attacked, but you must know exactly what your goal is and be firm. The moment you start wavering you confuse people. People may dislike me, but who is going to break the cycle for the future generation?'

ALISON WHYTE

■ Forward, The Africa Centre, 38 King Street, London WC2E 8JF; 01-379 6889. Report £3. The London Black Women's Centre, c/o Miss Shamus Dirir, Bethnal Green Hospital, Cambridge Heath Road, London E2; 01-980 3503.

What's Yours Called?

When writing in, most members refer to their 'cock', and the more scientifically minded to 'penis'. Obviously context makes a difference, and men probably use different names to their doctor (penis), to another adult (cock), to their partner, or to/among children (willy). Presumably 'joy-stick' was initially a rather risqué joke among pilots, but probably does not now cause embarrassment. Usually, however, an ambiguous word 'goes underground' when it acquires sexual connotations. For example, in the American language 'cock' is now not used in any 'polite' context: in the farmyard there are 'roosters', and water comes out of a 'faucet'. Very few lads would survive being named Willy these days, and it was firmly announced that the Prince would be either William or Wills. The 'Wicked Willy' books have a good following, partly because everyone gets the idea as soon as they see the title. Mine was 'little man' or 'man' in the nursery, 'cock' or 'prick' or 'knob' or 'wang' at school, and 'dick' in conversation with youngsters these days. Let us know what yours was/is called in these various contexts. What about 'slang' terms in other languages? In Egypt, cock is zibb and cunt is coose. Anyone know any more?

T.A.

GPs Urged To Improve Impotence Treatment

by Celia Hall (from The Independent 7 August 1989, p.3)

Half of all cases of impotence are in the mind rather than having physical causes, according to a report which advises family doctors to learn techniques which will help most of their male patients.

Instead of referring patients to hospital specialists, the Drug and Therapeutics Bulletin of 7 August 1989 recommends the prescription of drugs which achieve erections and the use of vacuum condoms which have the same effect. The report says that 80 per cent of men whose impotence is either physically or psychologically caused were helped with a drug combination including papaverine, which they can inject themselves. Papaverine is injected into the penis and works by dilating the tiny blood vessels providing there is an adequate blood supply.

'Self-injection is relatively easy and painless,' the Bulletin says, but it warns that the lowest effective dose must be given as excessive dosage causes 'prolonged' erection. 'Any erection lasting more than four hours needs prompt treatment and patients must know where to go for this. Vigorous leg exercises may produce detumescence,' it says.

The Bulletin also discusses the use of a vacuum condom called Erecaid, available only on prescription, which is a plastic cylinder placed over the penis and attached to a hand-operated pump. This creates a vacuum and thereby an erection. Another vacuum device called Correctaid is a condom-like device worn during intercourse. The vacuum is created by sucking air out of a tube. The Bulletin says: 'Self-injection with vaso-active drugs and vacuum condoms are successful and well-tolerated treatments for the majority of impotent men. Psychosexual counselling, if available, is an important adjunct to all treatments. ... Perhaps more physicians should develop an interest in treating impotence instead of relying on overloaded urologists.' But it warns that physical treatments should only be given after detailed discussion, in case they cause more anxiety than the impotence itself. They should not be used to 'fulfil the unrealistic dreams of already potent men'.

Book Review

Timothy Wangusa, Upon this Mountain (Oxford: Heinemann International, 1989, ISBN 0-435-90542-2, £4.25)

The setting is eastern Uganda, within sight of Mount Elgon, probably among the Gisu people. The time is the 1940s, well before the barbarities of Idi Amin, but when the 'red man' is offering new religious standards of which, in a central scene, he is shown to be in flagrant breach. The mountain of the title is also doubly symbolic. It is the peak to which the tribal people looks for identity and direction; where they might, perhaps, touch heaven. The first mountain man arose from a hole somewhere on this mountain: he and his descendants were the source of the ancient myths and legends. One of them married a daughter of the Kalenjin, who live on the sunrise slopes of the mountain. To win her as wife, Masaaba submitted to the Kalenjin rite of circumcision and promised to pass on that rite to his offspring in perpetuity, after his manly wound had healed in romance coming home upon a magic cobweb string, bringing with him the circumciser's double-edged Kalenjin knife (pp.79-80). The Kalenjin are a group of tribes in Northern Kavirondo (Idaxo, Isuxa, Logoli, Nyole) and further afield in Western Kenya, including Luhya, Marakwet, Nandi and Kipsigis. Circumcision is a 'rite of passage' to manhood central to their social structure, and as pastoral migrants through the Great Rift Valley they have probably been instrumental in spreading the custom as they travelled.

Second, 'the mountain' is the personal test of bravery and endurance, beyond the experience of boys in many other parts of the world, which must be faced by every boy before he can be considered man and a full member of society. The central significance of this test is a major theme of the novel. "Even if this famine continues forever, next year I must fall. I must be eaten by the knife", says Kangala, on whom a faint moustache is just beginning to germinate. The knife would raise him above the taunts of women. "But perhaps you'll go to hospital", teased Kangala. "You bazungu can't bear the courtyard." "Of course I can, and I will", replies Mwambu ... "I shall fall, or I should say 'stand'. I shall stand upon the courtyard." "Well, if you don't stand," is Kangala's sarcastic reply, "you can lie on your back." "Do you mean I shall fear imbalu?"

I won't." In contrast to the traditional courtyard ceremony, some lads go to hospital, where "You're circumcised by an uncircumcised circumciser, or even a woman. A womanly circumciser of womanly men." (p.44).

Two years later, although still considered too young himself, Mwambu joins the celebrations when his two cousins begin their month of dancing, feasting and collecting presents. At the climax, feet planted firmly on the ground, hands akimbo, facing the mountain, Butoto wa Mutoto enters with the knife. Kangala withstands the three-minute eternity triumphantly, to the relief and joy of all his friends and relations (p.64), becoming forever clean. But Wabwire cries out, pulling up his right leg and twisting his whole face, and pushes Butoto away with both hands. Four elders try to hold him. Then all his relations desert him. Only non-clansmen remain, among them Mwambu, to witness his agony and humiliation as he is held down to allow the circumciser to finish his work. His parents and relations share and suffer Wabwire's shame, his anger and disgrace, his terrible luck. (pp.68-70) The only role available to him after that is a socially ambiguous and effeminate one.

Later, as Mwambu comes home from another term at boarding school, a reception awaits him. He has waited too long, he is told, before facing his own test of manhood. "Pay your debt. Your debt to the mountain, here and now". But when stripped, he reveals that three months earlier he saw the doctor, and admits that he was circumcised in hospital. Someone suggests, "Circumcise him properly", but the reply comes, "One is done only once. Otherwise how could one swear by the knife?" Mwambu is told, "Alright, mistah, tuck in your shirt like a good little school-boy, hide your tail, and go. But never you be the first to open your mouth in the council of real men. Never you risk castration by being caught with the wife of a proper man. Go and tell your father that you're not a man. Go tell him that you're half a man." (p.116)

The centrality of the relationship of circumcision to manly status will strike a reverberant chord with readers of this Newsletter. But the novel, despite some sketchy writing in parts, is remarkable for its description of Mwambu's mental struggle to face the greatest challenge of his childhood. The author tackles not just the fear of failure but failure itself, something from which other writers have often backed away. Mwambu becomes a man, but fails the test of manhood. Is this also the legacy of colonialism?

Infibulation And Piercing

Dear Tony: I wonder if subscribers could be invited to report on the long history of infibulation. Most will know this to be body piercing to restrict sexual intercourse, the edges of the foreskin being clipped together and sometimes padlocked, perhaps with a partner holding the keys. I read somewhere that Roman Gladiators were dealt with in this way. Also that towards the end of the 19th century the female version was common in brothels, to get a semblance of virginity in young prostitutes by claspings or stitching the labia together.

I should also be interested to hear of anyone who knows of men who like to have caning onto their cocks. I have had some correspondence on this subject and wonder if it is within the experience of others. I must admit to an interest in reading of those men who seem to get a kick out of submitting to various forms of sado-masochism.

As well as piercings there must be some who are involved in other forms of decoration on their cock, balls and nipples. The sex members would seem to lend themselves to the application of jewellery and colourings as well as tattooing. It would be interesting to hear from subscribers with knowledge or experience of such adornments. I would particularly like to correspond with anyone who has had piercings and rings in his cock.

D.N. – Deal

[See the long discussion in John McC's Infibulation article in this issue, and watch out for the quarterly magazine Body Arts at good newsagents. — T.A.]

Female Circumcision

Dear Tony: My partner is particularly interested in female circumcision, now that she has seen my job 'before and after'. Is there any literature on this subject available in this country? I gather that in the USA it is becoming a popular thing.

W.S. – Alresford

[Dear WS: Most of the literature I have seen is polemical against the mainly Islamic operations which go under the name of 'female circumcision'. There are accounts of this in Forum's 'More Sex Life Letters', from which it is clear that what is meant is the cutting out of the clitoris and small or large parts of the labia minora, and sometimes also the labia majora. In the most extreme form, as practised on girls in upper Egypt and Somalia ('Pharaonic'), little of these areas is left, and the woman has to be cut open at marriage and cut further at childbirth. The 'justifications' are tradition, and to preserve virginity and diminish sexual desire. There is a publication on Female Circumcision from Amnesty International, in their series on minority groups. A copy of an article in The Observer, 5.3.1989, 'In the name of tradition', arguing against traditional excision operations, is reprinted as pages 16-17 of this issue.

But what I guess you and your partner are referring to is entirely different: a very minor operation, much more exactly equivalent to male circumcision, in which a small amount of the skin over the clitoris is trimmed to ensure that the clitoris head is exposed. This can be done with a simple straight incision, using scissors, to divide the 'foreskin' along the top of the clitoris (in which case no skin is removed), just like the male dorsal slit operation. A slightly more elaborate procedure would also trim away the two little triangular flaps created by this first operation. The justification here is, of course, to enhance sexual performance, and most who have had it report orgasms either experienced for the first time or experienced with much greater intensity. Some of the US medical reporting on this indicates that it is gaining in popularity there, although it has still not achieved widespread frequency. But I do not know of any medic offering it in Britain. As a minor operation it should not require any special equipment or great skill, provided that the appropriate precautions are observed on cleanliness etc. — T.A.]

John McC would like to write an article on Female Circumcision, but wants to collect as much information as possible before he does so. He would be grateful if any readers of Acorn who are interested in this subject or have any factual information would write to him. He is especially interested to hear from anyone who has known a circumcised woman or from any woman who has been circumcised. He would also like correspondence from others who find the subject interesting.

Masturbation Techniques

Dear Tony: Many thanks indeed for offering me space in your magazine to explain my project, and to enlist help from your subscribers: I will attempt to do so without more ado.

About a year ago I ran an ad for 3 months in the personal columns of Forum which read as follows:

"Male DIY. I'm making a survey of male masturbation methods: partly for fun, but mainly for the purpose of opening out the subject with a descriptive article. Exchange letters with me and we'll both learn a lot. Confidentiality assured. ALA"

From these 3 ads I got about 65 replies, but about half turned out not to be useful, for reasons which I'll explain later. Consequently I decided to put in two more ads which were similar, except that I gave my phone number. These two later ads brought in 960 phone calls! Each telephone conversation gave me the opportunity to explain more fully what I was hoping to achieve, as well as eliciting a lot of interesting information.

What I was trying to do is briefly this: to find out whether people have discovered methods of masturbation that work better for them than just using their hands. I was willing to exchange letters with anyone who had reasonably extensive experience of 'non-manual' methods, or even more importantly anyone who was willing to try out some of the non-manual methods which I was prepared to not only suggest, but to help people to try out.

The first method that I get people to try is to use a plastic bag and towel, with tapes wound around: this sounds remarkably simple, but it has to be done in just the right way to achieve the desired results. The method has received high praise from many. Here is a fairly typical quote: "It was a truly wonderful sensation! The smoothness of the plastic, the extreme slipperiness of the oil, and the pressure of the tapes/towel round the whole length and balls, combined to produce a sensation such as I'd never had before!"

Though the Plastic Bag and Towel method was well received, the second method, the sponge with plastic lining, got an even better reception. From another satisfied respondent: "You are to be congratulated. What a fantastically simple idea to create variety in a wank. The sponge has turned me on sufficiently, that if I wake during the night I then use it at perhaps 3, 4 or 5 a.m. and fall asleep in a most contented way." The method involves using a large car sponge, with a hole drilled in it, and a slit running all the way through it, so that 3" plastic tubing can be run through. After exchanging a few letters with people, which includes a short questionnaire, and a lengthy letter from me raising points for discussion, I need to be able to send this sponge out to my respondents so that they can report back to me. I should add there is no charge for this or anything else.

The sponge proved to be one of the big stumbling blocks: many people have what I call 'wife problems' or 'parent problems', so that receiving such an object through the post would be risky for them. For these and other complex reasons, including the fact that about half the male population appear to be 'manual only' wankers, the number of people that I'm currently in correspondence with has dwindled to about 40.

The sponge, with its hole drilled in it, has an additional important function: that is to serve as a device to 'trap', and thus facilitate the testing out of the third of my three masturbatory devices. This last device consists of one thick (1.5mm) rubber sheath inside another similar one. However the inner sheath has a hole at the tip. These double-sheaths (only prototypes at present) are manufactured at 10mm girth intervals, since it is very important that the erect, well lubricated, cock is a good fit inside the inner sheath. The reason that the device works is because with an effective air seal between cock and sheath there is some resistance to thrusting into the sheath, because the air has to escape through the hole at the tip of the inner sheath, and thence between the two sheaths. Likewise, and more importantly, when the cock is withdrawn the air has to come back the same way: the result is that the sheaths partially collapse, and stroke the glans in a pleasing fashion. It was mainly the idea of testing out this double-sheath for possible manufacture on a large scale (I've taken out a patent application) which has led me into this research, but I'm trying to do the investigation in as unbiased a way as possible, and am very willing to exchange correspondence about any masturbation methods which people find to be useful.

So far most of the commercially available masturbation aids seem to be pretty good rubbish, and pretty expensive rubbish at that! A few work alright if you happen to be just the right size, and some of the inflatable devices work okay, but not much better than a child's swimming armband! Few of the devices lend themselves to being lodged into position for a good hands free 'fuck'. Anyhow few of the commercial devices achieve truly cunt-like sensations.

The number of people that I'm currently corresponding with is not really as many as I'd like, for my fairly serious purpose of ascertaining what really works for people, and I feel that subscribers to Acorn might provide me with a few new friends who would prove to be just the sort of people I want: people who will throw themselves, heart and soul, into the worthy objective of improving the quality of their wanking activities! People, too, who can make time to write letters. Good science demands that one should not tell the subjects of one's research what to expect, but I will go so far as to say that the reception of my various devices has greatly exceeded my hopes when starting out on this project.

This article, which Tony has kindly allowed me to include, is thus an appeal to all Acorn readers to write to me. Names and addresses will be treated according to my usual methods, which afford a high degree of security. However as I'm engaged in what is really a bit of 'research', I'm in a more 'fireproof' position, so I'll ask you to publish my full name and address, and so encourage your readers to write to me direct. 'Research' sometimes conjures up a picture of a disinterested man of science, probably wearing a white coat, so let me add that I don't think one can carry out good research in this field unless one is an ardent practitioner!

Andrew Ferguson – 11 Harcourt Close, Henley-on-Thames, Oxon. RG9 1UZ

Different Strokes

Dear Tony: Having enjoyed masturbation ever since I can remember, the methods I use may be of some interest.

1. the 'old fashioned' way – either with thumb on top and one, two, or three fingers below, in a gentle and slow rhythm.
2. my cock encased in a very tight, rough fist, with no mercy shown until a long time after a shuddering climax.
3. I move the skin very quickly over the glans rim, back and forth, but only for a distance of  $\frac{1}{2}$ " (if that) whilst flexing my buttock muscles very hard, gripping my arse cheeks very tightly together. I find I can't do this for long – it is extremely stimulating. Several bursts of this alternated with a relaxation period is ideal, and the orgasm when it comes is fantastic.
4. Grabbing the testicles firmly in one hand, leaving the thumb to lie along the base of the cock, and wanking by pulling the scrotum down and pushing back up using the thumb to stimulate the penis root.

5. If I use a lubricant, I like to wank from really wet to really dry, then re-soak and continue. Spit is good, margarine is fine ("last mambo in Merseyside"?), grapeseed oil is better (low in cholesterol!)

I think watching a man masturbate is one of the most beautiful sights there is. Someone should make a film showing a succession of men, each demonstrating their various methods. I would be happy to take part if someone could organise it.

Dick – Merseyside

Infibulation

'Infibulation' is a word which has been used at different times and in different places to mean several different things; I will try to describe the most important of these. The word comes from the Latin 'fibula' meaning, originally, a pin; later it came to mean a clasp or brooch or any fastening which used a pin. A Roman toga would be fastened with a fibula. Later still the word was used to refer specifically to a clasp to fasten the genitals to prevent sex; a person fitted with such a clasp was said to have been infibulated. Both men and women can be infibulated, but I will start by describing male infibulation, and what this has meant in different times and places.

It was the ancient Greeks and Romans who first infibulated men, or rather, the first for whom we have reliable historical accounts. It was originally applied to singers and performers in the theatre, especially to those male performers who played female roles, for it was thought that strict sexual abstinence kept their voices pure and young. It is clear from the records that this requirement for abstinence extended to all forms of sexual outlet, not just intercourse with another person, and that the infibulation was intended totally to prevent any sexual orgasm, even from masturbation and nocturnal emissions. There is plenty of documentary evidence that these people were infibulated, but very little information on what was actually done to them; it seems to have been so common that contemporary writers felt that no detailed description was necessary. I have seen only two pieces of real evidence. The first is a Grecian vase in the British Museum depicting a naked youth with his penis bent right back on itself so that its tip is immediately above its base; the small ring which fastens it there is clearly visible on the hairless body. The second piece of evidence is a pair of enormous statues of muscular Roman slaves, each about eight feet tall, in the Musée du Louvre in Paris; each has his penis bent double so that the tip disappears into the pubic hair just to the right of its base. From these, and from the knowledge that the intention was to prevent all forms of orgasm, we must conclude that infibulation meant far more than just a ring securing the foreskin to the skin at the base of the penis, as most modern writers seem to believe, (e.g. Mary Renault in The Mask of Apollo). A simple experiment shows that this causes an ugly stretching of the skin and a certain amount of discomfort, but entirely fails to prevent orgasm. To be effective, the ring must have passed through both the foreskin and the glans of the penis, and it must also have passed through the ligament at the base of the penis which secures that organ to the pubic bone. The insertion of the ring must have been extremely painful, and the consequences hardly bear thinking about: any erection must have been excruciating, forcing the wearer to use every possible means to reduce it; his sleep would have been continually broken whenever an erection started to occur; urination must have been terribly messy, flooding the entire pubis and soaking the pubic hair; and hygiene under the foreskin would have been quite impossible. In later, more decadent, Roman times the practice was reputedly extended to slaves kept for sexual purposes by wealthy Roman women, to ensure that they did not squander their energies, but I know of no evidence for the use of infibulation on gladiators. Those wishing for more information should read: Male Infibulation, by E.J. Dingwall, (London, 1935).

Very little was heard of this custom for perhaps fifteen hundred years, until people in the nineteenth century started to become obsessed about the supposed dangers of masturbation. There were many ingenious attempts by many people to cure, or at least prevent, this habit: frightening the patient with stories of the consequences of masturbation, (blindness and insanity in particular); punishment, often severe; drugs, especially bromides; sleeping with the hands fastened to the sides of the bed; cauterisation of the glans penis with strong chemicals or hot irons; hypnosis; the wearing of chastity belts which made erections painful and prevented any contact; surgical operations including some very severe forms of circumcision and even severing the dorsal nerve of the penis; and, of course, infibulation.

Several different infibulation techniques were used which differ somewhat in detail. One was to pull the foreskin well forward and push the glans well back; a ring was then inserted transversely close in front of the glans. Another method was to transfix the foreskin close to the corona, (the ridge at the base of the glans), in two places either side of the frenulum, and to place a fastening like a safety pin through both holes and through the frenulum itself. There seems to have been no attempt to fasten the tip of the penis to its base as the Romans did, although there is some evidence of the fastening of the tip of the penis to a ring in the perineum, just in front of the anus. The objective was to make erection uncomfortable and manipulation so painful that the habit was discouraged. The contemporary authors and exponents of these methods claimed great success in curing the practice, but the experiments I have conducted suggest otherwise: masturbation is painful, and the consequent inflammation and bleeding around the fastening would reveal the activity to parents, nanny or doctor, but manually induced orgasm is never actually impossible. For further information about this and other nineteenth century anti-masturbation activities, The Anxiety Makers by Alex Comfort, (London 1967), is a useful source of information.

At about this time, the 'Prince Albert' became known among the demi-monde of London. This is the term used for a ring in the end of the penis, passing down the urethra, and out through a hole just at the top of the frenulum. There is no written evidence for a royal inspiration for this custom, but a lot of hearsay evidence that a Prince Albert, (there was more than one of that name), wore one. I have my own theory of the origin of this custom which appeared in an early issue of Acorn, (copies will be sent on receipt of a s.a.e.).

On the other side of the world, in Indonesia, Sumatra and the Philippines, it has long been customary for men to adorn their penes with various objects to make life more interesting for their women-folk. Many and various objects are used, including rings of stiff bristles worn behind the corona, and even small pebbles inserted under the foreskin, but the objects of most interest to us are the rods or rings worn in holes pierced through various parts of the penis. These each have special names which are used throughout the world today by piercing devotees:

- the Ampalang is a rod worn transversely through a hole in the middle of the glans;
- the Dydoe is a rod or ring worn through a hole in the corona of the glans, a longitudinal hole, parallel with the shaft of the penis, usually in the four and eight o'clock positions, (the frenulum being at twelve);
- the Ampadravya is a rod worn through a hole running from the centre of the upper face of the glans, passing through the urethra and emerging at the frenulum (which must be partly cut away);
- the Hafada is a ring or rod worn in a hole in the loose skin at the base of the penis in a suitable position to stimulate the partner's clitoris;
- and the Oelang is a ring worn in the edge of the foreskin.

Female infibulation has an even longer history than male infibulation, and an even wider variety of meanings. The first type I am going to describe is the oldest, and is still performed on millions of women in the region of Africa to the South of the Sahara, the Sahel. This is truly horrific, and anybody of a queasy or sensitive disposition should skip now to this sign: § § § §, to be found on page 29. You have been warned!

Infibulation is the name given in the West to one of the forms of female circumcision, known as Pharaonic circumcision, as it is thought to have been introduced at the time of the Pharaohs of ancient Egypt. This operation is performed in Mali, Upper Volta, Niger, Ethiopia, Sudan, Somalia, Southern Egypt and Northern Kenya, (and probably Uganda, but, because of the political situation, nobody has confirmed this recently). It is performed on young girls, sometimes soon after birth, (Niger and Ethiopia), more often between five and nine years old, but always before puberty. Traditionally it was performed by wise women or Dayas, without the benefit of anaesthetics or antiseptics, using primitive stone or bronze knives; nowadays, amongst city dwellers, it is becoming more and more common to find it done in doctors' surgeries, clinics or even hospitals, using modern equipment and techniques.

The operation consists of the surgical removal of the labia minora, the clitoris and the inward facing surfaces of the labia majora, and then the closure of the vaginal opening by stitching, so that only the minimum hole necessary for urination and menstruation is left. Here is the description of one such operation.

An adult woman sits on the ground with her legs apart and her knees raised. The young girl to be operated on sits down between her thighs and leans back against the woman's chest. Helpers lift up the girl's legs so that her knees are beside her shoulders. The woman then lifts her own legs over the girl's so that her calves are behind the child's knees. The woman then stretches her legs back and apart so that the girl's legs are stretched as far back and apart as possible, and tucks her feet behind the girl's bottom, pushing it forward, further immobilising her. The woman holds the girl's wrists tightly, although in the case of an older and stronger child, other helpers may hold the wrists to prevent her struggling free. In this position the girl's vulva is made prominent and accessible, and she is secured virtually immobile.

All the women watching set up a loud 'ululation'. This is a sound made by wagging the tongue from side to side whilst making a loud noise, and is generally a sign of joy or celebration, although in this case one could be forgiven for concluding that the primary purpose was to drown the cries of the girl. The Daya first sprinkles wood-ash or fine sand on the vulva, so as to grip the slippery parts more firmly. Then she pulls each of the labia minora in turn to full stretch, and cuts it off at the root. Then she pushes a pin or thorn through the tip of the clitoris, pulls it firmly, and cuts it away deeply, right down to the bone, making sure that as much as possible of that exquisitely sensitive organ is removed. Then she cuts away the inner surfaces of the labia majora right down their whole length to the perineum. Next the whole cleft is stitched up by pushing thorns through the opposing edges of the vulva and then winding a hair between the ends of each thorn across the wound. Finally the wound is dressed with herbal ointments and the girl's legs are bound together from waist to ankles to prevent her movements from disturbing the wound; she remains bound like this for several weeks. She is given lots to drink, for the wash of urine aids healing, and failure to urinate soon after the operation results in the wound closing completely with terrible consequences.

This operation is not infrequently attended by complications. If, despite the woman holding her, the girl manages to struggle, the urethra or the anal sphincter may be damaged causing life-long incontinence. Infections of the wound are frequent and are even encouraged as they are thought to provide a better seal; keloid scarring and neuromas often result. Bladder and kidney infections are not uncommon and often become chronic, and difficulties in passing urine and later menses are not infrequent. Sexual problems, painful intercourse and absence of orgasm, and difficulty in childbirth are considered normal and are expected. The pain and trauma and subsequent sexual frustration often cause mental problems including severe depression and neuroses. The use of modern techniques of hygiene and anaesthesia may lessen the immediate trauma and infection, but the long-term problems are no different.

It should not be thought that the people of these parts are especially anti-women. In one of these areas we hear of a male circumcision technique where, after pulling the skin forward of the glans and cutting it across, the outer skin is slit lengthways to the base, and pulled right off the shaft of the penis. The inner skin is trimmed close to the glans and with it the frenulum. Then the slippery cartilaginous membrane, (Buck's fascia), which covers the outside of the shaft and the inside of the foreskin, (and is the reason the two layers of skin can slide so easily over one another), is pared away. This is a painful, slow and bloody process as the membrane is attached over its whole surface. When complete, the penis is stretched taut, and the foreskin is placed back over it, the excess being trimmed away. It is sutured into position with thorns wound with hair, and the whole organ is wrapped tightly in bandages. Healing is slow and painful as there is much oedema from the clotted blood under the skin. Once healed, the skin on the shaft is entirely immobile. When the penis is erect, the skin is quite taut and makes the shaft of the penis much narrower than it would otherwise be so that the naked glans bulges impressively above it.

The peoples of these areas are, thus, not so much anti-women as anti-sex. Those men who have experienced sex with uncircumcised women admit that it is more pleasurable, yet still insist on circumcised wives because they feel guilty about such enjoyment. Despite the pain and trauma they themselves have experienced, mothers still insist on inflicting the same problems on their daughters. We in the West are little better, we still go to elaborate lengths to 'protect' our children from sexual knowledge even though it has been proved time and again that an early exposure to such information leads to more healthy sexual development. For further information, the report: The Sexual and Genital Mutilation of Females by Fran. Hosken, (W.I.N., New York, 1983) is the most thorough and authoritative study available.

§ § § §

The tradition of female infibulation in Europe consists of piercing the lips of the vulva opposite the vaginal entrance and inserting a ring or a lock to prevent sex. There is a mention in Gargantua and Pantagruel by Rabelais of a 'Bergamasco padlock' in a context which makes it plain that some sort of chastity device is implied, but it is more probable that this refers to a chastity belt rather than to infibulation. The earliest clearly documented record I have found was in the St. James' Evening Post of 7 April 1737, which had an account of the trial in Leicester Assizes of one George Baggerley, who with a "needle and thread did sew up his wife's parts, being hired to work about 5 miles from Grooby, and being jealous of his wife was afraid to leave her to her own inclinations." He pleaded guilty, was fined 20/-, imprisoned for two years and had to find security for his good behaviour for seven.

During the nineteenth century, the simulation of virginity was very popular in the bordellos of Europe, especially those specialising in child prostitution. Several techniques were used including soaking the parts in alum for several hours, (which makes the flesh shrink and dry up), and inserting a small bladder of pigeon's blood, designed to burst on impact. But by far the most popular and realistic was to insert a few sutures of silk thread, at the approximate position of the hymen, to join the opposite sides of the vagina together; penetration was impeded, and when it occurred, the skin tore causing genuine pain and a very convincing effusion of blood.

In the latter part of the nineteenth and the early twentieth century a great number of immigrants were arriving in the U.S.A. from many parts of Europe; they were subjected to a medical examination on arrival. We have several reports, from the doctors conducting these examinations, of women with pierced labia containing rings or locks designed to prevent illicit intercourse. The number of such reports suggests that the practice, whilst not exactly common, was far from unknown.

During the nineteenth century anti-masturbation craze, the doctors and medical equipment suppliers were no less inventive in finding means of preventing female masturbation than they were with the male. The treatments included: frightening the patient with stories of the terrible consequences of masturbation, (blindness, insanity and the conceiving of deformed children were especially popular); punishment; drugs, especially bromides; sleeping with the hands and feet tied to the sides of the bed; sleeping with a pad between the thighs to prevent thigh-rubbing; cauterisation of the vulva and especially the glans clitoridis using strong chemicals or hot irons; hypnosis; the wearing of chastity belts which prevented any contact; surgical operations including circumcision of the clitoral hood, severing the pudic nerves and clitoridectomy, (removal of the whole clitoris); and, very occasionally, a form of infibulation.

Infibulation seems to have been a relatively rare technique, and I have found only two accounts in the literature; I will quote from one. This is from Alvin Eyer of St. John's Hospital, Cleveland Ohio, in 1891. He reports, of M.E.H., a lovely blond blue-eyed girl of seven: "I found her mammae, clitoris and mons veneris unusually developed for one of her age. For over a year the best remedies had been employed in conjunction with blistering and severe actual cauterisation, yet the habit continued. I carried the clitoris as deeply as possible into the cleft of the labia and then, with four silver wire sutures, brought the latter into snug apposition, burying the clitoris entirely out of touch. On the ninth morning the mother discovered the upper suture much tighter than we had left it, with a half ring shaped loop projecting. On the following morning the same suture was found broken at the point of its first twist. On first questioning, the child denied having disturbed it, but subsequently confessed to having masturbated on four consecutive occasions during the night. On May 10th, 1890, clitoridectomy was performed, care being taken that the entire organ with a considerable portion of its two crura was removed. About six weeks after the operation, the mother reported her as having had a restless night, and she confessed in the morning having attempted her old habit, but added, 'There is nothing there now, so I could do nothing.' A year later, the mother reported her as being entirely free of her previous habits." Thus it would seem that infibulation was considered not to be as successful for the cure of female masturbation as it was for the male variety.

Nowadays, because of the negative associations of the word 'infibulation', those practising it prefer to use the expression 'piercing'. Most of the things I have mentioned have been adopted and refined and are used by piercing devotees to enhance their sex lives. For some the primary motivation is to provide erotic stimulation during sexual activity; here the holes are wide and the inserts fat and smooth and are focused on the most erogenous parts of the anatomy: in the male, the frenulum, foreskin and glans penis, and, for his partner's benefit, the base of the penis; and in the female, the hood of the clitoris and the labia minora. For others it is mainly a question of decoration, of visual eroticism; here the holes are tiny and are positioned for visual effect, and the jewellery is very light, delicate and fragile, making it entirely unsuitable for the rough and tumble of actual intercourse, and may even include precious stones. Piercing may form an important aspect of a bondage or sadomasochistic relationship; here the holes are positioned not so much to enhance erotic stimulation as to prevent it, and the objects placed there are designed to restrain and control, to punish and cause discomfort, and may include padlocks, chains, spikes and even heavy weights. For most piercing enthusiasts, however, the motivation is a subtle, complex and even contradictory combination of all of these factors.

A number of magazines and commercial organisations exist to provide for the needs of the piercing devotee. There are several piercing practitioners in the U.K., and a number of firms providing the special rings and dumb-bell shaped rods which many favour. Those interested could well start by buying a copy of Body Art, (Blake House Studios, Blake End, Rayne, Braintree, Essex) a magazine which also caters for tattooing enthusiasts.

John McC.

ACORN

1989 Issue No 8

(Formerly Issue 9)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Circumcisers		Page 2
Observations Survey	J.H.	Page 4
Penis Survey (cont.)		Page 5
Comments On Survey Results		Page 6
Observations		Page 6
A Beach Survey	Anthony	Page 7
Circumcision Fantastic	E.G.	Page 9
Family Penis Resemblances	J.K.	Page 10
Ways Of Making The Foreskin Stay Back	E.S.	Page 11
Anti-Circumcision	R.B.W.	Page 12
Videos And Films		Page 16
What's Yours Called?		Page 17
Saunas	I.M.	Page 18
At The Pool		Page 18
Nipples	A.R.	Page 19
Contacts		Page 19

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1989 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome: again to Acorn, to an issue that includes our usual long and varied correspondence on Acorn topics. A merry festive season when it comes, and may your willie need no warming!

Subscriptions for 1990 are now due: Your 1989 annual subscription of £10 paid for all the 1989 issues, including back copies. This is the final issue for 1989: No further issues will be sent until a renewal subscription is received. On the back page there is a form for renewing your subscription, which stays at £10 again for 1990. The form may also be used for ordering back copies. Receipt will generally be acknowledged by supply of the items you have requested: address as for Replies. Subscriptions may be sent by cheque or postal order, preferably blank, or else payable to Acorn.

Future Issues: Many thanks to all our correspondents for sharing their thoughts and experiences with us in 1989, and making Acorn the fascinating success which it has become. Please continue to do so next year. In 1990 we aim to produce another hundred pages worth (at least), in eight issues. The first issue will include a long story describing David's growing dissatisfaction with his cavalier state, his good fortune in finding someone able to help him, and what happens when they meet.

Information: Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner who may be able to help them achieve the changes they want, or to give some specific advice. Acorn members include doctors who have said they are willing to help other members. It must be clearly understood, however, that any information published, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes a recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any information in this newsletter must rely on their own judgement, and does so at their own risk.

Confidentiality: Contributions are identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Otherwise no name or address will be revealed to another member, but letters will be passed on if you wish to make contact. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with such guarantees of confidentiality in mind.

Circumcisers

The Surgical Advisory Service, 108 Whitfield Street, London W1P 6BE (tel: 01-388 1839) has regularly advertised in Forum, The Observer and elsewhere: Circumcision available in one-hour brief out-patient visit to our London clinic. In June the price rose from £190 to £210, a figure which may seem high, though they have had many satisfied customers/patients. A prior consultation is an additional £25 (taking the total to £235), but worthwhile as it ensures that you have a chance to explain and discuss the outcome which you would like. Their Mr N. Hasan FRCS FICA, has consulting rooms at 22 Harley Street, London W1, 01-637 0491.

The Chesham Clinic, Gloucester House, Smallbrook Queensway, Birmingham B5 4HP, also advertises consultation centres at St. John Street, Manchester M3 4DW and at Park Crescent, London W1 3HE and offers a help-line on 021-643 7515. The clinic offers immediate low cost treatment by consultant surgeons for such non-urgent problems as: moles, lumps, cysts and skin tags for £98 to £175, piles £175 – £500, varicose veins £175 – £1,100, hernia repair £345 – £500, vasectomy under general anaesthetic for £175 (plus cost of follow-up tests), vasectomy reversal £345 – £500. The charge for Circumcision under general anaesthetic is £345. For several of these procedures they indicate the need for an overnight hospital stay at an additional maximum charge of £160. This seems very high (compare above) and looks like the private sector trying to cash in where the National Health Service has waiting lists. But it is also very doubtful whether a general anaesthetic is desirable or advisable for such a simple procedure. The risk of (possibly even fatal) complications consequent on a general anaesthetic is small but needs to be considered. Very probably it is only recovery from the anaesthetic which may make the overnight stay advisable: much more pleasant, and better value, to go to a practitioner who is prepared to operate under local anaesthetic. If any reader uses them please write in with impressions as to the service offered and the prices charged. (Thanks to N.T. – Cleveland for obtaining this information.)

The Initiation Society is now at 15 Sunny Hill Court, Sunningfields Crescent, London NW4 4RB, tel 01-203 1352 (answer-phone). The Secretary, Mr Alex Minn, will send a printed list of currently approved and annually reviewed Jewish circumcisers (mohalim). Most only operate on infants and in the religious context only, but some (the medically qualified) may operate for adolescents or adults for non-religious reasons. On the list of 62, 43 are in London and 10 in Salford. Those with the title of Dr are:

Dr S.B. Bolel, 36 Ashtrees Gardens, Low Fell, Gateshead, 091-477 1176.

Dr Z. Davis, 45 Cavendish Rd, Salford, M7 OWP, 061-792 4198.

Dr M. Harris, 49 Edgwarebury Lane, Edgware, Middx, 01-458 4431.

Dr D.L. Hibbert, 11 Moorside Road, Salford M7 OPJ, 061-792 2470.

Dr L. Lovat, 7a Boot Parade, High Street, Edgware, 01-952 5667.

Dr J. Spitzer, 66 Rostrevor Avenue, London N15, 01-802 4104.

The Initiation Society's Medical Advisor, Dr M. Sifman, 1 Stanley Avenue, Wembley, Middlesex HA0 4JF, 01-902 3887, is worth approaching confidentially for consultation, circumcision, and revisions (second or tidying-up circumcisions).

Contacts with Islamic circumcisers have not been very successful: if any member can help, please write in. Dr A. Singh, MB, BS, DLO, of 12 East View, Deepdale, Preston PR1 5AS, tel. 0772-52409, replied that he has been practising as a circumciser for about 22 years. All 150 operations during the previous year were religious, 90 per cent of cases were aged under 1 year and the rest under 5, and the charge was £40-£50 for a boy under two. He will not circumcise an adult.

Dr Shaikh, of 48 Queen's Road, Walthamstow, London E17, 01-520 2625 (work) 01-505 5790 (home) does Islamic-style circumcisions efficiently and inexpensively, but without discussion as to the type of outcome which will result, charging about £100 for an adolescent or an adult, and about half as much for a child under about 10. An appointment can be arranged with about a week's notice.

Dr David Jackson, 63a Moscow Road, London W2, 01-229 3300, is 'willing to discuss problems of the foreskin and its retention, in writing or at surgery, free of charge.' He opposes circumcision.

Observations Survey

Following your suggestion of a cavalier/roundhead survey, I have counted up the following in a sports club to which I belong:

Over 40s	Cavaliers: 15	Roundheads: 10 (40%)	Total: 25
Under 40s	Cavaliers: 18	Roundheads: 9 (33%)	Total: 27
All	Cavaliers: 33	Roundheads: 19 (37%)	Total: 52

These figures surprise me somewhat, as I expected more roundheads over 40 (at school in the '50s and early '60s the proportion was 65% – 75%). Likewise I would also have expected more cavaliers under 40. While the figures bear out a trend favouring foreskins, the proportion of roundheads is still much higher than expected, given the official attitude of opposition to circumcision since the 1940s. I cannot comment on the various degrees of circumcision on the roundheads, but the vast majority of the cavaliers are 'wrinklies', ie with a longish, elephant-trunk type of foreskin. Only three have almost totally exposed knobs and one a partially exposed knob. As a cavalier who always kept his foreskin pulled back when showering so as to look 'regular' among the roundheads, I now find I still do this automatically, even though my group is now in the majority. Quite honestly, nobody really cares, but everyone still has a good look at everyone else's.

There are only four or so really large ones. But I do find that a large roundhead always seems bigger than a large cavalier because of the exposed knob: a wrinkled foreskin always seems to reduce the size. I hope these statistics are of interest.

J.H. – Beckenham, Kent

Penis Survey (Continued)

All measurements are in inches (except height in feet and inches), rounded to the nearest 0.1, so  $\frac{3}{4}$ " or 0.75 is given as 0.8. Measurement to 0.1" is as accurate as anyone can reasonably get.

The dimensions in the Table are as follows:

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scar-line from glans rim.
If uncircumcised: U
6. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, flaccid?
7. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, erect?
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight (T) or loose (L)?
9. When standing against the wall with erect penis, how far from glans tip to nearest part of stomach?
10. Height
11. Age
12. Identification (initials and place).

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12
Cavaliers (previously listed)
4.5	6.5	4.5	6.3	U	12	8	L	4.5	5'8"	30	N.T. – Guisborough
3.5	6.3	4	6	U	11	8	L	5.5	6'4"	64	E.S. – Salisbury
3	6.3	4	4.8	U	10	9	L	4	6'1"	26	Anon
5	7.5	4.3	5.5	U	1	0	L	3	5'10"	50	E.L. – Bath
3.3	5	3.9	5	U	13	10	L	5	6'0"	54	M.M.G. – N.Yorks
4.1	6	4.5	5.6	U	11	9	L		6'1"	54	M.L. – Gwent
5	6	5.5	6	U	10	10	L	7.5	5'5"	68	J.T.D. – London
3	6	4	5	U	0	0	vL	1.5	5'10"	57	R.V.A. – Lancs
3.5	5	4.5	5	U	8	0-3	L	4	5'9"	46	D.S. – Merseyside
3.8	5.8	4	5.3	U	10	10	T	3	5'9"	29	J.A. – York
3.5	5.5	3.5	4.8	U	10	8	L	4.5	5'8"	69	A.R. – Hampshire
3	4.7	3.5	4.4	U	10	9	L	4	5'8"	45	J.H. – Kent
Cavalier Additions
3.6	5.8	4.4	5.4	U	10	5	T	–	6'2"	18	J.K. – Sutton Coldfield
4.5	7.8	5	6.3	U	4	0	L	3	5'9"	42	Anon – Hants
	6	4	4.5	U	8	0	L	6	5'11"	46	R.B. – London
3	5	3.5	4.4						5'5"	18	Minima
3.8	6.0	4.2	5.3						5'10"	47	Averages
5	7.8	5.5	6.3						6'4"	69	Maxima

Roundheads (previously listed)

5	6.5	4.3	6	1	-	-	-	5	5'6"	49	G.P. – Perth
5.5	7.5	4.5	6	0.5	-	-	-	6	6'1"	63	A.W. – Burgess Hill
3.8	6.5	3.8	5	0.8	-	-	-	7	5'11"	35	A.G.T. – Hornchurch
2.5	5.5	4	5.5	0.5	-	-	-	4.5	5'10"	34	M.H.
3	6.5	3.5	5	0.5	-	-	-	H	6'1"	77	V. – Shropshire
4	6.8	when warmer
3.2	5.1	3.2	4.7	0.8	-	-	-	4.7	5'8"	30	J.H. – Finland
4	7.6	3.5	6	0.5	-	-	-	6	5'10"	56	R.W. – Sussex

Roundhead Additions

3.5	6.8	4	5.9	0.5	-	-	-	4	5'9"	43	B.B. – Hants
3	6		5.8	1.1	-	-	-			55	E.G. – Bradford
4	6	4.5	6	0.5	-	-	-	6	6'3"	50	I.M. – Sussex
3.4	5.5	4.5	5.5	0.8	-	-	-	7	5'10"		A.F. – Devon
2.5	5.1	3.2	4.7	0.5					5'6"	30	Minima
3.7	6.3	4.0	5.6	0.6					5'11"	45	Average
5.5	7.6	4.5	6	1.1					6'3"	77	Maxima

Comments On The Survey Results

The first thing I noticed is the average age of respondents, which is 48. Is it only an older generation that has a keen interest in the penis, or is it just that younger members of Acorn have not taken the time to reply to the survey? The average erect size of cavaliers worked out at 5.9", which falls below the Forum average of 6.25". Our roundhead respondents were marginally above the Forum average, however. I enclose my own measurements. It would be very good to have more members send in their details.

B.B. – Hants.

My greatest circumference is at the glans ridge, 4.75" flaccid and 5.75" erect. My scar-line varies between 0.5" and 1" from the glans ridge. At the scar-line the circumference is 4.3" flaccid and 5" erect. The circumference at the glans ridge would be useful for comparisons, whether measured bare or over a layer of foreskin.

A.F. – Devon

Observation 1

A very black negro aged about 25, well-built and of average height, had a slightly above-average sized penis. As he stood peeing, his retracted foreskin covered the glans rim and about  $\frac{3}{10}$  of his glans. The visible glans and foreskin were about the same colour as his face, but when he had finished he worked the foreskin to and fro to massage out the final drops. The inner foreskin and glans rim revealed as he pulled back the skin were bright pink, in fascinating contrast to the surrounding black.

T.A.

Observations 2

Observing my friends over the past six weeks or so gives the following results:

Ages	46	46	40	42	40	49	45
Circumcised	no	yes	yes	no	yes	yes	yes
Size	large	ave	small	large	small	ave	small
Glans coverage	10	0	0	10	1	1	0
Colour	white	white	white	white	white	white	white
Religion	Christian	C	RC	C	C	C	C
Location	London	L	L	Jersey	L	L	USA
Class	Upper	Upper	Upper	Middle	Upper	Upper	Upper

I think these are pretty representative, and draw the following conclusions:

1. Circumcision was widely practised in middle and upper class families until say 1950.
2. It was rare among lower middle class families after 1950.
3. It was more widely practised in all classes in the 1920s-1940s, probably stopping in the 1950s.
4. It was universal in the USA and Australia.
5. It was widely practised, for longer, in the expatriate communities – those born in English hospitals in Africa, India and the Far East tend to be circumcised through to 1965.

R.B.

A Beach Survey

In a survey to establish the current incidence of circumcision, I observed the penes of 203 youngsters, aged between just a few months to about five years, playing stark naked on the beach. Whereas years ago only the very young were occasionally allowed to do so, now complete nakedness of babies, toddlers, infants, and even older children was observed, with a maximum of 30 in a half mile of beach population in the high season. In some families, girls below school age wore bikini tops while their brothers went stark naked.

The overwhelming majority (196 of the 203 sightings) were uncircumcised. Among the intact, penis size varied from vermiform (worm-like) to above average, but most foreskins were long, extending well beyond the glans tip and curling down towards the vertical. Only ten with full cover had enlarged orifices, presumably by retraction. Four brothers aged between about two to five years all sported the longest foreskins I have ever seen. The skin beyond the glans was longer than the rest of the penis in each case, a feature inherited from their father.

There were only seven circumcised penes. In all cases the glans was precociously plump, giving a button-mushroom appearance, and the scars were well-set, without the pinkness of recent healing. The distinct work of a mohel seemed evident in one. Two had radical removal and wavy scar-lines, the result of standard surgery and sutures. Four had been beautifully trimmed, with very slight and perfectly straight overlap of the glans rim, presumably the result of a 'bell' technique.

I only saw one example of dissimilarity between siblings. A younger brother was radically denuded while his older brother remained intact. The circumcision was of the ragged, sutured type. The other possessor of a rough-hewn edge was a five-year-old, both perhaps the result of urgent treatment.

This Table compares the 1989 beach survey with 1956 school observations:

		1989 Beach sightings, ages 0 - 5 years.	1957 Changing-room sightings, age 14.
Total number		203	31
Number circumcised		7	14
Per cent circumcised		3.5	45
Method	Jewish	1	1
by scar	Trim & suture	2	13
type	'Bell'	4	0
Number uncircumcised		196	17
Per cent uncircumcised		96.5	54
	glans tip visible	0	10
Foreskin	full cover	5	37
length	some overhang	38	48
	excess overhang	57	5

The observed circumcision rate was 3.5 per cent. Almost all the non-ritually circumcised were under three years old, so it seems that there has been a slight change in medical attitude quite recently in favour of neo-natal or infant circumcision. The disposable 'Plastibell' allows a neat, simple, and aesthetically attractive result, as important to the continuation of non-ritual circumcision as Tampax and the pill have been to the liberation of women.

While the beach observations were being made, the following tender incident occurred. One mother sunbathing with family and friends seemed particularly beautiful: bronzed, bikini-clad, long fair hair tied at the back, a kindly round young face. She had two completely naked girls aged about four and six and a son of about three, clothed most of the time. In mid-afternoon he dropped his trunks but continued to wear a short red shirt and sun-hat. Standing immediately before his mother, he dribbled from a long foreskin. After a pause, maternal assistance was at hand, quite literally. Mother reached out with her left palm downwards, deftly and gently grasped her son's penis behind the glans and drew the skin forward. This allowed him to complete the voiding in a strong steady stream. When he had finished, without any self-consciousness she gave the prepuce three gentle shakes, withdrew her hand quickly and wiped it on her thigh. It all took about 15 seconds, including the skin 'towelling'. The caring act seemed so natural and had the approval of the infant, who remained perfectly still throughout, though his organ slightly increased in size. Every part of the child, including his long obstructive prepuce, was loved. By then the distinctive glans-rim profile of a roused roundhead had formed in my own trunks. I would have accepted the phimosis gladly if such an angel hand was nearby. I only saw her once, but appreciated her tenderness.

Anthony – Devon

Circumcision Fantastic

Having subscribed to Acorn for 1988-9, each issue is getting better and more informative. As more members write in with their personal preferences and their experiences, we learn a little more about circumcision and the methods used each time the buff envelope arrives. My wife and I both prefer a circumcised cock which has been cut right back. My cock is 3" flaccid and 6" when erect, with a circumference of 5.75" at the line of cut. My circumcision ring seems to me to be very faint, although my wife says it is quite plain and looks lovely to her. When erect the ring is 1.1" from the groove on the upper surface coming to a lesser distance like a "V" on the underside. From what we have both read and understand I was circumcised (in 1934, as a baby) by the classic dorsal slit and cut round both sides method, the frenulum being cut also. This method was very popular then and does really appear to remove as much foreskin as possible, with no untidy skin tags on the underside.

My wife has only one regret, which is that I am circumcised. She loves the look, feel and cleanliness of my cock but wishes that it was she who had circumcised me. We both think it would have been the height of erotic ecstasy for me to sit on the settee with my legs wide open and she kneel on a cushion between my knees carefully shaving off my pubic hair while I caress her breasts and nipples. Then she would push my foreskin right back as far as possible to enable her to measure how far back I could be cut. With foreskin pulled forward a ring would be drawn around my cock to indicate where the circumcision cut should be. She would then spray or inject my foreskin with a suitable anaesthetic before taking up a pair of scissors. She would carefully cut a dorsal slit up my foreskin as far back as the ring marked on it, then again carefully cut round from the dorsal slit to the underside from each direction, finally trimming the frenulum. It would be a perfect way of being circumcised. The effect of the deep pink-coloured circumcision ring and purple glans would heighten sex even more for weeks afterwards. A pipe-dream, but this is nevertheless a lovely thought shared by us both.

On our travels round the continent we have been to many nudist camps and can fully understand the female preference for a circumcised penis. My wife often remarks, "What a horrible elephant's trunk: he needs circumcising". We have seen two or three teenagers or youngsters with penises which have obviously been recently circumcised. They look far better for it. Personally I think that all males should be circumcised before puberty, as this would relieve many troubles in the future to both themselves and their sexual partners; but I am not sure what age would be best. My wife agrees that circumcision is the best treatment a penis should and can receive, but is not entirely convinced by the idea of neonatal circumcision, while realising the important benefits of being circumcised, since in looks, feel, performance and health-wise a circumcised cock is preferable to one with a foreskin. A bare glans is the thing for today and the availability of circumcision should be made easier.

In future issues we would like to see a really full description of the various ways to circumcise, with detailed drawings if possible. Can any member say where to get a video of circumcision, preferably one showing the results of the various methods?

E.G. – Bradford

Family Penis Resemblances

What really fascinates me is the subject of family penis inheritance. I have never come across any comment on this, and would be grateful if Acorn members could help to throw light on the topic. In my own family, three generations of males share amazingly similar characteristics: general height, bone structure, hair/eye colour, identically-chiselled noses, etc. There is a 9-year age gap between my brother and I, but we are often mistaken as twins: that's how much we look alike. These characteristics even go as far as my cousin (our fathers are brothers). But what about our penises?

My parents are divorced, so just my father, brother and myself are at home. With no females around, there is a degree of nudity and plenty of chance for me to see if I have inherited the family cock. It grieves me to say that I don't think I have. Despite our other similarities, my brother's penis is considerably larger than mine. The same applies to my father and grandfather: all are very well endowed men, a characteristic I lack.

Could it be age, I wonder? I am 18. Perhaps there is time for me yet! This brings me to another point: when does the penis stop developing? Is it when one reaches maximum height? It would be interesting to know how much height, weight and general build relate to penis size. Perhaps any body-builders could comment on the relationship between bodily and penile development. Comments, please, from other Acorn members on any of these issues.

J.K. – Sutton Coldfield

[How excellent to have an Acorn contribution from a young member: many thanks. Perhaps the first thing would be to see how your cousin fits in this pattern. Secondly, I doubt whether height has much relationship to penis size (see the survey replies on page 5 and in the last issue of Acorn), since height can be much affected by the length of the long leg-bones. Have you ever noticed how adults vary less in height when sitting than when standing? But obesity (especially as a child) can result in the penis becoming buried in a layer of fat which both restricts its development and, additionally, makes it appear small (since part of its length is below the surface). Exercise which redistributed weight from fat to muscle would obviously help, but only if obesity is the problem. As to growth, one of the first signs of puberty is an increase of the length and diameter of the penis and the volume of the testicles. Pubic hair generally follows later, with growth in height continuing later still. This would seem to indicate that you can not expect much further penis growth: I hope I'm wrong. Although your erect penis length is about the average for Acorn cavalier respondents, it is rather smaller than Acorn roundheads (see above). Your size might be affected by putting your penis to fuller use: do you know how your frequency compares to your brother's? In my own family, my father and I are of short/broad build, with slightly below-average sized circumcised penises. My brother is taller and thinner, with a penis slightly longer than mine, and having the long, wrinkled foreskin which I was able to rid myself of. My son aged 16 is taller and broader than me, and considerably better endowed (in both length and thickness). He too had the long wrinkled family foreskin until circumcised. Note the example of the four brothers with extraordinarily long foreskins like their father, in the beach survey (page 7). More information from readers, please. — T.A.]

Ways Of Making The Foreskin Stay Back

I am grateful to A.R. – Hampshire for his letter in the Issue 4/89 of Acorn describing the foam ring which he used to keep his foreskin back. I had, in fact, experimented with 'collars' of various sorts but not with one made from foam. I must say that its big advantage is that it is absolutely comfortable and it does work. However, the disadvantage from my own point of view is that by creating this rather substantial ridge behind the glans, my most sensitive part is shielded from contact with clothing and the pleasurable friction, which is what I am primarily seeking, is minimised.

Thinking along these lines did give me another idea, of utilising a ring which I have had for many years which fits neatly behind the rim of my glans (it is actually the ring-binder type which can if necessary be opened, though this has never been necessary throughout a lot of experimentation). By repeated applications of 'Copydex' glue over a period of two days I built up a shoulder on just the top side of the ring and continued building it up until it was just sufficient to prevent the foreskin sliding forward over it. It is completely comfortable, fairly inconspicuous, and has the advantage of being no larger than is absolutely necessary to achieve the objective: in fact, quite my best discovery to date.

I pierced my foreskin some years ago, since when I have been able to employ the very positive method of anchoring it back to a cock-ring which, from the mechanical point of view, is hard to beat, but the new method is so much simpler. Perhaps someone might be interested in trying it.

E.S. – Salisbury

Anti-Circumcision

Dear Tony: I appreciate your support for Ivan Goodhart's views in 'Have I the right (to circumcise my son)', since a bit of cut and thrust is essential to keep the Newsletter from becoming boring, but I have to take issue with your statement that his views are carefully argued: 'If all young men decided they wanted to be circumcised, 2000 ops would be required each day: where are the facilities?' Everything depends on his 'If'.

Now let me tell you why I feel so bitter. Will you accept my assertion that my childhood was purgatory and adolescence sheer hell due to an unnecessary circumcision in infancy? I was aware of the difference between me and my friends from the earliest, and that I had been mutilated and was deficient, whilst they were whole. As I grew up, a powerful heterosexual urge was denied and frustrated to the point where I seriously considered suicide. This was because my intact friends were able to indulge in teenage adventures, I was forced by fear of ridicule (based on experience) to avoid sexual encounters even though potential girl-friends were keen. As a result my mind has been pre-occupied for many years with a sense of deprivation, to the extent that concentration on the important things in life became impossible.

With maturity, despair and distress settled down to become mere unhappiness and I finally succeeded in getting married. My son, I'm happy to say, has been spared the misery inflicted on me and has been allowed to grow up as nature intended him to be. So there it is: a sad but by no means unusual story. I've contacted BUFF (the US organisation Brothers United for Foreskins) in a fairly hopeless and pathetic attempt to procure foreskin restoration as my best chance for peace of mind. They tell me that there is a powerful identity of views among the predominantly circumcised population in the USA.

Mr Goodhart, if you do accept the sincerity of my position and, more importantly, the possibility that your son may grow up to be a sensitive person with his own separate identity, what will be your answer if in 20 years time he comes to you in a fit of suicidal despair and asks you, "Dad, why did you do it to me?"

PS: Are you sure that Acorn is the right medium for that tacky story about the chap who liked to slip it to little girls?

R.B.W. – Bedford

Dear R.B.W.: Thanks for your letter. The damage seems to have been done, not so much by circumcision as such, but primarily by your clear perception, as you put it, 'that I had been mutilated and was deficient, whilst they were whole', and by the ridicule you later experienced on this score. Since my own experiences at that age were the reverse: 'only cissies had elephants trunks; real sporty boys were roundheads', it would help me to understand your views better, and might very well also help you to come to terms with the desperate situations in your own childhood, if you could describe the first time when you learnt about your apparently unique circumcised status, and also the later incident(s) when it was used to ridicule you. None of us likes to think of ourselves as deficient or mutilated or ridiculous, so you can be sure that your account will be received sympathetically. If you would like it published under a pseudonym, that would be no problem.

As to your PS, yours is the third adverse comment on the Brazilian 'adventure'. I stand reminded of our essentially phallic objectives, and corrected for including this item.

T.A.

Dear Tony: I appreciate your sympathetic remarks. To expand: the first clear realisation of the damage done to me was at the age of five or so when an older girl rounded up half a dozen of us and instructed us to pee in line for the entertainment of her friends. All my companions were intact and my circumcised organ contrasted sharply (bluntly?) with the row of elephant's trunks, being instantly picked on by audience and performers alike as a source of curiosity, amusement and derision. One girl guessed correctly that I had had the end cut off, 'because there was something wrong with it.' (Incorrect: I'd been born normal.) Thereafter I was excluded from the rude and exciting games played by our little group.

It seems ridiculous, but I can still feel pain at the recollection of silly little events a year or two later, when I had to stand and watch when all my intact chums once more at the instigation of an older girl, were induced to show off to the girls by pulling their foreskins back to reveal their shiny purple knobs, so different from mine; or even more rudely, by ballooning their foreskins while peeing. My loss was thus brought home to me in an unforgettable way. Other similar episodes over the years served to undermine self-respect and confidence: you know how cruel children can be to someone who is 'different'. Consequently the foreskin came to represent to me a priceless asset which my unthinking parents had denied me.

All this was nothing compared to the distress I suffered in my teenage years when I recognised its potential for purposes other than peeing. At 13 most of my foreskinned friends had spontaneously learnt the art of wanking, whilst I was still wondering what all the fuss was about. One boy told his sister, who was renowned for her willingness to deal out expert manual satisfaction provided a similar service was done for her. She immediately set about remedying my ignorance by taking me in hand. But once again, curiosity and astonishment at the unfamiliar appearance of my organ changed to strong disapproval because she was unable to 'exercise' it in the normal way, due to the lack of skin to work over the knob. Thereafter her friends would ask me embarrassing questions, and I overheard many sniggering references to skinless sausages and the like.

It was not until I joined the army and did a two-year stint in Germany that I managed to overcome my self-doubt enough to respond to an approach from the opposite sex. This too was a disaster. The German girl took one look at my shorn organ and asked me if I was Jewish. Despite my denials she would have nothing more to do with me.

Is it any wonder that a circumcised man in a predominantly foreskinned society should be driven to contemplate suicide? I certainly was. I recollect a feeling of overwhelming desolation on hearing my best friend tell his girlfriend, "Rob's circumcised, you know", and her incredulous laughter when she turned to me and said, "You're not, are you?" The realisation that a simple carefree sexual relationship like theirs was denied to me because I could not bring myself to reveal my shameful mutilation to a potential partner made me wish for oblivion.

What caused the despair was the appalling finality and irrevocability, the knowledge that no amount of enterprise or initiative on my part could ever bring my foreskin back. If only I'd been left the option! It wasn't just a question of being 'different'. Part of my body had been cruelly cut away, when my friends had been allowed to remain whole. What greater indication that the decision to cut was an arbitrary one, based purely on someone else's whim?

I have got absolutely no quarrel with those who make a conscious decision to be circumcised. In fact I'll be happy to sign a petition for circumcision to be made available on request, on the National Health. What really makes my flesh crawl is the extension of the circumciser's missionary zeal to the infliction of his views on a defenceless infant who could, and probably will, grow up bitterly resenting his mutilation. I have another question for Mr Goodhart: are you absolutely sure you have the right to risk your son's future happiness, and are you prepared to accept his hatred if he doesn't like being 'improved' without the option?

Finally it needs to be said that an important part of the cause of my distress was the fact that, although some of my contemporaries were circumcised, for reasons of class, location, or possibly coincidence, all my close friends were intact, so I was always the odd man out when 98 per cent of the non-ethnic male population of the country are fully equipped. I think it is important that your readers understand that the road beyond circumcision, which for them appears to be strewn with roses, can be a minefield of unfulfilment and misery for others. It took me a considerable emotional toll to write this letter. Thanks, Tony, for the chance of getting it off my chest.

R.B.W. – Bedford

I'm glad it helped you to write all this, and I hope that seeing it in print and realising that you have been able to communicate your feelings to 120 Acorn members will also help. That is why I have published both your letters in succession. Of all the letters I have had, your worries and regrets about 'not being intact' are much the most heartfelt: other correspondents have at least reconciled themselves, and at best been very pleased, to have been circumcised. As you say in your final paragraph, however, a large part of your problem was simply 'being different', which would also have been the case if your problem had been 'bat ears', or a brown skin, or a neurosis induced by being told that masturbation was evil. A large part of what Acorn tries to offer is the chance to share such experiences and knowledge, which can counter people's feelings that they are 'odd' in what they are or do or feel. You would have been much helped when young by knowing that a brother or a friend was also a roundhead, and there might also have been the chance to learn together how to enjoy sex or to masturbate. As I am sure you now know, there are some very enjoyable ways to do so, whether you are a cavalier or a roundhead!

T.A.

Videos

Does anyone have or know of a video that shows a circumcision being performed? Perhaps someone planning to have it done would be willing to have the procedure videoed? Would a circumciser be willing to co-operate in making a video film? While detailed descriptions of the operation are quite explicit, it is still difficult to have a clear understanding of what is done. If anyone can help, please write in.

I.W. – Dorset

Videos And Films

Dear Tony: While staying on a kibbutz in Israel in November 1988 I spotted an article in the Jerusalem Post (the main English paper there) entitled 'Video Stars' about the Torah Outreach Programme (TOP) in the Jewish old quarter of Jerusalem.

TOP has a stock of almost 150 video tapes, most of them 'talking head' lectures by Jerusalem rabbis which provide "a visual record of the capital's English-speaking religious lecture circuit". But the catalogue also includes one entitled A Brit Mila Happening with Shlomo Carlebach: 'this provides the viewer with an almost clinical view of a circumcision.' TOP director Jakov Fogelman says that 'this tape, which features songs performed by Carlebach at a brit, is a favourite of Carlebach and fellow-travellers.' The tape, he says, is also suitable for someone just interested in Jewish culture, or for a person curious about what happens at a circumcision. 'There is a certain folksiness in this tape', Fogelman says. 'It is a happening.'

In addition to students from various programmes who drop in to see their favourite rabbi lecture, non-Jewish tourists also use the service to gain glimpses of Jewish ritual and history. There is also a small but steady flow of television-starved neighbourhood yeshiva students who come to watch anything put on the screen. One day three haredi boys were glued to a screening of an innocuous little cartoon called Joshua and the Battle of Jericho. When someone asked to see the Carlebach circumcision tape, the boys stayed put, instinctively saying 'Amen' after the father in the tape recited the blessings.

So I went along. After overcoming my initial embarrassment at asking a teenage American girl to play it, I settled down to watch it. Half way through, an ultra-orthodox man wearing a black coat and long side-curls walked in, saw what was on and sat down next to me. Then he opened a bag of crisps and offered me some! We said nothing to each other, both absorbed by the ritual circumcisions. If any Acorn reader visits Israel, I'd heartily recommend this video. Take a blank cassette with you: perhaps the assistant will allow you to record it.

I have also noticed that the subject of circumcision has crept into box-office films. Drowning by Numbers is an idiosyncratic piece by Peter Greenaway about three women, grandmother, mother and daughter, all of whom drown their respective impotent husbands. One character, a boy called Smut(!), actually circumcises himself, following the advice of a young girl who says it is cleaner.

Crossing Delancey is a touching love story of a successful Jewish woman in New York, torn between a vain and exciting Dutch author or a dull and steady pickle seller from the Lower East Side. Here the circumcision is on religious grounds, and therefore better fits the plot. There is also a 15-minute short called Dicks. Apparently its premier was at the Edinburgh Film Festival.

Time Out says it is an amusing collection of interviews of women on their opinions of the male anatomy. I think it goes on general release this autumn, in London first I presume. Have any other readers seen these films? What did you think? Keep up the good work.

Henry – Cambridge

[Thanks, Henry. Can any reader get the address of TOPS or, better still, a copy of the Carlebach video? Please let us know if you can. — T.A.]

What's Yours Called?

Mine was 'Mickey Mouse' as a child, later shortened to 'Mickey'. At school it was 'cock', 'prick' or 'dick'. In Spain, to a child, you refer to his 'pito' (little whistle), and later he graduates to having a 'troncho'. In Germany it is 'Schwanz' or 'Pimmel'.

I.M. – Crawley

In Germany, polite society use Penis, but more usually 'Das Mannliche Gleid', or simply 'Gleid' (= male member, or member). 'Cock' would be translated as 'Schwanz' (= tail). A southern German colloquialism, particularly amongst youngsters is 'Zipfel' (= end-piece, or Peter). There is a concoction of mashed potatoes formed into a sausage and deep or shallow fried, which looks quite suggestive: in Swabia and Bavaria they are actually called 'Bubenzipfele' (= boy's little peters). In childish language you would use 'Pipi', and this is used well into adulthood especially by mothers and, consequently, women. To piss is 'Pipi machen' (= do a pee), or for adults 'pissen'. Testicles are 'Hodensack' politely or just 'Sack' vulgarly; another common expression is 'Eier' (= eggs). Female pudenda are referred to as 'Scham' politely, a term also used medically for pubic, e.g. 'Schambein' (= pubic bone). The cunt is commonly called 'Moese', also 'die Muschi' (possibly from Muschel = shell), or 'Pflaume' (= plum). I have heard the following childish rhyme about the male and female sex organs:

Lakritz, Lakritz,
die Frauen ham ne Ritz, die Manner ham nen Hampelmann, da lutschen alle Weiber dran.

(Translation: lakritz is liquorice, here used to form a rhyme, but also because it is sold in long strips to be sucked; women have a crack; men have a jumping jack, all the women suck them). This rhyme is 50-60 years old, and a jumping jack was a frequent toy in those days. I doubt that someone would call a cock a 'Hampelmann' these days except for a joke.

J.T.D. – London NW2

[Apologies for missing umlauts (!) — T.A.]

Saunas

The saunas in England are pretty dismal, except for Unit One in Rottingdean, near Brighton, which is clean, efficient, and unlike most in Britain, has private cubicles. In London they are bad and I can think of no good reason to return. I have visited three, in St Martin's Lane, in the Shepherd's Bush Shopping Centre, and at 29 Endell Street, Covent Garden. They are expensive, St Martin's Lane is not very clean, and the staff in all three give the impression that if they were to turn their backs for one second, mass orgies/rapes would break out. The saunas in Germany rank from very good to fantastic. In the 'straight' saunas the men walk around completely naked. Some men show an interest in the male anatomy; but they are just more difficult to find. In the 'gay' saunas they wear a towel most of the time.

I.M. – Crawley

At The Pool

There were four men in the changing room, all in their 40s, all a little over weight and with fairly short, fat cocks. Three of them were neatly circumcised, while the foreskin of the fourth covered about half his glans and left the tip bare. With him were two boys, one aged about 6, with a foreskin covering his glans with little overhang. His brother, about two years older, had an above-average sized penis with a clearly visible circumcision scar about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " behind the sulcus. The glans was very well developed, with a rim of substantially greater diameter than the shaft.

A five-year-old boy accompanied one of the circumcised men: his penis was of average size for his age, but notable for an extra ordinarily long foreskin which hung loosely, fully  $\frac{1}{2}$ " beyond the glans tip. With the third man there were three lads, one of 16, very well hung and loosely circumcised in the Islamic style: a wide band of loose, wrinkled pinkish skin between the purple glans and the brownish shaft, so that the glans rim nestled in a cushion of inner foreskin. The second lad looked about 11, with a juvenile uncircumcised penis, the foreskin of which hung a bit beyond the glans tip. The third lad had a well-developed circumcised penis, again in the Islamic style, although with less slack skin behind the glans.

There were two other lads in the changing room at the same time, one of about 12 with a pre-pubertal penis slackly circumcised and one of about 11, uncircumcised. Score: 7 roundheads to 5 cavaliers, a far higher proportion of roundheads than has been observed there before, or than might be expected. Two of the boys had good brown suntans, but there was nothing to indicate an Islamic or Jewish affiliation: indeed the family groups were notable for their inclusion of both roundheads and cavaliers.

Nipples

After reading about the varied and interesting methods of (male) masturbation used by Acorn members, I notice that seldom if ever do they mention stimulation of the nipples as being of value. For some time now I have been stimulating solely my nipples in attempts to bring myself to a climax. Whilst I have been tantalisingly close, I have not yet been able to succeed. I feel, however, that if I were able to increase their sensitivity, I might well be successful. If any members have suggestions of how to do this, I would be happy to put them to the test.

A.R. – Hampshire

[Good luck, A.R. The obvious next move would seem to be to pierce them. This is usually done transversely, and, apart from the obvious precautions about cleanliness and sterile equipment, care is also needed to clamp each nipple precisely so that the piercing is placed accurately. A sleeper pin is kept in place until healing is complete, when it can be replaced by a ring. Special devices can be worn in the piercing to stretch the nipple (a practice which was also used by 18th century women to ensure that the nipple would be sufficiently prominent when feeding their future babies). — T.A.]

Contact 1

I'm Matthew, a Forum Society member, heterosexual, but I would like to be introduced to bisexual activities by a Forum-minded couple. I get pleasure from seeing other males' genitals and would like to correspond with others (male and female) who, as I do, like to find ways to improve our knowledge of the penis. I would like to know more about penis tattooing, piercing, enlargement, and masturbation techniques.

M.S. – Birmingham 42

Contact 2

R.A. – Brighton, 37, recently cut, former retractor, would like to meet other Acorn members.

To: Tony Acorn
P.O. Box 113,
WESTON-SUPER-MARE,
AVON, BS23 2ED

Date: .....

Please enter my subscription to ACORN for 1990, @ £10 =

Please send the following back issues of ACORN 1989

.....(number) issues....., @ £1.25 =

or all 8 issues I-Q for 1989 (122 pages) @ £10 =

Please send the following back issues of ACORN 1988

.....(number) issues....., @ £1 =

or all 8 issues A-H for 1988 (86 pages) @ £8 =

Please supply copies of the 202 page book,
'Circumcision: an ethnomedical study' @ £20 =

I enclose cash/Postal Order/cheque/draft for £ _____ payable to Acorn, in a securely sealed envelope. =====

Mailings will be securely packaged in plain brown envelopes and posted by second class mail to the address given by the Acorn member. Orders for the book will be despatched separately from orders for the ACORN Newsletter. Receipt of an order will normally be acknowledged by despatch of the items requested. Please allow 28 days for delivery.

From: .....

.....

.....

.....

ACORN

1990 Issue No 1

(Formerly Issue R)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Foreskins And
Masturbation Methods	Peter	Page 3
Circumcision: How Tight?	J.H.	Page 5
Like Father, Like Son	B.H.	Page 7
David Meets
The Initiation Master	Alan	Page 9
Book Review: The Swimming Pool
Library, by Alan Hollinghurst	T.A.	Page 16
Penis Massage	Matt S.	Page 17
Body Art		Page 18
Roundhead And Cavalier
Husbands Compared	D.C.	Page 19
Tickle Twatty	C.W.	Page 20
Piercing World	Tony	Page 21

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the first 1990 issue of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in circumcision, foreskins and everything phallic: the penis, piercing, and 'getting the phallus into the best possible shape'. Acorn: why the name? The Latin for acorn is glans, which both cavaliers and roundheads have in common. Those who know this meaning know what we are about. But Acorn makes a convenient name because it is sufficiently anonymous: it could also apply to people interested in anything from computers to naval history. We are a Group recognised by the Forum Society (which also recognises a range of encounter and other Groups), and they are kind enough to forward mail for us. There is also an Acorn Group in the USA (from whom we have borrowed the name), but the only connection otherwise is in our shared interests.

Contributions: When the Newsletter started in early 1988, I wondered how long it would last. Now we are embarking on its third year, thanks to the enthusiastic response of readers. Its success depends very much on contributions from you the readers, so please keep sending your ideas, stories, anecdotes, comments, information, and observations. Provided only that it relates to our broad theme, we include fantasy as well as factual contributions. Readers can use their own judgement to decide between fact and fantasy. We also include contact requests (which may be edited). If contributions come in as they have done, we hope again to manage over 100 pages in 8 issues for 1990.

Information: It must be clearly understood that any information published, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes any recommendation by Acorn members or by the Editor of Acorn Newsletter or by the Forum Society or its members or officers. Anyone acting on any such information does so at their own risk, and must rely on their own judgement in doing so. Some members will learn much from this newsletter. Others may want specific advice and help, such as the name of a practitioner able to help them achieve the changes they want, or to give advice specific to their condition. The membership of Acorn includes doctors, some of whom are willing to help other members. A copy of the list of Jewish circumcisers (mohelim) approved (and annually reviewed) by the Initiation Society is available. Most only operate in a religious context and only on infants, but some are additionally qualified and may be willing to help adolescents or adults in non-religious circumstances.

Confidentiality: Contributions will be identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Letters may be forwarded anonymously if you wish. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with these guarantees in mind. Other Members may be contacted by sending your letter to Acorn (address shown on front page) and asking for it to be sent on to the person named. It is your decision whether to give your address, and it is their decision whether to reply or not.

Subscriptions: Whether you join in January or later in the year, your £10 annual subscription pays for all the issues, including back copies, published in 1990. This makes it fairly easy to ensure that everyone gets what they have paid for. 1988 back copies (86 pages) are available for £8 and 1989 back copies (122 pages) for £10. You can pay by cheque or postal order, preferably blank: receipt will be acknowledged, generally by sending what you have asked for; address as for Replies.

Who Else Would You Ask If You Wanted An Answer To These Questions? is the headline in advertisements for 'Self-Helpline'... just ring 0898 777 followed by the number that you want. 709 is given as the additional number for 'Male circumcision: your questions answered'. When I rang this number I heard seven and a half minutes (at 25p per minute cheap rate, 38p per minute at all other times) of how easy, helpful and unembarrassing it could be to see a Sex Therapist for such problems as premature ejaculation or impotence. There was no mention whatever of circumcision, and the caller was told to start by seeing their own doctor first. A caller could also find the Marriage Guidance Council by looking in the local phone book (incidentally, it is now called 'Relate', though callers were not told this). Or you could write to the Association of Sex Therapists for the address of one near you: the address given was PO Box 62, Sheffield S10 3TL. So, if you really want an answer, my advice would be not to phone 'Self Helpline': like so many other phone-ins, this one is also a rip-off. In my view, the answer to the question in the headline is: 'almost anyone but them'. Why not write to Acorn instead?

T.A.

Foreskins And Masturbation Methods

I consider myself lucky still to have a foreskin. When I was five my mother took me to the family doctor because my foreskin would not retract. He did not believe in circumcision unless absolutely necessary. He applied an anaesthetic solution to my little penis, and I can just recall his using a thimble-like instrument and succeeding in passing my foreskin beyond the glans. He instructed my mother to get me to retract my foreskin every night in the bath. Sometimes it would not come back very easily.

I was a wanker from an early age, although of course no ejaculate appeared until 14. When I was approaching puberty and obviously more aware of what a penis was all about, I decided to wear my foreskin permanently tucked behind the ridge. Often I got an erection from the friction of my tight trousers, and I can remember being embarrassed when it was time to get off the bus. I would use my school briefcase to cover my bulge until it wore off. I seemed to be in a permanently erect state for four or five years. I suppose it was all part of growing up and nature helping to develop my penis, strengthen my muscles and improve my blood supply.

When masturbating, I use various methods. Sometimes I use the foreskin with some lubrication to bring myself to orgasm, and sometimes I use one hand gliding up and down my shaft. There are times when I use the palms of both hands and with a rolling action bring myself off. DIY is so much more controlled, unless one has a very gentle partner who is able to feel and read you. The pinch and squeeze technique is unfortunately not widely known. I have never had a multiple orgasm, but even at 50 I have a quick recovery time and can have three orgasms within an evening's play-time. I am vasectomised, but I don't think that makes any difference other than taste. My wife tells me that my juices are slightly sweeter than they were before vasectomy, because my ejaculate is pure seminal fluid and no sperm.

I am now 50 so I have been wearing my foreskin in a retracted state for well over 35 years. Of course I can cover my glans, especially when I have soaked in the bath, my skin is soft and I am relaxed.

My wife definitely prefers to see a man with an exposed prick. She adores the shape and also the taut string on the underside that joins the foreskin to the shaft (the frenulum). Mine is particularly sensitive and if played like a violin string can easily bring me to orgasm. I also think that during masturbation (DIY or partnered) the glans has been able to be less sensitive and accordingly ejaculation can be prolonged. Mind you, this is only supposition on my part, since you can't prove otherwise unless you've worn your foreskin covering the glans all the time – but I suppose you could experiment and ask others. That is why I think a club to exchange notes and read about the subject is very healthy.

Most of my female friends over the years have indicated a preference for the uncovered penis, but perhaps they would not want to say otherwise for my sake. After all, if I ask: 'Do you like my penis exposed?' it is a leading question. But I could always cover it up if a partner preferred, unlike the finality of circumcision, which you have to live with.

Talking to my masseuse the other day about length, she complemented me on being slightly above average, but she said the ultimate test is whether or not the tip of the erect penis can just reach the navel! She said some peoples actually hang weights to boys just before puberty and, like traction on short legs, this enables their penises to be much longer: I wonder if you have any information? Presumably the same could apply to females: their labia could be stretched by early pulling or being pierced and having weights attached. Of course such things have to be part of the culture and performed at an early age as part of a ceremony or initiation to sex. We don't go in for real sex education in this country. I often wonder what young girls think in places like Bangkok when they are employed in a massage parlour at the age of six to entertain and relieve men.

Although most of us masturbate from an early age, we don't really know what sex is about until as we approach puberty we naturally start to examine ourselves more attentively. I remember catching my sister when she was aged 12 looking at her genitals in a mirror. We ought to be encouraging much more awareness of our sex organs and the differences between them. There is even more secrecy about female genitals, clitoral hoods, clitoral shaft size, and variations between the labia, than there is about the male genitals: at least these can be observed in changing rooms, urinals etc. But alas some would regard this as stealing innocence or being perverted. At least the penis survey is a start towards comparisons of the male genitals, but we still have a long way to go.

Peter – Tonbridge, Kent

Circumcision: How Tight?

Dear Tony: Thanks for the year's set of Newsletters. I think the correspondence is most informative and surprisingly serious. Many of the letters totally echo my own thoughts: concern over cleanliness in the uncut state, great relief once it was over, etc. Unlike many writers, though, I found that the greatest improvement was not for masturbation (though the technique was obviously changed) but for various types of sexual activity with my wife. Having the penis permanently bare was a great improvement in lovemaking, and her own attitude was very favourable too (though her interest in the subject is, perhaps understandably, less than my own).

Like other members of Acorn, I found that the shaft skin became rather looser over the years, and about 18 months ago I had a revision carried out at the Marie Stopes Clinic which improved things considerably. However, when relaxed, the skin still slightly overlaps the sides of the penis head. When erect it is fairly taut, though the skin can still be moved back and forth to a certain extent. How tightly can the penis be circumcised, before it affects an erection? Has anyone experienced that state, and are there any other problems? Like others, I feel a complete, radical circumcision to be the ideal.

I have read that Islamic circumcisers are more thorough than Jewish (or British) surgeons: is that so?

J.H. – Banstead

[Dear J.H.: Both Islamic and Jewish traditional circumcision methods begin by pulling the foreskin forward and removing it with a single cut, taking precautions to ensure that the glans is not damaged and the cut is made beyond its tip. This removes outer foreskin but leaves the inner face of the foreskin covering the glans to a length about equal to the glans length. The essential difference of technique between them is that the Islamic operator simply turns back this inner layer, so that it forms a strip of skin bordering the glans rim. The cut edge then lies close to the cut edge of outer skin, and the two cut edges heal together, so that the scar line lies some way up the penis shaft: how far depends very much on how much skin was pulled forward initially. The Jewish mohel tears the inner layer of foreskin longitudinally where it lies on the glans and then turns back the flaps. The result is that the scar line lies close to the glans rim on top (the dorsal side), but underneath the skin is much slacker, sometimes forming almost a small 'apron' hanging level with the glans tip, and sometimes forming a bulge under the glans.

The tightness or slackness depends very much on the operator's judgement and on how firmly he pulls the foreskin forward for the initial cut. For example, Turkish and Egyptian operators have the reputation of removing a minimum, enough to bare the glans tip but leave the rim covered. Slackness is also affected by the age at which the operation is performed: Muslims in Britain seem to have their boys circumcised before they are two, but the usual age in Turkey, Malaysia etc is about 12, often when he is old enough to have read through the whole Koran (cf the Jewish Bar Mitzvah). Jews, of course, circumcise (Brit Milah) on the eighth day: the operator ensures that the penis is erect, which also means that any error is on the side of caution. So the consequence of infant circumcision is often a fairly slack result, and Jewish regulations provide for a second operation if the glans proves later not to have been bared sufficiently. British surgeons vary greatly in the results which they achieve, depending very largely on how experienced they are. These days circumcision is fairly rare, and is often considered trivial enough to be left to an inexperienced junior duty-surgeon, with results ranging from good to very uneven and unsatisfactory. Anyone contemplating circumcision, either for himself or for a son, is therefore strongly advised to go to a surgeon with plenty of experience of this particular operation.

You ask how tight a really radical circumcision can be before it affects an erection. There seems to be a widespread anxiety among circumcisers about taking off too much, and among those considering circumcision that if they are circumcised radically, they may have an erection during convalescence and burst the stitches. Each of these complications is a very rare occurrence in practice, and a slacker result than the patient would really have liked seems much more common. In fact, of course, the penis skin is very elastic indeed, and some slack from the scrotum can also be taken up underneath before an erection is affected. Sometimes a penis bends to one side when erect, but, rather than being the consequence of an over-tight circumcision, this is much more likely to be the result of some difference between one side and another in the mechanisms regulating the blood-flow into and out of the left and right corpora cavernosa, the two structures of spongy tissue which form the penis shaft. (There is a third underneath, the corpus spongiosum, which surrounds the urethra and continues to form the glans).

From your description, it sounds as though your circumcision could be safely tightened a little further at the sides. But test out this conclusion for yourself by marking a strip of skin on either side of your current scar-line, as wide as you think could be removed, using a 'permanent' felt-tip pen, and then check when your penis is fully erect to see if you still think the amount marked is 'spare'. If you decide to go ahead, this will give you a good idea of what to ask the circumciser to do. — T.A.]

Like Father, Like Son

Dear Tony: I was originally circumcised whilst in the RAF serving in Holland. I had always wished to be circumcised but had been unable to find a surgeon sympathetic to my wishes. Even the surgeon at the nearby American base said he would be quite happy to do it, if my RAF MO was agreeable: needless to say, he was not. Just before my tour finished, a new medic came to my unit, and I saw him as soon as possible to see what his attitude was. He suggested that I request circumcision on religious grounds, which I did. The surgeon at the hospital agreed to circumcise me under these circumstances, and I was soon admitted. There were five of us in the ward for circumcision: I managed to find out that one had penile warts, two had split their foreskins during sex due to the foreskin not retracting fully, with the result that they tore. The fourth had a very long foreskin which he had caught in his trouser zip – it kept getting infected and would not heal. After the circumcisions were done we stayed in hospital five days and then were allowed home. I healed in about two weeks and was having sex straight away. I was pleased to be circumcised, but not overly pleased with the result. Our surgeons do not have enough practice. I had a lop-sided scar with a small bunch of redundant skin on the right side of the shaft behind the glans.

When my son was born we lived in northern Scotland. I tried to get him circumcised, but I was greeted with hostility and refusal. I could not get him done at the same time as myself because I wanted to see my own result first. So when I returned to the UK from Holland I kept a watch in Forum, eventually finding the information I needed. An article appeared about the advantages of circumcision, and I wrote asking the name of the surgeon mentioned in the article. He was based in northern England, but sad to say is no longer with us. I contacted him and arranged to have my son circumcised. When we arrived he weighed my son and then asked me to undress him and lay him on the operating table. He then gave an anaesthetic which would last about three hours, to allow my son to recover slowly, and started the circumcision.

As he could not retract his foreskin, he first used a probe to see if there were any adhesions. There did not seem to be, so he put two clamps, one on either side of the frenulum, and two more on top. He then used a scalpel to carefully cut a slit in the foreskin on top of the glans, so he could then peel back the tight skin. This allowed him to clean around the glans and sulcus with a swab. Next he took a Plastibell and placed it in position on the glans and pulled the foreskin forward over it until a mark that he had made on the foreskin with an indelible pen reached the groove on the Plastibell. He got me to hold the clamps for him whilst he tied a ligature around the foreskin, depressing it into the groove. This would cut off the blood supply to the excess skin and allow it to die and drop off with the Plastibell. He used a scalpel to cut off as much of the excess skin as he could: the lack of blood oozing proved the ligature was tight enough. The Plastibell rested on the glans and when healing was complete it dropped off, allowing the skin to retract permanently to the rear of the glans and leaving a smooth straight circumcision scar. If the frenulum is too tight or too short it can be cut prior to the Plastibell being fitted.

Whilst my son was recovering, the surgeon asked if I wanted to be done. I told him about my circumcision. He asked to see it and his comment was: 'Good God, who was the butcher?'. Then he offered to do a revision operation for me if I would like. I jumped at the chance. He had me undress and lie on the table. When he had scrubbed up and cleaned my genitals, he injected anaesthetic into the shaft and under the skin near the frenulum: it stung a little, but that was all. Whilst it was taking effect he stretched my remaining foreskin over the glans to see how much there was, and then marked it with a dye pen where he would cut it. He asked if my frenulum gave me any trouble, and I said no. In retrospect I wish I had got him to cut it; however, I didn't. When he had tested to make sure that the anaesthetic had worked, he got to work with his scalpel, cutting and stitching. After about 15 minutes he said: 'That will look much better when it is healed.'

He gave me lunch, refused to accept any money for my son, and charged just £35 for my circumcision, saying that all men should be circumcised. He had been circumcised as an adult while a surgeon in the army in Africa. Both my own and my son's circumcisions healed up perfectly, although my son did have a little difficulty in peeing, as the Plastibell tends to press against the glans because of the foreskin trying to retract all the while. This problem was overcome by putting him in a lukewarm bath, which somehow allowed this tension to relax. My own result was fabulous: no bunch of spare skin and a nice neat scar  $\frac{1}{4}$ " behind the glans.

About three years ago I started having trouble with my frenulum. After any energetic intercourse it hurt and tended to feel tight. Whether it has shrunk, I don't know, but it did restrict my pleasure so I was on the lookout for a surgeon to attend to it, as my pen-friend in the USA suggested. He had removed his own but I didn't fancy that, so I contacted Mr Hasan for an appointment to see if he would cut or remove it. He saw me and agreed to do so, and whilst checking it out he said he would tighten up my foreskin if I wished. I agreed and the following week I attended his Harley Street clinic. I was told to remove all my clothes below the waist and get on to the operating table. The nurse put on operating drapes. He injected into the shaft and skin and then into the glans, which stung, and into the frenulum. Whilst it was working he marked what he was going to do. I was unable to see, and with a numb cock I could not feel what was happening, so all I can say is that when he was finished he stitched it up and bandaged the site. He gave me a prescription for some tablets. After 30 minutes he checked me and when he was satisfied that all was well I could go home. It took a little longer to heal than the previous circumcision, but I am well pleased with it and there is no more discomfort during any form of sex. The scar is neat and fading away. The skin is taut on the shaft during erection and stays behind the glans at all times when not erect. In the 20 years I have been circumcised I have not lost any sensitivity.

To those of you who are contemplating circumcision or are circumcised but are not satisfied with the result I say: 'get yourself circumcised, you will not regret it.' If you are thinking of having a revision, I'd say: 'Do it.' It is for your own benefit and pleasure, so go ahead. In my experience you will not regret it. If any of you are still uncertain or want advice I would be quite happy to write and answer any of your questions. I can be reached care of Acorn.

B.H. - Leeds

[Many thanks for your letter, Brian, and some very interesting enclosures which usefully keep me up to date with the US debate on circumcision. It's nice to hear of another satisfied customer of the late and much lamented Ossie Gibson, who ran his circumcision practice under the name of John Smith and offered an extremely useful service in an area of the country which is otherwise poorly served in this respect. A few questions: How old was your son when you took him to be circumcised? What was his mother's attitude to your intention? What has been his own attitude - has he commented at all? — T.A.]

David Meets The Initiation Master

When the letter came, David felt a mixture of excitement and dread. "This must be what it was like when you had spent your childhood playing soldiers and then your war-time call-up papers came telling you to report to the army", he thought.

As a boy of five, sharing the toilet for a pee with his friend Sam, he had discovered that the end of Sam's penis was always bare and neat and ready for action. By contrast, his own ended in a long wrinkled foreskin and did not aim nearly as well. As soon as he saw Sam's cock, he had wanted his own to be like it. Later he found out that other boys were roundheads like Sam.

At school the boys formed rival gangs. There were fewer in the roundhead gang, but they always seemed to be in control in the playground. If a new boy came, he was soon checked out in the toilets. The lucky ones could join the roundheads. The unlucky ones had to choose one of the 'cavalier' gangs, and from then on their chances were slim of getting through a term without being roughed up. David had heard from Sam about the check-out in the toilet and tried to make his foreskin stay back to keep his glans bare, but the roundheads were wise to that trick: they soon saw the bunch of wrinkled skin on the shaft and pulled it forward with a jerk. From then on the nickname 'E.T.' followed him through school: he tried to make out it was because his friends thought of him as the loveable Extra-Terrestrial creature of the film, but he knew and they knew that it stood for "Elephant's Trunk". The name even followed him from primary to secondary school. In bed at night he 'played soldiers' with his cock. When it stood to attention, he could make the skin stay back for as long as half an hour. He often tried to keep it back by sleeping on his stomach, but when he awoke in the morning, it had slipped forward and the glans was damp and smelly again.

Increasingly he came to despise his own penis, with its long wrinkled foreskin, its "elephant's trunk" look, its unpredictable aim when he peed, the stale smell of it when he pulled the skin back, and the realisation that even if he washed it every day, it never seemed really clean. Once he had seen a graffiti reference to 'dirtskin' and knew at once what it meant.

In the showers at school and now at the sports club he never liked the others to see his cock with its wrinkled end: somehow it seemed to make his cock look smaller. But he had also perfected the art of carefully observing other men's equipment. Some of the other cavaliers had thin, short foreskins which allowed the glans tip to peep out, which seemed neater than his. The roundheads he saw seemed to have a self-confident swagger and always seemed pleased to show off their handsome endowments.

At work recently he had been told to choose his next car. Most of the others had Vauxhall Cavaliers, but because of the unpleasant associations of that name he had asked for a Ford Sierra instead. The Astra which he had before was too closely associated in his mind with the stars and E.T.: he was glad it was going.

So he read the letter with a mixture of excitement and fear. At once he followed its instructions, phoning to book a hotel room in a northern town which he had never visited before, and then checking train times. In the following ten days of waiting his imagination allowed him to picture everything he thought would happen: the pain of the operation, the dread of flinching or crying out while it was being done, the elation of becoming a roundhead at last. He wondered whether he would faint at the sight of his bleeding penis. Would the operator cut off too much? Suppose the stitches pulled out if he had an erection: what would happen then? How long would it take to heal afterwards? But the longed-for elation of finally being rid of his despised encumbrance of foreskin would make even all that worth while.

He went over all of these thoughts again as he sat in the train; but he always returned to the hope of deliverance, and the stroke of luck which had put him into contact with the man who would free him. So he checked into the hotel soon after lunch, left a note of his room number at the desk addressed to the mysterious 'Mr Acorn', and went up to his room. It was expensive but comfortable. From the window he could look far out over the roofs of the town: that also meant that no-one could see in. The bathroom was clean and brightly lit. He unpacked his small case, including the odd assortment of items he had been told to bring, and laid them out neatly on the table. Then he settled down to watch television and wait for Mr Acorn.

Enter the Initiation Master

After a while he began to fear that he might be the object of an expensive hoax. But then he heard a knock. He turned off the t.v. and opened the door. The man standing there was of medium height and would not stand out in a crowd, but behind his glasses David noticed a determined glint. He said he was Mr Acorn, and they exchanged a few pre-arranged words which quickly established each other's identity. This was the Initiation Master, into whose hands David would have to entrust not just his foreskin but power, too, over his entire manhood.

David beckoned him in, together with the two other men whom he introduced as his assistants, Chris and Roger. David had not expected them, but it was a bit late to object now. Mr Acorn told the three of them to fold back the bed covers, and he laid a white plastic sheet on it to protect the bottom sheet: now David knew why he had brought those plastic bin-liners. Then Mr Acorn locked the door, told Chris and Roger to strip, and watched while they helped David remove every item of his clothing. Chris ran a hot bath into which Mr Acorn poured a generous dash of antiseptic fluid, then told David to sit in it. Chris and Roger washed David thoroughly, working down towards his cock, which received such thorough attention that it was soon as firmly erect as he had ever known it. Meanwhile in the bedroom Mr Acorn rechecked the door and laid out the tools of his office. Then he, too, stripped and returned to the bathroom.

David looked-up, and could not take his eyes off what he saw. Mr Acorn stood naked at the door. His penis was slightly erect, and it had been tightly circumcised. But what held David's attention was his badge of office: a solid, heavy silver Prince Albert ring hanging from the tip of his glans. David thought to himself that anyone who had the self-control and determination to have a ring like that inserted must indeed have the mastery which Mr Acorn claimed.

That's where the line will be

At a command from Mr Acorn, David stood up and dried himself thoroughly. Chris and Roger took him through to the bedroom sat him across the bed with his buttocks at the edge and his legs apart. They arranged a pile of bedding to support his back. Then one sat each side of him. They entwined a leg with each of his, and held David's arms across their shoulders, joining their own arms behind his neck, holding David firmly and making him look down. He was immobilised, and all three men had a good view of what was to follow. Mr Acorn put a small plastic bowl under David's scrotum, then knelt between David's legs, took hold of his penis and examined it minutely. His left hand gripped and pressed at the base of David's penis: this kept it erect and firm. His right fingers gripped the tip of the foreskin and pulled it so hard that David winced. Then he pushed the foreskin back along the shaft steadily and very firmly until the glans was completely bare. Further moves and observations followed until David wondered how long he could keep control of the mounting urge for relief. He could see that Mr Acorn and both the Assistants, too, were displaying a similar level of arousal. Roger had a bright red recent circumcision scar. Chris had a long wrinkled foreskin which, like David's own, more than covered his glans, even though his penis was firmly erect. Still pulling David's foreskin firmly back, Mr Acorn took a pen and drew a neat line right round, 5mm from the rim of David's glans: "That is where your circumcision line will be", he said. David could only nod his agreement. Next, his foreskin was pulled firmly forward so that the rim of the glans could clearly be seen as a ridge underneath. A corresponding mark was made just behind this line. "Take a last look at your foreskin", said Mr Acorn, and David did. Suddenly he felt quite attached to it, especially as Mr Acorn and his Assistants had treated it none too gently during their preparations.

Once again David felt Mr Acorn's firm grip on his foreskin. He was pulling at it even harder than before, so that the line that he had just marked was now pulled beyond the end of his glans. Mr Acorn applied an instrument which lightly gripped the foreskin at the marked line. Then he spent several minutes first checking that the line on the skin exactly matched the edge of the instrument, and then pulling at the inner layer of skin and pushing at the glans. Just as David was about to say that he hoped it would all soon be over Mr Acorn said: "That's right now. Keep still, keep quiet and brace yourself." There was a click as he squeezed together the handles of the instrument. David felt a sudden pain, a sharp ache and a crushing tension. He just managed to bite back the cry which came to his throat. Mr Acorn reached out for his gleaming scalpel. David looked at him pleadingly: "Please hurry. I didn't expect this. I don't think I can bear it much longer." Mr Acorn simply replied: "Steady now", and bent over his task, exerting still heavier tension on the instrument while David watched in tense fascination.

Very steadily and deliberately Mr Acorn moved the scalpel blade down beside the edge of the clamp. David could feel it cutting and at the same time relieving the crushing pain of the clamp. In a few seconds the dark red line of cut skin extended while the outer surface of skin, relieved of tension, pulled back along the shaft of his penis to reveal the blood-red inner skin still covering his glans. As the scalpel reached the end of its stroke the skin pulled away and finally parted. The shaft skin sprang back until its cut edge took up exactly the position which Mr Acorn had marked.

David lay back in relief

The ring of stinging pain at the cut edge of foreskin was, if anything, a relief after the clamp, and was much more bearable than he had expected. He also felt almost detached from his body with its raw-ended penis, at which he continued to look with mesmerised fascination. He noticed that a trickle of blood dripped from it into the bowl and that his once-proud erection had vanished.

“Don’t relax yet. There is still the inner skin to trim away.” Mr Acorn pushed one blade of his forceps along the upper surface of the glans under the layer of inner foreskin which still covered it, closed the blades together and used them as a guide for the scissors with which he made a long cut in the remnant of inner foreskin, back as far as the glans rim. Then he turned back this inner skin and told Roger, sitting on David’s right, to use a tissue to grip the glans firmly between his forefinger and thumb. Mr Acorn used the scissors to cut away the inner foreskin, leaving only a narrow fringe of skin bordering the glans rim, about as wide as one blade of the scissors. With each closure of the blades David wondered whether he could stand the pain of the next one, especially as Mr Acorn worked his way round towards the frenulum. But with each cut, first round to his left and then to his right, David was also encouraged as his glans stood clear and unencumbered for the first time in its life. “Nearly there”, said Mr Acorn, as Roger held up David’s penis so that Mr Acorn could snip away to the point which would remove the frenulum. With one final snip, the foreskin fell away into the bowl. Roger let go and David’s penis could hang down. David sighed with relief and relaxed. He could see that Mr Acorn and Roger and Chris were throbbing with excitement. David also noticed their look of triumph as they contemplated one more successfully circumcised penis and counted another addition to the ranks of the roundheads.

We’ve not finished yet

It was almost an hour since Mr Acorn had arrived, but only fifteen minutes since they had come into the bedroom from the bathroom. “We’ve not finished yet. There is the bleeding to stop and then the stitches to put in.” David had wondered why Mr Acorn’s array of instruments included a miniature soldering iron: now he found out. Mr Acorn pushed the skin back as far as it would go along his penis shaft to bare it, dabbed it with a tissue and then touched the hot point of the soldering iron to one of the places from which blood was oozing, repeating this until the flow of blood was reduced to nothing more than a slight ooze. David did not feel much as he did this, but there was an unpleasant smell of singeing; he was relieved that it seemed to work, however. Chris and Roger were still beside him and David was comforted by his bodily contact with them: although the room was warm, he felt quite cold.

Mr Acorn pulled the shaft skin forward again and began the slow and careful process of stitching together the two cut edges of skin. With one pair of forceps he lifted up the edge; then a second pair of forceps was used to push the tiny needle through the skin. This process was repeated for the opposing edge, the thread was drawn through and carefully knotted. The first stitch went in underneath at the frenulum, and hurt quite a lot, but it turned out to be much the worst. The second went in on top, diametrically opposite the first where David could see what was happening, and the third and fourth were at each side. These hurt much less, with only a small sharp pain as the needle went in each time. Otherwise, David observed in a detached way, the main thing he could feel was a dull and heavy pain. Mr Acorn worked deliberately and carefully, taking his time to make sure that each stitch was accurately placed and securely tied before inserting the next. Warily David counted up to 64 neat little stitches before Mr Acorn stood back and at last pronounced his work finished. "Well done. Now you are a roundhead, with a penis free of foreskin and constantly bare to the world. Congratulations."

I have waited for this moment all my life

Then at last David could allow himself to relax. "Thank you", he gasped, "I have waited for this moment all my life. It hurt quite badly, but it is worth it now." Throughout the operation he had been steeling himself not to call out or wince: he did not want to show Mr Acorn or his Assistants that he might be unworthy of initiation to the ranks of the roundheads, and he certainly did not want them to do only half their work. With his knees he had gripped Chris's and Roger's legs, and he had watched Mr Acorn's every move so that he would not be caught by surprise. Now he lay back, and at once began shivering as the tension relaxed. He looked at his watch, and found that it was less than half an hour since Mr Acorn had started.

Mr Acorn removed the bowl which now contained the severed pieces of foreskin and some congealed blood, and then wiped away the splashes of blood on David's legs. Chris helped David to his feet, led him into the bathroom, and finished washing off the splashes of blood and the clots which had congealed on his scrotum. David looked at his newly circumcised penis in the mirror. It hung loosely between his legs, bruised and swollen. But it was free at last of that wretched, wrinkled and ugly foreskin which had taunted him all his life with its unwanted presence. Instead there was a neat line just behind the rim of his glans where the new scarline would lie, now puckered and dark where the stitches drew together the cut edges of skin. Below the scarline his glans stood red, bare and proud, now permanently visible to all the world.

Mr Acorn let him admire himself for a while. Then he checked that all the blood clots had been wiped away and massaged an ointment onto the incision line, which stung for a few moments. This was followed by a strip of gauze which he fastened in place with a scrap of sticking plaster. "Is that all?" "Yes, you want as small a dressing as possible. But I'll tape this pad to your stomach. It will protect your clothes from any bleeding and from the lymph which will ooze from the scar-line for a while. Get dressed now, and keep warm: you will soon stop shivering."

While David did so, very carefully, Mr Acorn and the two Assistants busied themselves washing and tidying away the equipment. The blood and scraps of inner foreskin were flushed away, but the foreskin itself was carefully washed and dried, then pressed between layers of tissue, and given to David. Chris and Roger remade the bed. Then David sat down very carefully, while Mr Acorn phoned room-service for a tray of tea and biscuits: "The hot drink will counteract the shock symptoms which you are beginning to show."

The Circumcision Master

While they were drinking the tea David asked him how he had gained his qualification as a Circumcision Master. "I have been at several circumcisions. The first time I was only allowed to watch from a distance, because I was still a cavalier. The second time, I was at the centre of attention. I proved my own prowess by making the first cut myself. I had been told exactly what to do by the Master, when I told him I could make my own cut. It was easy enough to start with, but I nearly gave up when the knife reached the area near the frenulum: I had to pause, but I was determined to complete the job, and eventually I did so. My Circumcision Master thought I was too cocky, so when I had finished the first cut he really took his time trimming away the inner skin, a scrap at a time, and then he pulled at the frenulum to make sure that he removed it all."

"The third circumcision I went to, I was an Assistant. I sat beside Roger, just as Chris and Roger have done for you. Unlike you, he struggled a bit when the clamp was fixed and we had to hold him very firmly. But after that he calmed down. Then when the stitches were going in he started to moan, and we had to gag him to stop the noise."

"I already knew that I wanted to be an operator myself. I have always been fascinated by the accounts I have read of African tribal circumcisions, and I read all that I could find. So there and then, after we had finished with him, and in front of the operator and his assistants, I did the piercing for my Prince Albert. It hurt, but I knew that if I could do my own circumcision, I could go through with this too. If I wanted to be a circumciser I knew I would have to do it. Actually the needle went in quite easily. I was a bit alarmed at how much it bled, but the Circumcision Master told me it would soon stop, and actually it did. At first my ring was only a little one, but then I stretched the hole to take the big one. Now, since AIDS, we never do more than one operation at a time, to cut down the risk."

"You have done very well today. Do you want to come to Chris's circumcision next month, as my Assistant?" To himself David wondered whether he would have healed up enough by then. But it would be a chance to show off his new status as a roundhead to an admiring audience. Pleased at the implication that he was worthy of such an honour, he could only reply: "Yes please."

Convalescence

Chris and Roger left, but Mr Acorn stayed with David overnight. They watched some television, then went down to the hotel restaurant for dinner. David worried whether he could manage it without walking so oddly that people would wonder what was wrong with him, but nobody seemed to notice. Afterwards they returned to the bedroom. David badly wanted a pee, and found that so long as he just let his cock hang freely there was no problem. The thin, strong jet was much easier to manage than the spray he was used to. He got off to sleep quite easily, feeling exhausted by the nervous tension of the operation. But at 2am he woke with a wooden-hard erection, throbbing and aching powerfully.

He turned on the light in the bathroom and saw that the protective pad was slightly blood stained. He had a pee. Mr Acorn came in and helped him take off the dressing. They were glad to see that all the little stitches were still holding together firmly. A cool new dressing helped, and then he sat quietly reading until the erection went down. Mr Acorn told him it would be better if he did not get too hot under the bedclothes. David managed to get comfortable again and slept soundly until morning. Before he dressed, Mr Acorn put on another new dressing and changed the protective pad for a clean one. He told David that the scar-line would continue to ooze a clear, slightly bloody fluid for a few days, but if he used the ointment and kept the dressing in place, it shouldn't turn to puss and he would have no problems. After about three days he should be able to leave off the dressing and manage with the ointment and the protective pad.

David travelled home in the train accompanied by a warm sense of pride and triumph: he was a fully-qualified roundhead at last. Next time he was in the showers at the sports club, he'd be proud to show off his new status and tell his friends: "Yes, I've had myself circumcised. It's a great improvement. I strongly recommend it. In fact, I can tell you where to get it done." And in a month's time he would have a hand in Chris's transition from cavalier to roundhead: another fortunate fellow.

Alan – Lancs.

Book Review

The Swimming Pool Library by Alan Hollinghurst (Penguin 1988) £4.99

'Surely the best book about the gay life yet written by an English author' says the review by Edmund White quoted on the cover. On this occasion the blurb is fully justified. Whether gay or straight yourself, it is well worth reading this novel as much for its literary wit and style as for its ability to portray the excitement, lust, remorse, promiscuity, disappointment, cunning and enjoyment in the life of a rich young man-about-town during the last year (1983, before AIDS) when such wanton and careless enjoyment was possible. Cock spotting connoisseurs will relish the narrator Will's description of his young friend Arthur's member (p.19): 'Entirely delightful – short, stocky, ruthlessly circumcised, and incredibly resilient and characterful.'

Later (pp 164-5) he comments: 'O the difference of man and man. Sometimes in the showers, which only epitomised and confirmed a general feeling held elsewhere, I was amazed and enlightened by the variety of the male organ. In the rank and file of men showering the cocks and balls took on the air almost of an independent species, exhibited in instructive contrasts. Here was the long, listless penis, there the curt athletic knob or innocent rosebud of someone scarcely out of school. Carlos's Amerindian giant swung alongside the compact form of a Chinese youth whose tiny brown willy was almost concealed in his wet pubic hair, like an exotic mushroom in a dish of seaweed. On the other side of me a young businessman displayed one of those long dispiriting foreskins which gather very tight about the glans and then bunch and dribble on childishly for an inch or so more. Beyond him the cock of one of the weightlifters, radically circumcised, was in its usual ambiguous form, not quite at ease, not quite at attention.' In its 288 pages there is much else to delight, amuse and inform readers, whatever their own inclinations.

T.A.

Penis Massage

Hello Tony: Thank you for the back copies of Acorn. I read them with interest and am now looking forward to the next issue. I am a roundhead, circumcised as an infant. I've never known why, but as they say, "What you've never had you never miss." For the Acorn survey, my prick is 3.75" long flaccid and 5.9" erect, with the diameter at the base 3.3" flaccid and 4.8" erect. The scar-line is 0.6" from the glans rim. When erect the glans tip is 4.5" from my stomach. I'm 5'7.5" high. From these measurements my prick is a little below average. I've tried most ways to improve its size but with no long-term success, but then, has anyone? If they have, I'd like to hear from them. I try to keep my prick in tip-top condition by daily massage with a Vitamin E oil. I do this after my morning shower for at least 15 minutes. This leaves my prick with a good skin tone and a feeling of well-being all day long.

One of my favourite ways of wanking is first to massage it as described. Then while my prick is swollen but not fully erect I use a  $\frac{3}{4}$ " diameter rubber tube passed under my ball-bag and over the base of my prick close to my body. This I tie quite tight, which makes my prick and balls stand out away from my body. Using plenty of oil I start my wank, first with two fingers underneath and thumb on top of my shaft until I have a full erection. Then with my hand fist fashion I work from the base up over the glans. Towards the point of no return I put a small rubber dildo up my arse and time it so that as my hand comes down the shaft of my prick the dildo goes up. This results in a fantastic climax with about four or five good long spurts of cum. Thanks to the rubber tube my prick stays hard for some time afterwards, long enough to penetrate a partner and bring them off too.

I agree with 'Dick of Merseyside' (Issue 7/89) who would like a video showing the various methods of DIY which members use to bring themselves off. We all (male and female) get great pleasure in seeing each other doing what comes naturally. I'm sure that whoever could organise a wanking party video would have no trouble in getting volunteers to star in it. I'd like to advertise for any VHS videos, professional or home-made, with bi- or homosexual themes.

In answer to "What's yours called?", the term I usually use is prick. But with ladies I don't know too well, I'll say Cock, Tool, Willy, John Thomas, My small friend. For cunt it's Honey pot, Cave of love, Tunnel of passion, Fuzz box and Fanny. Most women I've been with enjoy using Anglo-Saxon words when we're fucking. I really think it's wonderful when you hear them asking you to fuck harder.

Yours in Forum friendship, Matt S. – Birmingham

Body Art

This is the name of a magazine which may interest some of our readers. It is a glossy production of 48 pages in A4 format, well illustrated with colour and monochrome photographs plus descriptive text. Tattooing receives fullest coverage, but it also covers related topics. For example, Issue 2 had articles on nipple piercing and pubic hairdressing. Issue 3: 'The piercings'. Issue 4: genital jewellery part 1 – male piercings. Issue 5: genital jewellery part 2 – female piercings. Issue 6: body painting, piercing clubs. Issue 7 featured female nipple development and has a long article, more mystical than explicit, on 'the magic of the wound'. Issue no 8 will cover tattoo symbolism and piercing enlargement. If your newsagent does not have it, you can send £6 (per issue! Cheques payable to Publications Limited) to Body Art magazine, Blake House Studios, Blake End, Rayne, Braintree, Essex CM7 8SH. Add £1 postage to Europe, £1.50 surface mail, £4.50 airmail to the rest of the world. A catalogue of body jewellery is also available from the same address for £4.50, refundable with the first order for £25 or more.

Roundhead And Cavalier Husbands Compared

Dear Sir: You may wonder what a middle-aged woman is doing writing to Acorn, but as one who has always taken an interest in circumcision, you may find my information interesting.

As a girl I was brought up to think of circumcision as a good thing – my brothers were circumcised and so was my husband. My preference was not uncritical, though, because I never cared for the appearance of the circumcised organ, especially as in so many cases the surgeon had done a botched job. Still, I thought, that was the price one had to pay for assured cleanliness and the avoidance of filthy practices.

So I had mixed feelings 20 years ago when my own son was born. But overcoming my hesitation, I took him to the paediatric clinic and asked for him to be 'done'. I didn't even get to see the doctor! The paediatric nurse had a quick look at my son's genitals and told me there was no reason to circumcise him. When I explained that it was a family tradition she said that medical opinion no longer supported unnecessary surgery. It would merely disfigure the boy without achieving any benefit. So to my husband's disgust and my misgivings, my son was allowed to grow up intact.

Two years ago the bottom fell out of my life when my husband died suddenly. However, I was luck enough to meet a super man and I'm happy to say life has begun anew. The thing is, my new man is uncircumcised, and his foreskin is the first I've ever experienced sexually. My first impression on seeing it confirmed my original view on the better appearance of a long foreskin. As my late husband grew older the skin of his circumcised knob had shrivelled and turned a peculiar whitish-grey, looking decidedly unappetising compared with the long sleek taper of my new man's vital dimension. But the real difference is in performance. As I reached the menopause my natural juices dried up, making sex painful for me and impossible for my husband without using a synthetic lubricant. Since his libido had never matched mine he was able to give up sex with a silent sigh of relief, while I had to resort to manual stimulation to ward off the frustration.

But my new man's foreskin has given my sex life a new impetus, contrary to my original instincts, since his penis moves smoothly and frictionlessly through it, and what I lack in lubrication he makes up for with his permanently moist glans which still remains sensitive to the touch, in contrast to my late husband's.

So although a lot of well-brought-up girls might wish their partner to be circumcised, they might do better to leave his foreskin alone with later years in mind – or consider trading him in eventually for an intact model if he's already circumcised! Yet I'm still subconsciously pro-circumcision. Why do you think this should be?

Yours sincerely, D.C. – Borehamwood

Tickle Twatty

Dear Mr Acorn: The circumcision controversy seems never-ending, with no-one prepared to see the other's point of view. From what I can see, none of you men really know what you so want, and the best thing you could do in my view is to let women decide for you!

The reason I say this is because from my early years I saw the problem at first hand. I spent my pre- and early-teens living with a distant 'aunt' with two sons roughly my own age, one circumcised and the other not. The boys both understood what circumcision was, but had no idea why they had been treated differently. We later found out that Auntie, against her better instincts, was talked into having the older boy done by a friend but, because of the complications he suffered, changed her mind when the second boy came along and left his foreskin intact. Anyway, the roundhead envied his brother his foreskin, while the cavalier felt that he had been neglected in some way. See what I mean?

Like most kids, whenever we had the opportunity we indulged in the harmless sex games that are an essential part of growing up, and in a large rambling farmhouse those opportunities were almost unlimited. When we were packed off to bed at the other end of the house, we would get into our pyjamas and then congregate in a bedroom for an hour's horseplay, which usually finished up with us all naked playing ball fights or tickle twatty. In these rude games of course they both got erections and I was incited to judge which was the most impressive. I was also asked to say which I preferred, the foreskin or the acorn. They certainly looked very different, because the cavalier's foreskin did not retreat much when his cock stiffened, leaving him with a comical little bobble of skin on the tip. The roundhead looked much more impressive with his knob all bare and swollen. I knew better than to make my preference known, though, and chickened out, saying that I liked both equally.

Later we grew more adventurous, and the games became more exciting when we discovered that touching and feeling added to the fun of looking and displaying. We would all sit naked on the bed with me in the middle whilst the two boys took it in turns to explore my hairless genitals and unformed breasts. At the same time I would hold their two penises, one cut and one intact, in each hand and, following some primeval feminine instinct, I soon discovered the pleasure to be given by squeezing and pulling.

By this time, of course, I had discovered that the cavalier's foreskin could be pulled down clear of his knob, so that his erection looked almost identical to his brother's except that his knob was wet and much more highly coloured.

This was a point in his favour, since I took a real shine to this exercise. It also of course altered my perception so that I truly had no preference since both knobs were now equally bare and equally impressive, but I do remember that it was easier to rub a foreskin up and down than a cock with a bare acorn.

Consequently I would say that to argue over which is preferable is a waste of time, since both have all the ingredients to keep a girl happy. In fact I finally married my intact 'cousin' and find his uncircumcised organ delightful in every way. I'm certain though if I'd married his brother, I'd feel equally enthusiastic about his circumcised penis.

However it must be said that whilst some circumcised cocks are a joy to behold, others look awful and are a living indictment of the incompetent surgeon who trimmed them. It all seems to be a bit of a lottery how it will turn out, and for that reason alone I would hesitate to have my sons done. Hence they remain intact like their father, although he quite liked the idea of having them circumcised.

Finally a word about the future. I recently spent a glorious day with my family at a popular beach resort. In line with our membership of the EC, we appear to have shed some of our inhibitions, since quite big children were allowed to run around nude. Over the day I must have seen hundreds of small boys naked, and I'm afraid I have to report that I didn't spot a single roundhead. A generation hence the pro- and anti-circumcision controversy will become purely abstract, since there will be no basis for comparison. Your membership will then be a small elite in a universally uncircumcised population. Do try to keep the argument going, though: it's much more interesting than the agony aunt columns!

Yours sincerely, C.W. – St Albans

Piercing World

I have recently seen a copy of Issue 3 of this magazine, the first time I have seen a publication on this theme produced and available in England. It runs to 20 sides (recently increased from 16) in A4 format, and includes black-and-white photographs.

Mr Sebastian's article on the Prince Albert I particularly liked. I understand that there will be further articles about male piercings in future issues. There is also an article by Eric describing piercing customs in Borneo. This was particularly valuable as, despite many years of searching, I have never found much detail on Dyak piercing customs. Hitherto I have always understood that they kept to a single transverse ampallang piercing near the glans tip, passing through the urethra and out the other side. I also understood that they generally use a barbell rod with one ball removable for insertion. Eric says that piercing is a group activity, and tells us that he had his frenulum pierced. There is also a very brief description of the items worn in piercings, including spikes and waisted spindles, and the comment that as many as ten penis piercings are sometimes made, often finger sized, with the weight of items worn in them enough to stretch the penis considerably in length. He also mentions that both men and women spend many happy and erotic hours depilating each other's bodies, which are kept hairless except on the head. An annual subscription is £10 and single quarterly issues are £2.50 each from PAUK, 153 Tomkinson Road, NUNEATON, Warks CV10 8DP.

Tony – Lancs.

ACORN

1990 Issue No 2
(Formerly Issue S)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Arctic Willie		Page 2
Age And Consent	D.S.	Page 3
Circumcised At 26	J.R.	Page 4
Two-Timer, Not Amused	Jeff	Page 6
A Great Improvement	R.N.	Page 6
Religious Circumcision, Muslim And Christian	H.F.	Page 7
Crossing Delancey		Page 8
A Holy Matter		Page 9
Circumcision And Initiation Among The Kikuyu		Page 9
Like Father, Like Son (cont.)	B.H.	Page 10
Penis Survey		Page 11
Contributions Received &amp; Invited		Page 11
What's Yours Called?		Page 12
A Trip To Ankara	J.H.	Page 12
Acorn Group Meeting	David	Page 17

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

The Editor has a new machine. Initially this has meant spending time to learn how to use it, and production of this issue has been delayed in consequence. Ultimately and hopefully it should result in an improvement in the presentation of the newsletter. Word-processed contributions will be welcome on a 3<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub>" disk (which will be returned) if the operating system is MS-DOS and the w/p is compatible with MS Works.

T.A.

Arctic Willie

Seven Royal Marine Commandos running and skiing in sub-zero temperatures while training in Norway have become the latest recorded victims of 'genital cold injury'. The hazard was previously reported as affecting drivers in unheated lorries and mountaineers in tight trousers, and appeared in Germany and Russia after the first and second world wars. Frostbite and frostnip (a less serious condition) may well have affected more soldiers, but their natural reticence may have led to under-reporting of other cases. Concern about functional impairment was expressed by all the patients, so the 'uniformly favourable outcome was reassuring'.

The two medical officers with 45 Commando Group report that frostbite usually affects fingers, toes, and exposed extremities. Other parts of the body are involved in only 2 per cent of cases. The commandos were wearing underpants, polypropylene longjohns and track-suit bottoms, with the exception of one who wore a ski suit.

Symptoms included dysuria (difficult and/or painful urination), numb prepuce, intense pain in the glans, and swelling of the foreskin and glans. Dysuria was a prominent early symptom, possibly owing to rapid re-warming of the urethra during urination. Persistent dysuria may have been caused by damage to the urethral lining from urine freezing in the distal urethra (i.e. at the glans end). The worst case was uncircumcised; after exposure to -33°C wind-chill, he suffered dysuria for 48 hours, preputial numbness, redness and superficial inflammation (erythema) and swelling (oedema) of the glans, and a 'cobble appearance' five weeks after the injury. These symptoms recurred on subsequent exposure, and balanitis (inflamed foreskin) was initially misdiagnosed. Another uncircumcised man had dysuria, erythema and oedema of the foreskin, then radial fissures and phimosis for three weeks.

The authors calculated the wind-chill factor at figures from -33°C to -54°C. Only one of the men was circumcised: he sustained frostnip (the less serious symptoms) with the worst wind-chill, at -54°C. The six uncircumcised men, including the four with the more serious frostbite, sustained their cold injuries at wind-chill temperatures in the -30s or -40s C. Thus uncircumcised men were more vulnerable. Cold injury might be expected to be more common among the circumcised men, but the foreskin proved to be more susceptible, despite offering protection to the glans.

The normal initial treatment for frostbite – rewarming the parts in water at 42°C – was clearly impractical in these cases. A shower or sauna is an alternative, but the excessive heating of a sauna is potentially detrimental. Subsequent treatment at best deals with the symptoms, so prevention by loose-fitting trousers is the key.

[Drs Simon Travis and Digby Roberts, 'Arctic Willy', British Medical Journal, 23-30 December 1989; pp 1573-4, and The Independent 22 December 1989, p 2.]

Age And Consent

Dear Tony: Following your published apology in reply to three or four complaints about letters relating experiences with youngsters in foreign countries, I would like to say that I think you were right to publish them.

I have re-read the two letters concerned, and find them (as I did previously) instructive, sympathetic and morally responsible. Surely we should all realise – whether we agree with the situations concerned or not – that this world is made up of many peoples, customs, and ideas. They should be accepted, as we would wish a visitor from those countries to accept our codes of behaviour. The man who complained using the phrase 'slipping it up little girls' turned the whole affair into something cheap and sordid, something the original letters were not. You have nothing to reproach yourself for, and as the behaviour of the penis takes many paths, it was certainly in context.

How can I justify this viewpoint whilst abhorring the kind of child sex abuse that has been much in the media recently? I simply do not classify every similar act as the same. The two girls mentioned were sex-wise and wanting to indulge. More than likely, they were enjoying it. How many of us sexually active and aware men have had eager come-and-get-it looks and invitations from kids, girls and boys, well below the age of consent? How often have we been tempted, but resisted, knowing it could lead to trouble. Yet these are kids who, for whatever reason, want sex.

I can remember all too clearly when I would have given anything for a man to pick me up, take me home, let me see him naked, and do whatever he wanted with me. I was between 10 and 14 then. I wanted sex and I was fully aware that I wanted it. It was only later that I found out the places where men would 'hang out' and, if I was lucky, take me home with them.

What is really reprehensible is a situation where children are wantonly abused by parents or parents' friends, kids who do not even know what sex is, and are far from old enough to desire anything connected with it. Child abuse, in my mind, relates to children who do not consent. When you think about it, that is just like rape. Consent is the key: sex with a consenting and willing youngster cannot be termed 'abuse' – it may well be illegal in some countries at a certain age, and acceptable at the same age in others, but that only indicates what a very complicated world we all live in!

D.S. – Merseyside

[As readers will know, the age of consent in the UK is 16 (for heterosexual intercourse), but it is evident (from the growing number of girls pregnant on their 16th birthday) that laying down the law doesn't determine behaviour. There is a view that the age should be reduced to fall more in line with reality. This would also legalise advising and supplying contraceptives to people under 16, which would be the practical approach to reducing the number of girls faced with the unwanted burdens of premature parenthood.

Boys are presumed incapable of rape below the age of 14. This again is not in line with reality, as recent incidents have shown: 12 might be more realistic these days, when puberty is attained by both sexes perhaps three years sooner than was the case a century ago. But it also recognises that boys may well be interested in and capable of sex before the age of 16. Homosexual relations are illegal, even between consenting males in private, before the age of 21. The current Church of England debate about homosexuality has brought some recognition that a homosexual orientation is probably formed at an early age, and usually notwithstanding the strongly heterosexual example given by parents. It is strongly argued by many that this age should be reduced to be in line with the age of consent to heterosexual intercourse. But the current homophobic climate does not encourage reform.

What exactly constitutes 'consent' is both fascinating and highly debatable: 'the art of seduction' has, of course, been a popular theme of literature, stage and screen for many centuries. Probably it was lawyers' inability to resolve this debate which led to the arbitrary imposition of an 'age of consent'. The courts appear to be harsher where the age difference is large than where the couple are close in age. — T.A.]

Circumcised At 26

Dear Tony: Again congratulations on the continued interesting issues of Acorn. Like other correspondents I find it satisfying to know that we are not alone in being fascinated by the topic of foreskins and circumcision. It is interesting that many people's first encounter with the other style of willy than the one they had themselves (i.e. with or without foreskin) was generally attributed to the way they were born.

My first experience was being taken to the doctor at about 3 or 4 years old and told to lie on the couch, having my pants removed and then experiencing sharp pains in the penis area! I recall the experience with great clarity. What had happened was explained at bath-time when my father pulled back my foreskin and removed some material (gauze?) from under it. This happened on several occasions, but these ministrings seemed to work as I never subsequently had any problems in retracting my foreskin, although no-one actually made a point of making sure I washed under it.

At boarding school in the 1940s it wasn't long before I noticed these different-looking willies, and initially I put it down to nature. But as we became aware of the facts of life, these differences were discussed and compared. Around 80% of my contemporaries had been circumcised and I became very envious of their neat bare knobs and smooth shafts. Mark you, several of them were equally fascinated by my foreskin and we took considerable pleasure in examining each other. The end of each term was marked on the last night by Doctor's Inspection. We all had to lie naked on our beds and wait for the elderly school doctor to come round and stare at us. Quite what he found I never really knew, but we thought that he just liked looking at naked small boys. Occasionally he would prod and poke the odd one and much amusement was caused by the occasional boy who developed a stiff vertical erection. Not once, though, did he pull anyone's foreskin back.

When I reached puberty, my foreskin developed into a very long and very loose trunk, of which I was not fond. At public school I had the opportunity to inspect many other willies and was always desperately envious of all the neatly circumcised ones and although it was obvious that numerous techniques of performing circumcisions existed, it is only now through the good offices of Acorn that I fully understand them. Still my 'trunk' amused many of my cut friends. It was so long that I recall stretching it over the end of one friend's circumcised knob, an experience which he quite liked. It also fascinated an uncircumcised friend whose foreskin had so small an opening that it was impossible to see any part of the glans, although he could get an erection and masturbate without any pain.

Eventually when I started having sex with girls the problems of a long loose foreskin became all too apparent. The story appears often in Forum of how the foreskin remains static and the glans slides inside it. I tried all methods of keeping it back: plaster, rubber bands, but nothing really worked or was comfortable. I even tried cotton stitches, but this was very uncomfortable. Left to its own devices, my foreskin would just roll forward again as soon as I let go of it.

The time came (in 1964) when my wife and I could stand it no longer and we went to see the doctor, who was not very sympathetic but suggested a dorsal slit. I know now that this would probably have aggravated the condition. He was persuaded to refer me to a surgeon at the local cottage hospital. This gentleman was absolutely charming, helpful and sympathetic, and obviously was not in agreement with the trend away from circumcision. So a few weeks later I went in to loose my trunk at the age of 26. I stayed in overnight and the operation was straightforward with very little pain. When the discolouration had subsided after a few weeks we were very pleased with the result. There was no loose skin overlapping the glans, even when flaccid. Quite which technique was used I am not sure, but some inner lining remains which varied from 1.5 to 2cm from the corona. The scar is very neat: a running suture was used and there are no stitch marks, a feature which I particularly like. About 1cm of frenulum remains and is not attached to the shaft skin, so consequently has no tendency to pull the underside of the glans when erect.

It seems to me that the trend away from circumcision is not a good one. I know of so many cases of friends and acquaintances whose children have had to be circumcised at all ages from 5 to 15 with various traumas. Keep up the good work with Acorn. What about some photographs or even videos of circumcision techniques?

Regards, J.R. – Diss

Two-Timer Not Amused

Dear Tony: My girlfriend's husband is a circumcision nut – he had his foreskin lopped off 18 months ago. I'm not particularly interested in having the chop myself but I find the whole subject fascinating, so the last time the girlfriend was on 'late duty' she took his latest copy of Acorn for me to have a butchers at, and to see if I'd like to join. Some of the letters I found very interesting, and I was pleased to see letters from ladies who had something worthwhile to say.

But really, to devote half the issue to that awful balls aching crap about circumcision masters was over the top. The poor guy needs his mind steam-cleaning. Anyway I shall continue to get the girl-friend to half-inch the odd issue on her nights off, in the hope that they are not all loaded with that sort of stuff, because I would like to join.

Jeff.

Dear Tony: The Acorn initiation story came across well.

P.D.

A Great Improvement

Dear Tony: My foreskin was the long loose hollow type. It had a good one-inch overhang and was also very thick. When I wanted to pee it was difficult to withdraw this amount of skin to allow my penis head to appear so my pee would not be obstructed. During love-making with my wife it would get hung up on the walls of her vagina, allowing no long hard strokes into the vagina and no friction for her. Oral attention was difficult with my semi-erect cock, as it needed two pulls back to fully expose the head so my wife could give the crown the attention it needed. Eight years ago, when I was 42, I was circumcised by a private doctor. Since the operation our lovemaking has been good. Although my penis looks shorter now, I still sport a thick penis, 5.5" flaccid, which looks more impressive.

R.N. – Portslade

Religious Circumcision, Muslim And Christian

The Turkish Daily News of 7-8 October 1989, p.3, carries two pictures of Prime Minister Turgut Ozal at the circumcision party for the 5-year-old son Tolga of former Health Minister Bulent Akarcali. The boy is dressed up in gaudy clothing, including a waistcoat and a hat with a plume. Ozal gave Tolga a golden watch as the traditional circumcision present. A drum and a flute-like instrument called a zurna are being played. The word for circumcision in Turkish and Arabic is sunnet.

H.F. – Cambridge.

H.F. also comments on the hymns for the 1 January Feast of the Circumcision in an Anglican hymn-book. Has anyone joined in such a service? Both items point to the general acceptance and routine character of circumcision, both in Muslim society and at other times in Christianity. The Coptic and Ethiopian Christian churches still practice circumcision. But in the bulk of Christianity, Paul (a legally-trained Jew) persuaded the early Christians (also ethnically Jewish) that it was possible to be a Christian without first becoming a Jew (via circumcision). How different things would have been otherwise, if the recruiting and persuasive skills of Christian missionaries had been harnessed to the spread of circumcision!

This theme is continued in the Wimbourne Minster parish magazine Print, sent in by a member, which includes the following article headed Roots: Circumcision. "It all started with Abraham, ancestor of Jews (and Muslims) and forerunner of all who have faith in God. God said to him: 'You must keep my covenant... You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin. Every male among you in every generation shall be circumcised on the eighth day.' This was to include not only boys born to Jews but also slaves and other members of the household. (Genesis 17:10-12).

Abraham was 99 and his son Ishmael 13 when they were circumcised. [For this reason many Muslim take 13 as a suitable age to have their own sons circumcised.] To this day Jews joyfully celebrate the circumcision of every male child on the eighth day after its birth. The mohel who is authorized to perform the operation is a trusted man of faith, sometimes a doctor, who regards it as a sacred privilege to be delegated by the father to bring the tender child into the covenant. The child is examined carefully several times in the days before the eighth, and should he be in the least unfit or underweight the ceremony is postponed.

The father blesses God 'who hast sanctified us with thy commandments and commanded us to bring our sons into the covenant of Abraham', and all present respond 'As he has entered into the Covenant, so may he enter into the Torah, the marriage bond, and good deeds'. The baby is named, [circumcised] and a joyful feast ensues.

The modern move to equality for girls has led to ceremonies at which a baby girl is blessed in the Synagogue. Every Jew knows well that the real 'circumcision' is that of the heart: 'So now you must circumcise the foreskin of your hearts' (Deuteronomy 10:16). The symbol in the flesh is the permanent reminder that physical desire is to be subordinated to God's eternal law. The Christian church has traditionally celebrated the Naming of Jesus and his Circumcision on January 1 [eight days after December 25, counting one from the 25th, as was customary]."

There are other Biblical references to circumcision: in Exodus 4:25 Moses' wife Ziporah used a flint knife to circumcise her son on their way back from Egypt [an indication of how ancient the practice was]. Before Israel entered the Promised Land Joshua was commanded: 'Make sharp knives and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time. And Joshua made sharp knives and circumcised the children at the hill of the foreskins.' The story goes on to explain that during the forty years of wandering in the wilderness they had not obeyed the Lord and had allowed circumcision to lapse. 'When they had done circumcising all the people ... they abode in their places in the camp until they were whole. And the Lord said unto Joshua, This day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you.' (Joshua 5:2-9)

Crossing Delancey

Members may like to see the recently released Warner video, Crossing Delancey. A New York Jewish girl has a romance with a famous (goy, non-Jewish) author, but her grandmother lines up a good Jewish potential husband, an East-side pickle seller. She is invited to the circumcision party for the son of one of her cousins, and viewers have a chance to join in the joyful feast. The mohel has some folksy comments, and tells the ladies to watch the men: they'll start with their hands at their sides, but when it gets to the circumcision, they'll hold them in front of them (i.e. over their own genitals). He tells us that the baby will cry, but we should not assume that it is a cry of pain, since a baby's foreskin is relatively insensitive. There is a baby of the right age on the table, clearly uncircumcised; indeed, he has a good strong pee just before he is circumcised. We see the mohel pick up the knife, then cut to the audience while there is a cry from the baby, and we next see him being wrapped in a shawl by his great-aunt and carried away.

A Holy Matter

Around 1,700 religious circumcisions were performed by the Initiation Society – which registers mohelim – in 1988, the society's annual meeting was told last week. "I am gratified that the number of cases dealt with by the society has not diminished from the previous year," said the Society's president, Mr Aaron Winegarten. "The wider community needs to be aware that brit milah is a holy matter," Mr Winegarten said. "It is insufficient for an ordinary doctor to perform this operation unless he is a man of piety, a religiously observant Jew who knows all the dinim (laws) which relate to this mitzvah." Jewish Chronicle, 29/9/89, with thanks to B.H. of Leeds who sent in the cutting.

What all these items have in common is the use of circumcision as the sign of a covenant (agreement) or sacrifice or a mark of initiation, or attainment of religious or membership status. In this context, of course, any medical or hygienic benefits are secondary, and if the process should be painful, that is simply a further indication of the significance of the sacrifice or a test of the worthiness of the candidate member. The same theme is illustrated in the following item.

Circumcision And Initiation Among The Kikuyu

Dr L.S.B. Leakey gained world renown as an archaeologist, and his son Richard (who made the television series, 'The Ascent of Man') is now Director of Conservation in Kenya. Both were brought up there, and the father's book, The Southern Kikuyu Before 1903 (Academic Press, 1977) is the definitive anthropological account of this prominent Kenyan tribe. Jomo Kenyatta's Facing Mount Kenya is romanticised and lacks detail by comparison, although written by a member of the tribe.

In the early hours of the morning the boys were taken to a nearby river. Leakey describes the traditional circumcision of Kikuyu boys as follows: "At the river each candidate had to sit in the cold running water so that his genitalia were completely numbed by the cold. [They were then taken back to the village.] As soon as the boys were all seated in the correct position, with their faces turned up to the sky, their legs apart and their bodies pressed hard against their supporters so as to be rigid, the operator advanced with his special knife in his right hand. He seized the senior boy's prepuce with his left hand and inserted his forefinger into the opening of his foreskin, after pulling it forward and stretching it to its limit. He then cut a slit across the hinder portion of the prepuce on the upper surface and at right angles to the penis. Having made this slit he brought the glans penis up through the slit so that it was exposed. The foreskin was not cut off but was left below the glans penis, where it remained for the rest of his life. [This distinctive 'button-hole' circumcision technique is also shared by the neighbouring Masai.]

Having thus circumcised the senior boy he passed to the next one and so on down the line... When the operator had been down the line once, circumcising each boy quickly, he came back to the senior boy and proceeded to go down to the end of the line a second time, examining the wounds, and if he found that there was a little bit of loose skin projecting over the upper part of the rim of the glans penis, he cut it off.

It sometimes happened that a boy playing with his genitals pulled his foreskin back and exposed the whole of the glans penis, or else during an erection in a dream the foreskin got drawn back and exposed it. In either case the boy was said to have been circumcised 'by the spirits', and on the next day an operator was sent for and the boy had the foreskin cut in the correct way and was circumcised properly. A boy so circumcised out of season and before he was old enough for initiation did not then become a warrior ... until such time as the other boys of his age were regarded as ready for initiation. Then ... he was symbolically operated on with a piece of wood, thus becoming one of the group and went through all the ceremonies with his companions.

After the coming of the white man [at the beginning of the twentieth century] it became common practice for the Kikuyu boys to go through the initiation ceremonies at about the age of 14 or 15. Every Kikuyu elder consulted was most emphatic that this was never the case before the coming of the white man, and in the normal course of events no boy was allowed to undergo initiation into warriorhood until he was at least 17 or 18, and the members of a new major age group were not initiated until they were men of about 22. (pp.587, 619, 621)

Like Father, Like Son (continued from previous issue)

My son was 6 or 7 years old when I had him circumcised. His mother was in favour of it as I had already been done and she could see no reason why not. Besides, she knew that when he had been born I had tried to get him done then, unsuccessfully. As far as his own attitude to it, he was apprehensive at the time of the circumcision, but the surgeon did explain what was to be done and why. Since then, when we have discussed sexual matters he has been quite happy with his circumcision, which is quite radical for a Plastibell one. At school he had no ragging or anti-ness; in fact, quite the contrary, an enthusiastic interest. In his class at secondary school there was a real mixture of races, Muslims, Jews, West Indians and Sikhs, as well as a minority of English. A West Indian parent, whom I know well, asked me where I got him circumcised as he wanted his two boys done because they had very long tight foreskins. That particular surgeon had died, but I put him in contact with the mohel who did the Reform Synagogue circumcisions, and he got them done. That mohel has since emigrated to Australia. One of the Moslem boys who had not been circumcised at that time was asking my son a lot of questions about it as he was soon to be done when he was 12 years old. My son now lives with his girlfriend. We have mentioned circumcision in passing and she has never commented unfavourably.

B.H. – Leeds

[B.H. of Leeds also sent in a copy of the instruction leaflet for Mates condoms, with the comment that they clearly expect everyone to be circumcised: the illustration is of a circumcised cock, and there is no mention of a foreskin or need to retract it before putting on the condom.]

Penis Survey

Dimensions in inches

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scar-line from glans rim.
If uncircumcised: U
6. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, flaccid?
7. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, erect?
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight (T) or loose (L)?
9. When standing against the wall with erect penis, how far from glans tip to nearest part of stomach?
10. Height
11. Age
12. Identification (initials and place).

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12
---	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	---	----	----	----

5.0	7.0	4.7	6.0	U	6	0	L	7	5'9"	62	D.H. – Weston
-----	-----	-----	-----	---	---	---	---	---	------	----	---------------

3	5.8	4.2	6	1	-	-	-	5	5'10"	47	A.B. – Suffolk
---	-----	-----	---	---	---	---	---	---	-------	----	----------------

Comment: My foreskin shrank over the years to about 0.2 flaccid, but by use of a bulldog clip I managed to get it back to 0.6. – D.H.

Contributions Received And Invited

The Editor gratefully acknowledges contributions from:- Ms G.S. – London E14; H.C. – London SW6; SHE magazine article; K.E. – Nottingham (2); E.C. – Herts; J.H. – Finland; A.F. – Devon; D.S. – Merseyside; Samantha D. – London; S.S. – Harrow; A.F. – Henley; R.W. – Sussex. Many thanks – it's your contributions that make the Newsletter interesting and well worth looking forward to. It is intended to include these in future issues, and to reply to correspondence as soon as time allows.

We are always glad to have contributions to the penis survey, and to What's yours called?

What's Yours Called?

In continuation of this regular feature (more contributions always welcome!) our Finnish correspondent supplies the following vocabulary:

English	Finnish	Swedish	German penis is used universally, plus the following words:
penis	siitin	manslem	Geschechtsglied
cock	kyrpä	kuk	der Schwanz
prick	kikkeli	snopp	Pfiffli
willy	pippeli		Dingsda (= that thing there)
glans	terska	ollon (= acorn)	die Eichel (= acorn)
foreskin	esinihka	förhud	die Vorhaut
circumcision	ympärileikkaus	omskärelse	Beschneidung Zirkumzision
circumcise	ympärileikata	omskära	beschneiden zirkumzidieren
circumcised			beschnitten
testicle	kives	testikel	der Hode
scrotum	kivespussi	pung	Hodensack
balls	munat (= eggs)		Eier (= eggs)

A Trip To Ankara

I once had a holiday in Ankara, and came back a different man! My adventure began when, shortly after my arrival, the batteries in my electric shaver suddenly ran down. I cursed myself for forgetting to bring spares, especially after I had tried to buy some without success in about a dozen shops. I didn't want a new shaver, so after a couple of days, when the stubble was annoying, I decided to visit a barber.

I soon found a barber's shop and went in. He was shaving a man, so I sat on a bench to wait my turn and watched him at work. He was very quick, and I noticed how effectively and skilfully he smoothed the wrinkles on the man's face. Then he said something and his client nodded. I was astonished to see the barber put the tip of his razor right into the man's nostril – a quick stroke and the hairs in the nostril were cut away. I was alarmed to watch him – what a nasty wound if he had slipped! but I had no reason to worry. Obviously he had done this thousands of times, and his client just sneezed lightly. Then the barber again said something: again his client nodded, and took off his shirt. He lifted up his left arm and the barber shaved his armpit, and similarly his right. I was a bit surprised to see this, although I knew that in some parts of the Muslim world people are depilated. Perhaps it helps in the hot climate.

Then it was my turn. "Shave, sir?" "Yes, please." I sat in the chair and he put some shaving cream on my face and began his work. He was very quick, and after a couple of minutes he had finished.

"Will that be all, Sir?" The weather was extremely hot, so I asked him to shave my armpits as well, as I thought I might be more comfortable. I took my shirt off and soon I was smooth there too.

"Something else, Sir?" I wondered what he meant. My hair was short already, so I looked at him enquiringly. He bent towards me, with a glint in his eye, and whispered, "I could shave you down there too, Sir." At first I didn't understand him, but a second later I remembered having read that some Moslems remove their pubic hair, as they consider it unclean. So that was what he was offering! I was a bit shocked by the suggestion at first, but then I felt curious and slightly excited.

"Right here?" "No, Sir. The private shaving is done in the back room." "Alright." "This way, Sir."

We went into the back room. In the middle there was a couch with a big thick pillow under a bright light. I dropped my trousers and underpants. "Please lie yourself down on the couch. The pillow must be under your back, Sir."

I did as he said. The pillow under my buttocks meant that my private parts were up high, where he could easily reach to work on them. The barber took a long look, then rubbed shaving cream on my crotch. Again he was very quick and skilful in his work, but, needless to say, I erected.

"Excuse me, Sir, but a Sünnet would be good for you, and I could do it cheaply." "A Sünnet? What is that?" "I don't know in English, Sir, but in Sünnet this" – and he touched my long foreskin – "is taken away. As well as a barber, Sir, I am sünnetci also."

I thought a minute. Of course he meant circumcision. I was in a Moslem country, after all. "No!" "As you wish, Sir."

My heart was beating rapidly. I could have myself circumcised right now, on this couch. If only I had the courage! My erection was now even more pulsating and his hands felt gentler and more fondling. Obviously he would be skilful in that too. But I didn't even dare to think of him at work on me. Soon I was as smooth as a seven-year-old little boy. He wiped off the spare shaving soap. I got dressed and paid his fee, which was much smaller than I had expected. Then I returned to my hotel. It was now too hot to walk on the streets, so I lay on my bed and began to think.

Ever since I had seen a circumcised penis for the first time I had admired it. In the showers at school I had always envied the boys who had their penis heads nicely exposed. To me the most beautiful sight had always been a prick which had been fully circumcised, rare though they were. I did not much fancy the ones where there was still some loose skin, or where the scar-line was uneven. But I really admired a boy whose coral-pink, fleshy glans was always denuded and in view, with a smooth, even scar-ring behind the glans rim. I had thought many times of having myself circumcised, but at home it would have been quite expensive to have it done privately. Worse still, I was afraid that I would be ridiculed at the hospital. So I still had my foreskin. But now there was the opportunity. The barber was certainly a craftsman. Would I have the courage to withstand the pain? I decided to visit him again – not to have him circumcise me, but at least to ask about the cost, and some other details. Perhaps another time ...

The following morning I went to see him again. I told him that I was interested in 'Sünnet', but I wanted to know more about it, and how he actually did it. "How long will Sünnet take? What will it look like afterwards? How long will it take to heal?"

"The cutting itself, a split second only, Sir. You would hardly feel a thing, Sir, and it heals very quickly."

"But what will it look like, afterwards I mean?"

"Omar!" A young boy, about ten, came to us. He had been sweeping the floor. "This is Omar. He works for me. I gave him his Sünnet a few months ago." Then he said something to Omar, and without any hesitation he stood in front of me and dropped his pants. "Look, Sir, that's what it looks like after Sünnet! Go ahead, Sir, look, please."

I bent down and looked closely. His penis had indeed been very radically circumcised. His bright red glans was totally bare. The circumcision ring was very smooth and even, and well beyond the glans rim on the shaft. I fingered his penis lightly. The skin was well cut away, and I could not move any of it forwards. The scar was also smooth. While I was examining him, he erected, of course. Now I could see and feel how tight the skin was on the shaft: as tight as a drum skin. What a smashing job! Could mine be like it? I asked how much he charged for a Sünnet. Almost nothing! "Would it be possible for me to see you doing a Sünnet? Then I could decide whether I would have it."

"Certainly, Sir. I shall give Sünnet to two twin brothers this afternoon. They are celebrating their 12th birthday, and I give them Sünnet as my present. I am expecting them to come here between 4 and 5 o'clock. If you have the time, you are welcome to watch."

Soon it was afternoon, and the boys arrived with their father. The barber said something to him and pointed to me. He looked at me, then came smiling to me and shook my hand, saying something which I could not understand. "He is very happy to have you as a witness when his sons are receiving their Sünnet. He also said that you, too, will have one soon!"

I looked at the boys. They were decoratively dressed and looked anxious and happy at the same time. Obviously this would be the most important day in each of their lives so far. It might hurt, perhaps; but there had been celebrations, and after all, they would enjoy their Sünnet for the rest of their lives. The barber said something to them, and they began to get undressed. When both were stark naked, one quite happily lay down on the couch. The pillow was placed under his buttocks, lifting his hips and his private parts.

The barber sat on a chair and I stood next to him. "Omar, Abdel, Ibrahim!" Omar and the two men entered the room. One held the boy by his wrists and the other by his ankles, so that he could not move: he began to breathe heavily, but was obviously determined not to cry out. Omar gave the barber his instruments – a razor, some pins, some lengths of string, and some gauze.

The barber got to work. Except for the sound of the boy panting on the couch, we were all silent. The boy had not reached puberty yet, but his testicles had already started to grow. The barber fondled his small, hairless penis, which was soon erect. The foreskin was long and thin, and it covered the glans completely, extending well beyond the tip. The barber continued to massage it until his erection was firm and total. Then he pushed the foreskin right back, exposing a bright red glans. He took a piece of gauze, moistened it in a bowl of disinfectant solution held by Omar, and swabbed the glans, foreskin, penis shaft and scrotum. The boy gasped.

Then the barber took a thin, round probe made of some kind of flexible plastic. He carefully placed the end of the probe at the rim of the boy's glans, then pulled the foreskin forward again to cover probe and glans. The tip of the probe could be seen raising the thin foreskin on the upper side of the penis. Then he pulled the foreskin and the probe further so that the tip of the probe was now at the tip of the glans. He checked this carefully by feeling with the fingers of his other hand, then marked the level with a felt-tipped pen. Now he took one of the lengths of thin cord. This time it was Omar's duty to pull the foreskin until the mark on the skin was beyond the tip of the glans, while the barber knotted the cord tightly at the mark. He again felt carefully to ensure that the glans tip was behind the knot. While Omar still gripped the tip of the foreskin, the barber took a second cord and knotted it just beyond the first. Omar was told to hold the ends of the cord and pull firmly.

The barber took his razor and placed the blade precisely on the skin between the two knots, then spoke a religious formula which began, "Bismillah ...", and made a quick stroke of the blade through the skin. The boy let out a muffled sigh, not even a cry: it was all done so quickly that he hardly had the time to feel a thing. Omar dropped the cord he had been holding, while the barber pulled away the first cord. The skin flicked back so that its cut edge now lay midway along the penis shaft. There was a kind of collar of raw flesh between it and the glans rim. The glans was still hidden under its covering of whitish inner foreskin. The barber pushed this delicate skin tenderly back, exposing the glans, so that it covered the collar and its edge met the cut edge of outer skin. He next sprinkled some whitish powder on the cut edges of skin. Then, while Omar held the glans between his finger and thumb, the barber bandaged the wound with gauze. His father helped the boy off the couch, where, without a word, his place was taken by his brother. Equally bravely he lay still while the barber deftly did his work in just the same way – a very quick and neat job indeed.

“Well, Sir?” I was confused. The boys were only twelve years old, and yet they had shown such courage. The incision had been so quick that obviously they had felt very little. I was in my 20s, a fully grown adult: as brave, perhaps, but with a well-developed penis whose sensitivity I knew well how to enjoy. Even if I was afraid, I could not allow myself to show it without losing face. I gulped, then nodded to the barber.

“Excellent, Sir,” and he smiled. I stripped naked and lay on the couch. The two assistants held my hands and feet. They were both strong: I was held so firmly that I had no chance of escape. The barber began work on his third Sünnet that day. Already my penis was wooden hard. He had no difficulty sliding my foreskin back to uncover my glans. It smarted somewhat as he applied the disinfectant, but I managed to remain impassive. When he tightly tied the two knots it hurt quite a lot, and even more when Omar pulled hard on the cord. Then the barber took his razor, and again I heard the formula, “Bismillah ...” There was a quick movement and I felt a sharp pain as the knife went through my foreskin, and a smarting as the air reached the wound. When he pushed the inner skin back and bared my glans I felt almost nothing, and soon I was bandaged too. As I looked round I can still remember vividly how the boys’ eyes twinkled: they had watched my circumcision as eagerly as I had watched theirs.

I climbed carefully off the couch, dressed, paid the barber his small fee, and carefully walked back to my hotel, buying some antiseptic, bandages and dressings on the way. Next morning my penis was quite sore and swollen, and bruised black and blue. I washed it and bandaged it again.

The next stage of my holiday was a long circular tour, and for much of each day I sat in the bus. Every evening I changed the bandages, and my penis improved daily. When we returned to Ankara after ten days, it was healed and dry. I was very pleased with the result: a totally bare glans, a smooth even scar ring located along the shaft quite a bit behind the corona, and absolutely no foreskin left. Clearly it was the work of a master craftsman.

Just one thing annoyed me. The barber had shaved my pubic hair, and now I had an itchy and unpleasant stubble there. I decided to return and ask him to shave it again. He would also see the excellent result of my Sünnet. He was glad to see me again, and smiled even more broadly when I asked him to shave me, then my armpits, and then “down there”. While he was shaving my pubic area, he could not help touching my denuded glans, and some of the shaving soap got onto it. Of course, that had also happened when he shaved me there the first time, but then my foreskin had prevented such direct stimulation. He noticed my erection becoming firmer and firmer, and when he finished shaving there was a question in his eyes. I nodded. He put plenty of shaving cream on my glans and began to massage it. I closed my eyes, and the memory of the last time I lay on his couch came back to me vividly. In a moment I exploded like a volcano in his skilful hands. I suppose that his other clients may also have received this extra service, following a shave down there – or at least the circumcised ones!

J.H. – Finland

Acorn Group Meeting

Dear Tony: Sorry I haven't written to you before about the June meeting I organised in Weston-super-Mare but it was such a great disappointment to me personally.

There were 11 booked to come, so I organised a guest house for those I couldn't accommodate myself. Two days before, one phoned to say his wife had a stroke and couldn't make it. Then another phoned to say he had sprained his ankle. Three came down on the Friday, one of whom disappeared to visit friends and was not seen again – he rang up later in the week to say he'd had a stomach bug. Two didn't turn up at all, one writing later to say he'd been ill. I'd asked everyone to be here by 3pm, at which time there were just four of us, one an invalid. We waited until around 5pm, when the last three turned up – one of them had a migraine and went to lie on the floor in a darkened room. Two who turned up later went at 7pm, just as we were getting started. That left the original four, who had been waiting all that time, plus food and drink for 11, a guest house that wanted paying, and no depth of a meeting to show at all.

On the bright side: J.W. and H.M. were a great pair. On the Sunday we had some long talks and afterwards both said that for the first time in their lives they had been able to be completely natural and speak about their hidden feelings and actions, which had given them a sort of emotional uplift. From a man of 74, this was really something.

As well as those members who came to the meeting, I had correspondence and completed questionnaires from some members who couldn't come. Thinking about it afterwards I concluded that, at the moment, large meetings are probably not the right thing. More could probably be achieved for members by meeting in twos or threes. This would be far easier to organise, and possibly less embarrassing to some. If the penis survey could be completed by everyone, they would know where their nearest neighbours lived. Contact could then be arranged via Acorn. To this end I am asking Tony to forward my phone number to my nearest three neighbours in Bath, Salisbury and Gwent: they are welcome to contact me.

There was one bone of contention at the meeting. An adult circumcised member loudly and vehemently argued that everyone should be circumcised at birth, giving the cancer and dirtiness reasons. He'd had two revisions, with the shaft skin now stitched to the body of the glans at about 5mm intervals, leaving no glans rim – a purely personal preference, going beyond what was necessary for the reasons he'd stated. This upset two others who, having been circumcised at birth, felt cheated out of a choice. I think it could be a bit dangerous for a group like ours, representing a variety of different views, to have too hard opinions being expressed.

Finally may I say Hello and good luck to all the friends I've already made in the group.

David – Weston

ACORN

1990 Issue No 3
(Formerly Issue T)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Natural Lubrication	R.W.	Page 2
Circumcision: Ambition Fulfilled	K.E.	Page 4
Tightening Up	T.J.	Page 7
Family Likenesses	H.C.	Page 9
'Fucking Wankers'	A.F.	Page 11
Unkind Cut		Page 13
Impotence: It Is Not
All In The Mind		Centre

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Natural Lubrication

Dear Tony: I have read with great interest all the copies of Acorn to date. I admire the hard work you have put in to keep the issues coming out frequently and with interesting content. I have learnt much about the pros and cons of circumcision, the techniques used to achieve it, and in particular about the variety of men's attitudes to their penis.

I would like to raise a topic which is of great interest to me and which has not yet been touched on. It may stimulate some correspondence of interest to others.

I was circumcised at birth and am now 57. Throughout those years I have never ever produced any natural lubrication from my penis. I have had physical contact with a number of men during a period in the past when my dormant bisexuality emerged for a time. I cannot recall any one man whose penis was other than dry when erect. Equally, in viewing many hard core pornographic films (in the days when they were more readily available than they are now!) I cannot remember seeing a penis wet other than following penetration of any one of the three usual orifices.

As the years pass I become more surprised at this, because I read in Forum and other journals descriptions of men producing lubrication when sexually stimulated or aroused and I know this certainly happens to some men. For example many years ago I enjoyed a brief dalliance with my secretary and she was willing to suck my penis with pleasure, yet she told me she could never do this to her husband as he was uncircumcised and always too wet and slippery, which put her off.

Acorn seems to be the ideal medium for finding out the reality of the situation and it prompts the question whether self-lubrication is less prevalent among those who are circumcised than amongst those who still have their foreskins intact? There is also the question whether such lubrication is a contributory cause of smegma in the uncircumcised, which would seem probable to me though I am hardly qualified to know.

Textbooks have little to say on the subject beyond commenting that Cowper's glands produce a clear lubricating fluid under sexual arousal. Possibly the best description is by Van de Velde, Ideal Marriage, but he hardly assesses the incidence of lubrication. In his chapter 'Anatomy of the male sexual organs' he writes as follows:

"In the anterior urethra there are a good many very small glands which together with Cowper's glands (Bilateral structures as large as small peas) secrete a small amount of transparent, thin, alkaline, and very slippery fluid. This substance has the same significance as the glands of Skene and Bartholin in the woman. They too function under influence of sexual excitement, and are instrumental in making the glans slippery and facilitating its insertion into the vagina. The secretions of Cowper's glands help to make the urethra more suited to receive and transmit the semen, for they counteract the effects of the distinctly acid urine, by their own alkalinity. I consider this latter function less important than lubrication, however, for there can only be very slight traces of urine in the urethra during the passage of a much greater amount of semen, and this passage is extraordinarily rapid. The mucus secretion of Cowper's and the urethral accessory glands, may appear after the local excitation and erection of the male organ, and thus form, as it were, a second stage in the process of preparation for union. Or it may appear while the member is still slack, or at least not in full tension. The latter is especially the case if sexual excitement is produced through solely psychic impressions such as thoughts, books, pictures, without direct female agency, or if the psychic influence and contact with a woman who is desired, much precede physical contact: as they should do in what we have termed the prelude to sexual communion. (See Chapter VIII.)

"Inexperienced youths, who are anxious about their mental and physical health and their virile potency, still often mistake this normal lubrication for loss of semen. It is nothing of the kind. It is a distinct process, which prepares the bodily organs for coitus and at the same time expresses the soul's desires.

"The old Catholic moral theologians (e.g. Sanchez and St Alphonso de Ligorio) knew it well, correctly appreciating its mental reactions and importance, and gave it the term 'distillation' (or destillatio) as distinct from pollutions or loss of semen, apart from coitus.

"We may finally note that this distillation sometimes does not occur at all; more especially, when the erection is due to external (mechanical) stimuli, and the psychic emotions are only slight or even reluctant. If, in such situations, the woman has been inadequately prepared on the psychic side, and her vestibular glands have not functioned, the sexual act may be very difficult and painful, for both partners." (Emphasis in original.)

I very much regret, on a personal level, my lack of natural lubrication, as masturbation from the age of 14 was always rather a dry affair and without any doubt blunted my penile sensitivity to the point when for many years I have suffered from retarded ejaculation and sexual intercourse with my present wife is difficult. Masturbation requires a good lubricant to be successful.

Incidentally, as the subject has been raised before, I have explored the range of lubricants generally available, and I find the most satisfactory, economical, and readily available one is the 'unperfumed' moisturising lotion available from Boots the Chemist at 85p. It lasts longer than KY jelly before drying out and does not have the disadvantage of being petroleum-based, which can – if used too often – cause soreness and sometimes unwelcome pigmentation. Some of the mail-order firms selling sexual devices, and the sex-shops, sell lubricants which can be very good, but they are fearfully expensive and not entirely without problems, such as the need to add water to maintain slipperiness.

Perhaps readers could write and say whether they do or do not lubricate naturally. If they do, are they circumcised or not, and what sort of stimulus triggers it off: purely mental ('psychic') excitement, or does there have to be manual or other physical stimulation? How copious is this lubrication? I read recently in Forum of a young man literally dripping with it. Does it occur only when the penis is fully erect, or can it occur before erection happens? Any observations on this topic would be interesting, to me and I feel sure to other readers also.

Yours sincerely, R.W. – Sussex

[The secretion which keeps the area under the foreskin, including the glans, damp and shiny appears to be exuded from the mucous membrane of the inner skin. When mixed with an accretion of dead skin flakes this forms smegma. Has anyone checked whether men who are prone to dandruff are more productive of smegma than men who are not, I wonder? While very off-putting to a partner considering offering oral sex, this is quite different from the natural lubrication which R.W. is enquiring about.

Van de Velde's observations are largely consistent with my own. I produce the clear fluid quite copiously, but rarely in response to physical stimulation, and rarely 'to order' (convenient though that might be). But quite long periods (perhaps 20 minutes) of foreplay or mental sexual stimulation (from a good Acorn-type story, for example) will result in an oozing of the clear fluid from the meatus, usually in sufficient quantity to wet the whole of the glans, and it remains very slippery for perhaps ten minutes. The changes resulting from circumcision at 20 made no difference (so far as I recall) in the pattern of production of lubricant fluid.

I had always assumed that this pattern was 'normal', but can now appreciate the possible problems faced by someone such as R.W. who doesn't self-lubricate. It is commonly said to be one of the symptoms of the female menopause ('change of life') that the female lubricant secretions are produced much less or not at all: obviously if both partners are dry, even after considerable foreplay, they have a problem, to which artificial lubrication may be the solution. Has anyone noticed whether the production of natural lubricant by men changes with age? More evidence welcome, please. – T.A.]

Circumcision: Ambition Fulfilled

Dear Tony: Until I started school I had never seen another penis than my own. Then it soon became obvious that I was different to most of my little pals. They all seemed to have a pink knob at the end of their penises and were able to pee accurately with a firm jet. In my case I didn't seem to have a firm end and my pee went in all directions, usually all over the floor! At that early age I knew nothing of circumcision and just assumed that the difference was natural, like brown or blue eyes, dark or fair hair, etc. My interest in penises grew and more opportunities occurred for observation at a later school where showering after games was the rule.

Most of the other boys had been circumcised and by then I knew that they had an operation to remove the loose skin and expose the knob. I still did not know that I should have been able to pull back the loose skin to expose the knob as no one had ever told me that this was possible. Some time later a rumour went around that we were to have a medical inspection by the school doctor. Those with foreskins were taunted by the other boys saying: "You'll have to have that loose skin cut off when he sees you." When my inspection came the doctor forced my foreskin back with difficulty and said it was very tight, but I should keep pulling it back in the bath and it would free off. Some of the other uncircumcised boys were sent to the children's hospital for circumcision shortly afterwards. I had mixed feelings about having missed the opportunity to be rid of my hated foreskin, but later when I was invited to inspect the penis of one of the recently circumcised boys I was not so sure. What a mess! It looked horrible compared with those boys done at birth.

I did as the doctor told me and gradually was able to pull my foreskin right back behind the glans. I eventually decided to try and keep it back and eventually after much soreness and will power managed to train it to stay back at all times. My knob increased in size because of being uncovered, and this helped keep the skin behind the rim. I always pulled it forwards for medicals, such as when joining the forces, so as not to attract attention. I assumed I was the only idiot in the world who kept his foreskin pulled back all the time.

The desire for circumcision remained, as I felt that I was cheating by appearing to be circumcised when I was not. But how to attain the ideal seemed impossible, as I felt that any approach to a doctor would result in me being 'certified' uncircumcised. Some years later I joined a firm and had to be seen by a doctor before joining their superannuation scheme. I thought it would just be a simple affair, chest, eyes, blood pressure etc, and had gone with my foreskin retracted as I had not expected a below-the-waist inspection. As I stood before the doctor, stripped to the waist, to my horror he told me to drop my trousers and underpants.

He looked at me, felt my balls, then pushed the skin right back along the shaft of my penis, noting, I imagine, that there was no circumcision scar. He asked me why I kept my foreskin pulled back, and I said I found it more comfortable like that. Then he said, had I ever thought about having a circumcision? (Every minute of every day for the last 25 years I had thought about it!) I said, as casually as I could, that I would like to be circumcised. He then said "I could put you in touch with a surgeon friend of mine in London who would do a nice neat job. When healed it would be as neat as one done at birth."

I could hardly contain my excitement as he gave me a slip of paper with an address and phone number on it. I rushed home and rang the number, and to my surprise it was answered by the surgeon, Dr Newill, himself. I explained how I had got his number and said I would like to have myself circumcised. He said he would do it and a date was arranged.

The interval was the longest ten days of my life. I went up to London on the day in question, to the Harley Street address. After a few preliminary questions he told me to remove trousers and underpants and get onto the operating table. I watched him inject me several times around the base of my penis, but I had decided beforehand that I did not wish to see him perform the operation, so I fixed my gaze on the ceiling. About half an hour later he told me to get up, and with his help we put my bandaged penis into the 'jock strap' and tight underpants he had told me to bring. I was sore for about ten days, but it was no worse than having a tooth out.

I took the stitches out myself, as he had instructed me. It looked a bit of a mess, but after about three months all I was left with was a perfect scar about  $\frac{1}{2}$  inch behind the glans when erect. Now, many years later, the scar has blended in to the extent that a small amount of remaining 'underskin' blends with the skin of the shaft almost as though no surgery had ever taken place. It is indistinguishable from a circumcision performed at birth: just what I always wanted.

All this took place long before the days of Forum and Acorn. Had I known then what I know now I would have asked him to remove all the underskin and make the scar right close up behind the knob in the Jewish fashion. This would I think prevent the slight 'bunched up' effect of the remaining underskin when flaccid, which gives the appearance at times of a retracted foreskin.

However there is no doubt that I have been fairly radically circumcised, and I have such a perfect scar that I would not risk any further surgery. My story, I now realise, is very similar to others you have published, but I hope you find it interesting. I would be prepared to be put in touch with other Acorn members, anonymously at first, if further details of my experience would help them. I would be willing to allow myself to be inspected and would be interested to inspect others (in a non-sexual context). I would be interested in seeing (or buying) any videos available showing circumcision being performed, or any clear colour photos of circumcised penises which showed different results.

K.E. – Nottingham

Tightening Up

Dear Tony: I have always been fascinated by the subject of circumcision, ever since about the age of 10 when I discovered that not all penises are the same. As I became older the desire to be circumcised grew, but because there were no medical grounds for my having the operation, I didn't think I'd ever achieve this desire.

Fortunately I heard about the Surgical Advisory Service. Eventually, 3<sup>1</sup>/<sub>2</sub> years ago in my early thirties, I had the operation I had longed for. Shortly afterwards I obtained a copy of the book, Circumcision: an ethnomedical study, and was pleasantly surprised to read how much medical support there is for circumcision. I was also intrigued by the many different techniques used and the different results they produce. The surgeon who circumcised me, Mr Hasan, didn't ask me what sort of result I wanted. Although he did a very neat job, I soon regretted not having asked him to remove more foreskin.

Eventually I approached another doctor who was willing to try to achieve the result I wanted. Unfortunately there did not appear to be much difference, except that the raphé hadn't been lined up properly with the frenulum. I went back to Mr Hasan a second time and he managed to remove a little more skin for me and realign the raphé.

The result I long for is to have as much skin removed as possible, with the scar-line well down the shaft. I'm not gay, but I'd like to have the sort of circumcision that other men would admire, or at least take notice of in the changing room of my sports club (i.e. a cut above the rest!)

I discussed the result I wanted with somebody knowledgeable, who pointed out that the amount of skin that can be removed is determined by the difference in size of the penis when flaccid and erect. For example, if the penis is small when flaccid and much larger when erect, a lot of skin removed when flaccid might result in an over-stretched and painful penis when erect. My own penis varies quite considerably in size, comparing its flaccid and erect states. When completely flaccid, and I am sitting upright, the remains of my foreskin come well over the corona. When erect, the skin is quite tight but can still be stretched above the corona, which means I could lose another 1/<sub>2</sub>" of foreskin. But I was also told that, having been circumcised already, it would be difficult to create the desired result because of suturing difficulties. What I'm wondering is, is it possible to have more skin cut away and then firmly bandage the wound rather than using sutures to help the healing process

It would be both helpful and interesting to hear from other members who have achieved the sort of result that I'd like, particularly after more than one operation. In one of last year's editions of Acorn a member wrote about how, as a boy in Egypt, he'd noticed how far down the shaft his father's and brother's circumcision scars had been, and that he intended soon to achieve the same result. It would be interesting to know whether he's had this operation, and if so, what the outcome is like.

My personal fantasy is to be circumcised at a special tribal ceremony, in a primitive method of circumcision. The entire assembly is naked and those presiding over the solemn proceedings or performing the operation have been cut well down their shafts. It is my turn. My foreskin is pulled tightly through the centre hole of a protective disc. It is about to be cut off when I cry: "Tighter!" The elders respectfully nod their approval, since the more skin is removed, the greater the esteem given to that member of the tribe. Eventually it is stretched as tightly as possible, and then cut off as close to the disc as possible with a jewelled dagger. The result is an incision line barely clear of the base of the penis, leaving a smooth, skinless, sensitive shaft. The elders and circumcisers congratulate all the initiates, welcoming us into full membership of the tribe and inviting us to choose our wishes from among the women who have been patiently waiting outside the ceremonial hall.

T.J. – Norfolk

[Good to hear from you, T.J. Your fantasy is an excellent example of an initiation ritual: the candidate is separated from 'normal' society into the initiatory assembly (of naked men); there is a test to be passed (in this case, the onerous one of circumcision, which also leaves its distinguishing mark); the successful candidate is reintegrated into society, this time in his new role (full tribal membership). You have added additional rewards: especial congratulations from the elders for the especially brave, and the choice of a wife – presumably she will also assist in the convalescence of the candidate!

As to the result you want to achieve, you seem confident that removal of another  $\frac{1}{2}$ " band of skin would be possible to achieve the radically tight result that you want, without becoming over-tight when erect. Normally a revision operation would involve removing the strip of skin which included the scar line of the previous circumcision – otherwise the patient would end up with two scar lines, which would be an obvious indication of having had a second operation. This would imply that the new scar line could be no further from the glans rim than the old one – and most of the skin removed would come from the most elastic shaft skin. But if you didn't mind the double scar line, the new line could be anywhere on the shaft, including a line 'barely clear of the base of the penis', such as you describe in your fantasy.

I do not imagine that there would be any particular problem with suturing a revision incision. The neatest results generally follow from careful alignment of the two cut edges, paying particular attention to alignment of raphé with frenulum (your second operation seems to have been unfortunate in this respect). Use of many stitches helps to achieve a fine, neat line. Someone who wanted a prominently visible scar line might have just a few stitches, remove them after 3-4 days, and keep separating the cut edges to encourage the formation of a wider scar. The bandaging you suggest is standard practice in after-treatment of Jewish infant circumcisions (when healing is likely to be rapid) but in an adult is likely to be uncomfortably tight in the event of an erection. – T.A.]

Family Likenesses

In Acorn 8/89 there was a letter about family penis resemblances which prompts the following comments. I discovered masturbation in the bath at 13 or 14, by holding my erect foreskinned penis upright under the running tap to let the strong jet of water shoot into the opening of my foreskin. (I did not yet know about foreskin retraction.) But my creamy white ejaculate worried me deeply, not knowing what it was, so I just had to consult another male about it, and my father was the only man around at the time.

Our family is ethnically Chinese, and we were living in SE Asia. My father was a rather reserved and stern individual in relation to sexual matters. Sex was never mentioned to me in my puberty, and yet it was he who eventually taught me the facts of life, and in the most direct manner possible.

One evening, as he was preparing his bath, I asked him. With shaking voice, and my heart thumping in trepidation, I blurted out that I had a problem with my cock. I expected a rebuff, but to my surprise father was gentle with me. He invited me into his bathroom, locking the door so that we should not be disturbed. Then he smiled, and in a whisper asked me the problem.

In my excitement and relief at not being scolded or rebuffed, words failed me. Feeling that I was confessing the greatest crime, I dropped my trousers and let father see my erect cock. I admitted that I often played with it, after which a white creamy liquid shot out. What was the matter? Was I sick, or had I some disease?

My father listened, and then gently explained to me the facts of life, especially the functions of my male genitalia. I was shocked that men and women actually played with each others genitals to produce a baby, but relieved that my cream was a natural phenomenon. Father then gently took my erect penis in his hand and slowly, with some difficulty, coaxing back my foreskin for the first time ever. Emboldened by this new sexual knowledge and father's mood of intimacy, I asked him if I could see his cock too, not knowing how he would take this request. He hesitated, looked embarrassed, then smiled: this was the father I had never known before. Already shirtless, he looked down to unbutton his trousers. He never wore underpants. Occasionally, if he forgot to button his fly, a maid or servant might catch a glimpse of his cock. I overheard them mentioning its size once, in their lewd gossip. In a moment his trousers dropped and he was naked before me.

Even in my inexperience, not having seen an adult cock before, I was surprised at the smallness of his cock. It was flaccid, perhaps a bit over 2" long and of average girth. Instead of the foreskinned sausage I had expected all penises to be, father's foreskin covered just a bit of the glans rim (corona), leaving  $\frac{8}{10}$ ths of his glans exposed: a short foreskin indeed. Moreover, his dry glans was a deep dark blackcurrant colour, in fact, black with a purple tinge. This is unusual, as he is Chinese, not black, and his is very much darker than mine, and a little smaller. Otherwise the skin in his genital area was a light brown, as is mine. His balls were fairly big and hung much lower than his penis. His scrotum, bulging and prominent, was dotted with hairs, some as much as 3" long. His pubic hair was profuse, long and slightly curled. His penis was nicely bullet-shaped (like mine); in fact it looked like a threatening black bullet, bobbing a bit between his legs. I had just learnt that my very life came from this small blackcurrant bullet. How potent it must be!

So father stood, naked and vulnerable, gazing over my head in his mild embarrassment. Perhaps in his naked display he was expiating his own guilt at having neglected my puberty and sex education. Fascinated, I knelt down, my eyes level with his cock for a detailed scrutiny, and took father's penis in my hands. He did not object. His penis did not erect as he let me push his short foreskin back and forth. I touched him all over and parted the opening of his pee-hole with my fingers. When I gently squeezed his balls, he joked that not so long ago his scrotum was my former home, and I had lived as his sperm in his creamy white liquid.

To my query about his almost black glans and his short foreskin he could find no adequate answer except to say that in adulthood and maturity foreskins tend to shorten by themselves, and cock-heads tend to darken through exposure (though I since know this to be untrue). It remains an enigma to me why his was so black.

He confided that (then in his fifties) he did not erect frequently, and he had sexual intercourse about once a month. To my tactless remark about the small size of his penis, he said good-humouredly that he had never had my problem with it, as some women prefer a small one. I have seven brothers and sisters, so father's 2" penis with its black bullet glans did not lack potency! My own penis is similar in size now (25 years later) and erects to about  $4\frac{1}{2}$ ". I assume that father's in erection would probably have been similar. In retrospect, having since seen hundreds of cocks, father's remains one of the sexiest cocks I have seen.

Mine resembles my father's in shape, size, the hang of my balls, and even to my foreskin shortening somewhat, though mine is not as short as his. My bullet-shaped glans is certainly father's legacy. But there are also differences. In youth my glans was a liver-colour when covered with foreskin. Retraction has made it a dry pink in adulthood. Masturbation with powdered pepper, mustard, etc, has given it a greyish tint, although the underlying colour is still pink. I resemble father most in my glans and my scrotum, though his cock-head was more rounded and mine is 'sharper'. His pee hole was wider, hence my desire to widen mine. His balls were slightly bigger than mine, but the hang, colour of scrotum, and even the sparse hairs on my scrotal sac are similar (though I keep myself shaven).

Although we did not masturbate each other, I have sometimes thought, in retrospect, whether examining, touching and fondling my father's cock amounted to gay incest – parent abuse, perhaps. It happened only once, but thenceforth our talk became extremely relaxed and, when alone, we could discuss sexual matters fully.

Frequently, if we visited a public urinal together, we would stand side by side and watch each other peeing without embarrassment. Other onlookers did not bother him. At most he might use a forefinger to tilt his penis to the right angle, but he would never cover it from view. Although his glans was small his pee was voluminous as his meatus was bigger than mine. The lips of his meatus were always slightly open and turned outwards, like a negro's lips. This may have been the result of a small operation concerning difficult urination some years earlier; although I did not know the details, this could have involved meatotomy.

H.C. – London

Fucking Wankers!

Dear Tony: Here I am again, with a follow up to the article which appeared in Acorn 7/89: it was entitled 'Masturbation Techniques' (pp.22-24). I hope the article proved to be of interest to your readers. Two of them have contacted me and are proving helpful. However things have changed since I wrote the article. Some of your readers may still be able to help me, but the sort of help that I'm looking for is now somewhat different. Let me fill in the background.

On page 140 of the February 1990 edition of Forum there is an ad I placed which reads: 'Study of Female masturbation. For details contact: Box No. 232.16' So far (it is early days yet) this has produced three replies, all from men, hoping to acquire an enlightening book on the subject. I have written to each of them with a more or less standard letter, which fills in the story as well as I can: I feel your readers might like to hear more. The letter went as follows

"Many thanks for replying to my Forum ad 232.16. I'm afraid that I'm probably going to disappoint you to some extent; however my actions were all done in good faith: the details may interest you. In July, August, Sept 89 I inserted the following ad in Forum:

"Female DIY. I'm making a survey of female masturbation methods, partly for fun, but mainly for the purpose of opening out the subject with a descriptive article. Exchange letters with me, and we'll both learn a lot. Confidentiality assured. ALA."

I had previously run a similar series of three such ads for men (my objective being to acquire sufficient information to write a book on the subject of how to masturbate to best advantage). From these ads, addressed to males, I received 65 replies. However the above ad, directed to women, repeated three times, resulted in only two replies. The two respondents were great ladies; one of them suggested that I would get a better result from the fair sex if I made my ad more simple; she suggested to me the wording of the ad to which you replied. It did not occur to me when placing the ad that it would be open to misinterpretation, though I now see that it obviously is.

I'm already gathering together the information obtained from the men into book form, and hope to publish it under the name, The FB Story, within the next couple of years. Doubtless you will see information about it in Forum.

I don't expect that it was part of your intention in writing to me, to get yourself involved in what I am about to suggest: but one thing that my research has uncovered is the fact that there are two categories of men: I describe them as 'Wankers' and 'Fucking Wankers'. (Not the slightest insult intended of course!). The latter category, the fucking wankers, are those who (quite frequently at least) aim to recreate the sensations of fucking during their wanking activities. I have already acquired most of the information that I need, via my correspondence, but I could do with some more help from some enthusiastic 'fucking wankers'.

But what do I mean by enthusiastic? To put some figures on it, if you are in the happy position of enjoying a good 'fucking wank' two or three times a week, then you could be just the person to try out one device which is still in the development phase. It is the FB as we call it. It is best described as a double-sheath, but I won't go into a detailed description now. Anyhow before I engage you in my 'research team' I would like to exchange a letter or two: We won't go into the full procedure of questionnaire, letter exchange, and graduated experiments that I did with most of my respondents: but I would like first to exchange a letter or two, with the aim of assuring myself that you are enough in tune with my objectives to be a reliable tester and reporter. As mentioned in my ads I do take every step to ensure confidentiality. My system is chiefly to use reference numbers and first names, and I keep addresses separately, so that only I can connect addresses with coded reference numbers and names.

Thanks for writing, and I hope that you will feel that you might be interested in my proposition, and then I hope to hear from you in some detail. The model of FB has to be selected for size, particularly circumference, so one detail that would be of interest is the girth of your cock when it is good and hard.

Of course my other requirement remains: namely to enlist information from a few more women. If you happen to know any who you can egg on to replying to my ad then I would indeed be grateful.”

It is interesting to speculate why there is such a difference in the response from females, as compared to males. It is probably fair to say that only about one in six of the men who wrote to me proved to be useful. Most of the others either had problems of one sort or another, or were really looking for a bit of titillation in exchanging letters, and were not what I would call ‘serious wankers’. Few were at the extreme of casualness about their wanking as one person who wrote, after receiving my questionnaire: “I don’t think that I can really help you with your enquiries. As far as I’m concerned, I just masturbate ‘as and when’ the need for relief occurs. I’m afraid I only wrote to you to find out how it was possible that anyone could make enough of it to exchange letters on the subject.”

In other words that respondent was ‘just curious’. I think quite a lot of other men were too. Perhaps man is a more curious animal than woman, and that helps to explain the difference in response. Certainly both the women who wrote did not do so because they were just curious, but rather because they were ardent explorers of bodily sensations: two great ladies, as I said in my letter. If you are not ‘just curious’ but rather an ardent practitioner, then please write to me:

Andrew Ferguson – 11 Harcourt Close, Henley-on-Thames, Oxon. RG9 1UZ

Unkind Cut

A banner saying ‘welcome’ in 27 languages in San Jose, California, actually says ‘circumcision’ to Filipinos. [Short item in the Daily Mirror, sent in by H.F. – Cambridge]: it would be interesting to know what ‘circumcision’ is in the 27 languages: any more contributions to our recurring “What’s yours called?” feature?

Impotence: it is not all in the mind

Implants and injections can now help men with physical sexual problems. Oliver Gillie reports

"YOU FEEL you are not fully a man. Impotence really works on your nerves and your mind. It is something you think about full time..." Bobby Roberts had been married only two years when he became physically incapable of having sexual intercourse. He is one of the first men to have been cured by an operation and then gone on to prove his potency by fathering a child.

Bobby and his wife Miki were in their twenties when he suddenly became impotent. At a time when other couples are starting a family they began to lead separate lives. Miki thought he had a girlfriend. She started to work 60 hours a week to take her mind off her worries, while Bobby spent more time with his friends in the Freemasons.

Bobby, who now lives happily with Miki in Cantonment, Florida, was able to get good advice from his doctor — advice which is still relatively rare in Britain. He suffers from diabetes, which reduces the blood supply to all the extremities of the body: the hands, the feet and the penis. Impotence is a common, although not invariable, complication of this disease.

Bobby was one of the lucky ones. His local doctor referred him to Dr Brantley Scott, a urologist in Houston, Texas, who has developed one of the most advanced surgical methods for treatment of impotence.

Dr Scott has designed an implant consisting of two inflatable rods which are surgically installed in the penis. The rods are inserted into the corpora cavernosa — the two spongy chambers on each side of the penis which normally fill with blood when a man has an erection. These rods are inflated hydraulically by a little pump, placed in the scrotum, which draws fluid from a reservoir inserted in the abdomen. This makes the penis rigid, enabling intercourse to be achieved.

Afterwards the penis is deflated by pressing a little button attached to the pump. The rods are of fixed length which means the penis remains extended even when they are deflated. Nevertheless, since the penis is soft it can easily be folded away. The man is not aware of the pump in his scrotum except when he feels for it.

"You can't tell the difference," said Miki. "In fact it makes intercourse better. You pump it up, and you can't do that naturally. Dr Scott did a survey which showed that the wives of men with implants had a better sex life from that standpoint."

After Bobby had the implant he and Miki decided that they wanted to have a baby, and Bobby Jnr, now 8, was conceived.

Many thousands of operations to install prostheses are done every year in the United States where lasting impotence is widely recognised to be a common complication of physical illness. In Britain the operation is available on the National Health Service, but no more than 200 are done each year — only a very small proportion of those who might of taking certain drugs — particularly some of those commonly prescribed for high blood-pressure. It may also be a result of accidents or operations which damage the nerve supply in the pelvis. And impotence can be a complication of certain diseases such as diabetes and multiple sclerosis.

But by far the most common cause in older men is the furring-up of arteries, atherosclerosis, which is caused by smoking and a diet rich in animal fat.

Atherosclerosis affects arteries throughout the body: when the coronary arteries are affected it may cause a heart attack; when arteries in the legs are affected it causes intermittent claudication — pain on walking; and when the arteries of the pelvis are most benefit from the operation get it in this country.

Graphic: Will Bown

Until a few years ago most doctors believed that lasting impotence was a psychological problem in the vast majority of cases. Most men have experienced temporary impotence when, through anxiety, or too much alcohol, they are unable to have an erection. This common experience led doctors to assume that potency was a mental attribute.

However, it is now known that impotence is frequently the result affected it causes impotence.

Another great advance in the understanding and treatment of impotence came when a French surgeon, Dr Ronald Virag, discovered that erections could be induced artificially by the injection of drugs into the penis. Dr Virag was operating on a patient to improve the blood supply to the penis and injected a drug, papaverine, into an artery in his groin to dilate it. The patient had an erection on the operating table despite being under anaesthetic.

Dr Virag reasoned that the treatment might be used to help men with impotence. First he tried it on himself. It worked. He had invented the injection erection. Very cautiously at first, he used the injection in his clinic as a test and as a way of "exercising" the penis. He found that some men who had exercised their penises in laboratory tests were able to have spontaneous erections and intercourse at home.

Others asked Dr Virag if they could make use of the drug at home, so he taught patients to inject themselves. Within five or 10 minutes of the injection the penis becomes fully erect and the patient can have normal intercourse.

This treatment of impotence is now widely used in Britain. However, there is a small risk of complications with an injection erection. In some men the response is unpredictable and an erection may last a long time. If it lasts more than four hours there is a danger of damage to the penis and men are told that if necessary they should go to a casualty department and have the erection reduced by removing blood with a syringe.

The injection only works when the blood supply to the penis is adequate. Diabetes severely reduces the supply and so the injection cannot be used to overcome impotence associated with this disease, except perhaps in its earlier stages.

A man in normal good health has erections naturally during sleep. If an impotent man has strong night-time erections then his impotence probably has a psychological cause. A man may, for example, begin to have difficulty with potency on being made redundant or on experiencing financial loss.

"Anything which makes a man feel badly about himself can erode his sexual responsiveness," says Dr Elizabeth Stanley, a specialist in marital advice and sex therapy.

"Failure to deal with anger which arises in a relationship is one of the commonest causes of problems with erections. If emotional problems are not openly expressed in a relationship then it's very difficult to talk through a problem. Hidden resentments may build up — sometimes over years — and cause problems with erections."

Another problem for some men and women is a subconscious feeling that sex is dirty, that nice people don't do it together. Some men may be able to have a satisfactory sexual relationship in a short-term affair or with a prostitute, but not with their wives.

"A man may sometimes become impotent because he loses confidence in his sexual ability. He may have failed to have an erection once because he was tired and then be afraid it will happen again," says Dr Stanley.

"One such failure early on in the honeymoon may lead to years of impotence. Good sex is all to do with good communication — being able to tell your partner what you like and don't like.

"It means getting rid of this dreadful myth that men know exactly what to do to arouse a woman and that it's not for the woman to give her partner any information."

However, many men who have suffered from impotence caused by physical illness have wasted years in distressing sex therapy which, they felt, blamed their mind when it was their body that was letting them down. Others who have had real psychological problems with potency have failed to respond to years of psychotherapy.

Increasingly, doctors are willing to prescribe injections for men who suffer psychological impotence. Sometimes a low-dose injection is all that is necessary to increase the responsiveness of these men — and they find that they don't need to use an injection every time. Psychotherapists may be prepared to continue the treatment for years if the patient can pay. But eventually patients become impatient, and psychotherapists may recognise that they are getting nowhere. When this happens Dr Brantley Scott has been persuaded to operate and install his hydraulic implant.

Men who have had years of unsuccessful psychotherapy for impotence but have night-time erections have been able to have successful intercourse this way. There could be no more elegant proof that the unconscious mind is sometimes at war with the conscious will. And when the unconscious cannot be changed by therapy then it may sometimes be outwitted by surgery.

Oliver Gillie reports in the documentary: Impotence — one in ten men, Meditel Productions, to be broadcast on Channel 4 at 9pm tonight. A help line, 0800 767 800, will be open for two hours after the programme and from 10am to 8pm tomorrow. A free Channel 4 booklet by Oliver Gillie is available. Send self-addressed A5 envelope with two second-class stamps to: One in ten men, PO Box 4000, London W3 6XJ, or Glasgow G12 9JQ.

THE INDEPENDENT Tuesday 20 February 1990

Success story: Bobby and Miki Roberts with son Bobby Jnr, conceived after Bobby Snr had two inflatable rods installed in his penis

ACORN

1990 Issue No 4

(Formerly Issue U)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Circumcised In Infancy	K.E.	Page 2
Circumcision As A
Preventive Of Disease	J.W.	Page 4
Self-Circumcision Revision	S.W.	Page 5
Circumcision Rings	E.S.	Page 6
Penis Survey		Page 7
Piercings	I.W.	Page 8
Nipple And Genital Modifications	R.A.	Page 9
Mickey-Taking	H.M.	Page 11
Cocky Cavalier	D.C.	Page 11
Multiple Male Orgasms	D.H-S.	Page 12
Replies	W.M.	Page 14
Seen On A T-Shirt		Page 15
There Was A Young Lad
From Dundee	W.M.	Page 16
Philistine Foreskins	Ms G.	Page 16

Continued on page 2

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Contents (continued)

Old Member	H.B.	Page 17
There Was An Incorrigible Limey		Page 18
Calculating The Odds		Page 18
Advertisements		Page 19

Editorial

Communications to the Editor, Tony Acorn, should be sent to the address on page 1. Letters to other Acorn members will also be forwarded if sent in this way.

Earlier issues this year included some long articles, which it is hoped readers enjoyed. The article on impotence in issue 3/90 was not intended to cast aspersions on any reader's potency, but rather to share information about a little discussed (but perhaps quite widespread) problem and a little known treatment for it. Readers who watched the associated tv programme will have seen the insertion of a penile implant for a well-circumcised Turkish patient and may have noted the surgeon's comment that there was really very little bleeding, which also showed that the patient's inability to obtain an erection was a consequence of poor circulation of blood to the penis. The procedure is also interesting as a way to restore sexual function using a drastic procedure of genital modification.

This issues reverts to a larger number of briefer items, some responding to earlier contributions. Thank you for all your material. Please keep items coming; you the readers are the people who make the newsletter continually interesting.

This is the fourth issue of 1990. The Editor apologises for the fairly erratic intervals between previous issues, but hopes that readers will understand that the editorial task has to be fitted in with other commitments (and that a broken arm further added to the problem of managing these). Issue 5 is planned for early July. There will then be a gap until September. It is planned to publish issues 6, 7 and 8 during September – December 1990.

T.A.

Circumcised In Infancy

Dear Tony: I have recently been allowed to examine the penis of a 54 year old man. I have known its 'owner' since infant school, but until recently was not privileged to examine it closely. The general appearance is quite good. It is about 6" long. He was circumcised a few weeks after birth at a local clinic, following advice in the Motherhood book: there were no religious implications.

Without doubt it has been very thoroughly circumcised, but close inspection reveals what I think to be a rather 'clumsy' job. The scar is not well defined for about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " on top, but appears to have been stitched there once. At the sides the scar-line is at right angles to the axis of the penis, rather than running at an angle to the axis but parallel to the glans rim. At the sides it is well defined and can be felt as slightly raised. There is an area underneath where a large ugly brown 'clump' or 'knot' of skin forms a distinct lump. At this point the scar is about one-third the way along the shaft, and  $\frac{1}{2}$ " clear from the proximal end of the frenulum. Is this the result of an average mid-1930s routine infant circumcision? How was it performed? Is the stitching on top and the knot of skin underneath a result of poor skill on the operator's part?

It was the sight of the circumcised penises of my school pals that always gave rise to the desire to be circumcised myself. I always regretted that I was not done shortly after birth. All the other lads in this area had been. I had to wait until I was in my mid-20s before I found a surgeon who would circumcise me and attain the state I had always longed for. But, perhaps as a result of waiting until I was adult, I have got a far better job. My circumcision has resulted in a scar which is parallel to the glans, which I think looks better, and a scar which has now 'blended in' so as to be almost invisible. Even the stitch marks have vanished.

K.E. – Nottingham

[Dear K.E.: It is hard to say what was an 'average' result. The small scale of a baby's penis may make accuracy difficult, which is why so much ingenuity (mainly in the USA) went into trying to design a circumcision instrument which would produce a standard, cosmetically attractive result even in the hands of an inexperienced duty-surgeon. Several of these, including the Gomco clamp and the 'Plastibell', were designed to crush together the two layers of foreskin, resulting in a virtually bloodless operation and no need for stitches. These devices did not catch on much in the UK, where circumcision was usually done freehand or with a pair of forceps used to grip the foreskin and guide the scalpel. The forceps could be applied straight across, or at an angle roughly parallel to the glans rim. The skill lay in knowing how much tension to apply when pulling the foreskin forward before tightening the forceps. It seems that in the case you describe, the foreskin was pulled quite tight on top, needing a stitch to keep it together, but was much slacker underneath. Often no stitches were used: the two cut edges of skin were simply allowed to grow together, which was usually no problem, but the result was often quite variable. By contrast, a practised surgeon can usually be much more precise in the type of result obtained in an adult. If his skill extends to the stitching, and to judging correctly when to take stitches out, the sort of neat result of which you are so proud can be achieved. Otherwise the specialised Gomco clamp is available in sizes suitable for adults, and can also give a very neat result. – T.A.]

Circumcision As A Preventive Of Disease

My parents had me circumcised when I was 9 days old, in 1957. Their GP did it – presumably this had their approval. They did so chiefly as a protection for my future wife and to spare me the unpleasantness of having to have it done later, should it become necessary, as had happened to my father when he was 14. Before we started school I and my younger brothers were primed with the basic facts about why our willies would look different from most of the other boys'. As we grew older we were taught the full reasons for our circumcisions. I do not feel – and in this I speak for my brothers as well – that the operation was a crime against my basic rights and freedoms, nor that it is uncivilised. On the contrary, if our circumcisions have lessened the risk of our wives developing cervical cancer, we are very thankful.

I know that the preventive value of this operation is contentious, but there is substantial evidence that it is of value. The young wife of a friend did get this cancer, despite having had smear tests. He is uncircumcised. Her treatment was most unpleasant, lasting nearly two years, and involved her having a hysterectomy as well as radiation and chemotherapy. Unfortunately cervical cancer is a risk that a woman must accept if she has sexual intercourse; so is conception. As to the latter, the man can play his part by having a vasectomy. Is it not just as civilised to have an inessential part of his genitalia removed to lessen the risk of cervical cancer?

Even more important is the possible role of the foreskin in the transmission of AIDS. It is found that in heterosexuals, AIDS is 19 times more frequent when the male has a foreskin than when he is circumcised. Here both partners are at risk. Furthermore, a recent Australian study found that herpes and gonorrhoea were twice as common and thrush and syphilis were five times as common in uncircumcised males as in circumcised ones. It has also been found that urinary tract infections are ten times more frequent in uncircumcised children than in circumcised ones, and that nearly all renal (kidney) failures have a history of urinary tract infection.

This information was given to me by a urological registrar, a close friend since childhood and circumcised like us. In his opinion this lower rate of genital infections in circumcised males is the consequence of the frenulum and surrounding areas becoming toughened by its continuous exposure, whereas in the foreskinned male abrasions, splits and tears in this region are common, and these are often troublesome enough to necessitate circumcision.

He is an advocate of routine circumcision at birth, but is up against resistance from the paediatricians in the hospitals. He did a very neat job on our two boys under a local anaesthetic, free of charge and has obliged several of our friends who have been thwarted, like us, in their endeavours to get it done. I would agree that there is a case for leaving the baby 'intact' if circumcision caused any distress, but it is quite clear that it does not. Our Sunday paper carries regular advertisements for 'instant' circumcision – but at a price! I reckon there must be a lot of men wishing their parents and/or medics had been enlightened enough to get it out of the way when they were born.

Some time ago Forum carried a letter from a female reader reporting that a woman's magazine had carried out a survey of female preferences in their sexual partner and found they overwhelmingly expressed a preference for the circumcised male. Does anybody know which magazine and when this survey was carried out? Enquiries by my wife among relatives and friends lend support to the survey's findings.

J.W. – Ipswich

[Thanks for a very sane, informative and thoughtful letter. Would your urologist friend like to write a brief contribution to a future issue of Acorn? I can not help with the reference to the women's magazine: perhaps another reader will do so. – T.A.]

Self-Circumcision Revision

Dear Tony: You published an account of my original circumcision in issue 3/88. Early in 1989 I decided to re-circumcise myself to correct some of the things I disliked about the original job. I made a ring from U-section copper which was a nice easy fit in the sulcus. I then drew as much skin as I could, including the original circumcision scar and the original internal fold, forward over the ring.

I used sticking plaster to hold the skin forward onto the glans, while I wound a couple of turns of nichrome wire round the groove I had made in the outside of the ring. The ends of the wire were then twisted together as tightly as possible. This was a bit painful, but not excessively so – not bad enough to stop me going to bed and going to sleep soon after. In the morning my cock felt a bit sore, but quite bearable. After three days the skin trapped beyond the wire was dead so I took a scalpel and cut round both the outer and inner surfaces about  $\frac{1}{8}$ " (3 mm) from the wire. When flattened out, the ring of skin removed measured  $\frac{5}{8}$ " (15 mm) wide, so (with the dead skin left next to the wire) I removed a total of  $\frac{7}{8}$ ". This dead skin turned black and dried in about 24 hours, so a couple of days later (after 6 days in total) I cut the wire and removed it and the copper ring. It took about two weeks to complete the healing and for the bits of dead skin to drop off.

The new scar is  $\frac{3}{8}$ " (9 mm) from the corona on top and on the right side, and  $\frac{5}{8}$ " from the corona on the left. The distance at the frenulum is about 1". I also tried to correct the misalignment of the median raphe: my original circumcision had left it displaced  $\frac{3}{8}$ " to the left; now it is very slightly to the right of the correct alignment with the frenulum.

The result closely approximates to my ideal penis. There is no surplus skin to fold over the glans or form wrinkles when flaccid. When erect the skin is fairly tight, especially on top, although there is enough 'give' to allow for about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " movement for masturbation purposes. My usual method is thumb on top and two or three fingers underneath on the frenulum.

S.W. – Gwent

[Dear S.W.: Congratulations on your courage and determination to achieve the ideal, and your success in achieving it! This method is, of course, an adaptation of the idea behind the Plastibell technique, used mainly in the USA (but also by some paediatricians in the UK). It is closely related also to the Gomco clamp method. A member kindly supplied me with one of these recently, of the large size suitable for adults. The instructions are published with this issue of Acorn, so that members can become familiar with a technique which is more widely known in the USA than the UK. – T.A.]

Circumcision Rings

Dear Tony: In Acorn 5/89, E.S. – Salisbury wrote about having read in a book by Bud Berkeley about circumcision rings, and you commented on how they might be fitted. I have a copy of Berkeley's book, Foreskin: its past, its present, and its future? and they were not circumcision rings but anti-circumcision rings. From the description, it does not seem as if any piercing was done (quotation below). I have written twice to Bud Berkeley for more details but have had no reply.

E.S. – Rochdale

Berkeley writes (p.41) about

...the fabulous fifties, the golden era of the all-American boy, cut clean... of hair, of jaw, of penis... Many ethnic minority groups, previously missed by the circumcision band-wagon, now started sending their little squires to school with unmuzzled acorns. Circumcision tools became big business for the surgical supply companies, with new gadgets flooding the market. One gadget was advertised as a 'self-circumcision kit'. Another gadget was a set of Anti-Circumcision Rings. The rings were marketed as giving all the benefits of circumcision without the pain of surgery. They were to be worn by youngsters much as they would wear braces on their teeth; fitting on the shaft of the penis and trapping the foreskin behind the corona of the glans penis. The theory was that the glans would permanently expand once the restriction of the foreskin was eliminated, thus trapping the foreskin behind it forever. One farm-raised man recalled his experience with the rings: "My new step father fit the rings on me when I was 12 years old. He told me all the boys had to wear them. They must have worked because I didn't have to wear them after about a year and my foreskin still does not move forward unless I tug at it. My older brother wasn't so lucky. He was 16 when he got fitted and I guess it was too late. We did everything we could think of to make his cock-head get fatter, but every time we took off his rings his ole foreskin would just roll on over everything. He wore the rings right up to the time he joined the Marines. They solved his problem in Korea when they circumcised him clean off."

Penis Survey

Dimensions are in inches.

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scar-line from glans rim.
If uncircumcised: U
6. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, flaccid?
7. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ ths) of glans is covered, erect?
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight (T) or loose (L)?
9. When standing against the wall with erect penis, how far from glans tip to nearest part of stomach?
10. Height
11. Age
12. Identification (initials and place).

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11	12
4.4	6.4	5.1	6.0	0.4	-	-	-	-	5'11"	57	S.W. – Gwent
1.9	7.3	4.7	5.7	0.6	-	-	-	-	5'4"	75	H.M. – Colchester
4.5	6.0	5.0	5.5	0	6	0	L	5	6'0"	42	J.McC. – Bathgate
3.2	5.3	4.2	4.8	1.0	-	-	-	5.8	5'6"	38	I.W. – Dorset
3.5	5.8	4.4	5.9	0.5	-	-	-	6.0	5'11"	52	W.M. – Surrey

Comments

I was subjected to a dorsal slit, and have since myself done a partially successful reversal; I have answered both the circumcised question (5) and the uncircumcised ones (6,7,8) since they both apply. — J.McC.

Scar-line to corona, flaccid: dorsal 0.5", frenulum 1"; erect: dorsal 1", frenulum 2". The frenulum I imagine is mostly intact. The frenulum used to be tighter, but a torn piercing near the corona reduced the tension when erect. I was cut as a baby in 1951, though I think it was going out of fashion: see the letter 'Piercings' below. — I.W. – Dorset

Piercings

Dear Tony: My cock was cut as a baby. When erect there is no movement on the shaft skin at all and it appears to be stretched to its maximum, so I gather that I am radically cut. I have no idea what method was used to de-skin me, but it is very obvious, unlike some who appear so loosely cut that one often cannot make up one's mind if they are done or not. The scar is about an inch from the corona in front, but almost two inches away at the frenulum where it forms a shallow V pointing away from the tip.

Until about three years ago my frenulum did pull a bit tight during a full erection. If I was not careful when masturbating it was sometimes a bit raw and sore for a couple of days. So I pierced it through, about  $\frac{1}{8}$ " from the edge, right near my knob rim. Then I forced a small ring (the self fastening type used to hold together a necklace) through the hole. After about 2-3 weeks and frequent stretching the skin between the hole and the edge of the frenulum started to dry up. The hole got slowly bigger until it finally broke through the frenulum edge. This left a small V in the frenulum, with a little pimple-like point at each side. These healed over but are still very sensitive. During erection they pull apart to leave about  $\frac{1}{2}$ " between them. This has relieved the strain on the frenulum and the tightness of the skin on the underside of the shaft during erection. It also relieves the pull on the meatus, which is more elongated than round, with pronounced lips on each side.

I vary from the 'normal' as follows. I have through my frenulum adjacent to the scar-line a triangular pattern of piercings: a transverse one (A-B) in the frenulum, and one running from each end of this to a single exit (C) on the raphé near where it meets the frenulum at the scar line. I have never had it pierced. C is the smallest, and it is just possible to push a largish bodkin into its opening. B is the largest, about the size of a match-head, and A is the size of a match-stick. At A-B the frenulum is raised very proud of the shaft so that I can gather up a good pinch of it even when erect. Holes A and B lie deep into the bed of the frenulum, almost on the shaft skin, which I presume to be what was once the inner layer of my long-gone foreskin.

I frequently clean out this network by pulling a thread though it to remove the smegma-like material which gathers. Although it is exceedingly sensitive when I do this, it in no way hurts. I have never seen this on any other circumcised cock, and over the years I have seen quite a few. Can you or another reader offer an explanation?

I.W. – Dorset

[First, congratulations on solving the problem of your over tight frenulum. This also illustrates the importance of care in the placing of a piercing and in choosing the correct thickness of a ring to be worn in it: a piercing is likely to pull through and break unless it is placed about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " (1 cm) or more from the edge, and if the sleeper or ring worn in it is 1.5 mm or more thick. The cutting effect of a thinner ring placed under frequent tension can sometimes be useful if it is intended to enlarge the piercing, but the effect should always be remembered.

Second: the three holes. The explanation which occurs to me as most likely is that this was the location of the triangular stitch which was recommended to be inserted where it would tie off the frenulum and align it to the raphé. Several texts on circumcision technique recommended this to tie off the frenal 'artery' (which does not in fact exist). Any arterial blood in this area would result from incision of the corpus spongiosum (the underlying spongy tissue which forms one third of the shaft and the glans), but the frenulum does sometimes bleed quite profusely. A self-dissolving stitch would often be used, to avoid the need to see the patient again to remove it. A quick-healing patient might simply form skin around the stitch, leaving the little passageways (fistulae) which you describe. So even 'self dissolving' stitches should be removed after a week, to avoid this effect.

What to do about them? You can leave them, keep them clean as you have been doing, and wear a ring or rings in them if you like (but make it/them the thickest you can take). Or you can cut them through. In that case ensure that all items are sterile (over 20 minutes in a preheated oven at over 120°C for metal items; other items soaked in strong disinfectant overnight). Insert an object to stretch the hole as tightly as possible, then cut through with a clean, sterile razor blade, in two places if possible to avoid forming the tags/pimples which would result from a single cut. – T.A.]

Nipple And Genital Modifications

Dear Tony: Many thanks for the latest Acorn, and congratulations for keeping the magazine interesting and thriving throughout the year. I think it's improved, as there has been more of a 'balanced' view and several personal accounts, which are always interesting.

I felt a lot for R.B.W., who had obviously suffered so much in his childhood. Unfortunately, I think the issue of circumcision is something of a red herring, as others have also suggested. I know it is a bit naive of me to say so but the problem is really one of ignorance, when children who can be so very cruel pick on somebody because they are different, irrespective of what the difference actually is. Perhaps with a little education, such as takes place through Acorn, we can help a little in this respect.

On another topic, I was very interested to see 'nipple sensitivity' mentioned. As a young teenager I read a book called Sex and the Single Man by, I think, Dr Robert Chartham. He said that there is much in common between the bodies of men and women, and with regular stimulation men could develop as sensitive nipples as women. Ever since then I've regularly stimulated my nipples, and Dr Chartham was right! Whenever I undress I always squeeze my nipples and over the years have experimented with all sorts of nipple clamps to stimulate them and develop sensitivity. During the day, too, it is quite easy to squeeze one's nipples discreetly while dressed, to liven up a boring moment. In 1988 I had both nipples pierced by Mr Sebastian in London, but eventually had to let them close up again as the piercing never completely healed. I'm not sure whether this did lead to a further increase in sensitivity, but I've heard of several who say that piercing does.

Last year another correspondent sent me a pair of spring loaded nipple clamps and I've found them to be the best yet, as I can wear them for about 15-20 minutes, take them off, and find my nipples extremely sensitive when squeezed. Indeed the first time I did this I came without penile stimulation, so it is possible (and most enjoyable!) My last girl friend would stimulate my nipples, but often with the lightest, most teasing caresses rather than hard squeezing. I found that this further increased sensitivity. During intercourse, squeezing my nipples will help to quickly bring me to a climax, if required. Having sensitive nipples stimulated while coming further adds to the pleasure.

I also love having my balls squeezed and massaged. A favourite way of spending Sunday morning is to be in bed with a skilled and willing partner who will indulge me with a prolonged session of nipple stimulation and ball squeezing, with occasional cock stimulation. A session of mutual masturbation, giving each other pleasure and receiving it, is often preferable to a simple screw. One of my fantasies is to be lying down, possibly tied, with one beautiful woman biting and squeezing each nipple, one squeezing and massaging my balls, one rubbing my glans, and another stimulating my anus and prostate. Any volunteers?

The magazine Body Art (issue 7, 1989, pp.22-26) recently had an article on 'Female Nipple Development', gradually using increasingly long 'nipple trainers' to lengthen and enlarge pierced nipples. There's a beautiful photograph of Katherine with exquisitely protruding nipples, over 1" long and  $\frac{3}{4}$ " thick. While nowhere near this, for a man my own nipples have become remarkably well developed, compared to some who have little more than a dark brown 'target area' of skin. There is enough of mine protruding to squeeze and enjoy.

I also practice scrotum stretching and have bought a number of weights for this purpose. While still a comparative beginner, I currently wear 2 x 1 lb (about 950 gm) weights, 60 mm long. I find it best to wear them walking with a loose track suit so that the weights bobble about on my balls as I walk. In fact the phrase 'coming for a stroll?' takes on a whole new meaning if you are wearing nipple clamps, ball weights and a butt plug, and just happen to have an exposed glans rubbing against the inside of your coat! Do any other readers have any tips for stimulation during the day or as they walk?

I was recently browsing in a book called, I think, Tattooing, Piercing and Scarification that had several photos of penises with multiple piercings and some scrotum stretching, including an Indian 'fakir' wearing 14 rings to stretch his scrotum. Another had a heavy weight behind his glans around his penis, which was stretched quite long and thin towards his knees. The most bizarre, however, was a penis that was completely divided in two for about  $\frac{2}{3}$  rds of its length.

Finally, I'd love to hear from others about something that interests me very much: how much direct stimulation of the glans can a man stand? For example, with a well-lubricated glans, how long could you stand it being rubbed directly and continuously with the cupped palm of a hand? Do you notice a difference in sensitivity between rubbing the glans at the back (under) the penis, the front of the glans, or directly across the top? Or between using the palm or the fingers? Is it more bearable to have a hand moving up and down the full length of the penis, rubbing the shaft as well as including the glans? Hurry up with the next issue!

R.A. – Brighton

Mickey-Taking

Dear Tony: I hope R.B.W. (issue 8/89) will be able to come to terms with his condition, having put pen to paper. I can sympathise with his feelings of ostracism, as I too had a similar experience, although, fortunately for me, a change of scene at about the age of 11 brought me wide contact with school fellows, both cavalier and roundhead, who were more interested in competition between the two than mickey-taking. Our contacts with the opposite sex in the 1920s were more non-existent than limited.

H.M. – Colchester

Cocky Cavalier

Call me cocky if you like, but unlike many of your readers, I've always found my foreskin to be a definite advantage, and find it hard to understand why so many people take such a violent dislike to a natural part of their body. The only drawback with mine is when my lady friend takes me in hand, to our mutual enjoyment!

When I was a kid a lot of my playmates were circumcised, but I tended to be curious rather than envious. In fact I felt somewhat superior in having something they did not. Unlike those who claim that girls prefer roundheads, I found the opposite. This was first brought home to me in a most satisfying way when I used to visit my aunt in the Midlands. Her daughter, Ann, whom I adored, was a couple of years older than me. Her son Alan was my age, fat and pushy, and I loathed him. Ann was precocious as a kid (and a right raver when she grew up!), and she had the cock out of my trousers the first occasion we kids were alone. Alan was a roundhead, so she was excited to find I had a foreskin. Although she'd seen foreskins before, she'd never had a chance to 'have a go' with one. She made Alan get his out too, so that she could compare them: there's no doubt that his was a size larger than mine, with a glans like a button mushroom, but it was mine she gave all her attention. She explored my foreskin in every possible way, pulling it, pushing it, sliding it up and down, making me blow it out with pee, then stuffing marbles under it to see how many it would take. I was dead flattered, I can tell you. Alan was furious and tried to rough me up afterwards – but I was quicker than he was!

This was only the start. When I later asked the girls I met if they preferred foreskins and why, those who were able to make the comparison said, without exception, that they did. The reasons they gave included: I like a man to be complete; peeled ones look funny; it's easier to wank a foreskin; it's more mysterious; I love pulling it back to reveal the shiny knob; nature knows best; circumcision destroys sensitivity; and so on. Not one of them said she'd like to have her kids done when the time came to have a family. But my experience may be different from others. Why don't Acorn members get their lady friends to state their preference and give their reasons for it?

Desmond Compton – Harrow

Multiple Male Orgasms

Sex can be surprisingly better for men after the age of 35. Scientists have always believed that only women are capable of having multiple orgasms. But some recent research has shown that there are men who can perform this feat too.

American doctors have published evidence of 21 multiple orgasmic men, most of whom had no idea that they were special until told by a partner. Many of them had been multiple orgasmic since adolescence, but almost half had discovered their capacity after the age of 35. The men reported having from two to nine orgasms per session, apart from one man who had as many as 16 orgasms in one sexual encounter.

Dr Marian Dunn, Director of the Centre for Human Sexuality at the State University of New York, who performed the study, is very confident of the reliability of her data: 'I just stated at the end of lectures I was giving that I was interested in interviewing multiple-orgasmic men, and often it was women who came up and gave me the contacts. In fact, more women came forward than men. In all, 14 of the men's partners were interviewed and were able to provide corroboration.

'I could have talked to many more men,' continued Dr Dunn, 'and now the study has been published, I've had letters from a number of colleagues and other men, saying that they have had the same experience. It is strange that it is such a little-known phenomenon. You would think that men would brag about it, but actually they don't seem to.'

The word orgasm is often used to mean orgasm and ejaculation, since for most men the one does not occur without the other. Butterworth's medical dictionary says of the word orgasm: 'Synonymous with ejaculation in the male.' But orgasm in men is more accurately defined as the experience of an intense and diffuse pleasurable sensation during sexual activity, and as such is distinct from ejaculation which usually occurs moments after orgasm itself.

The term 'multiple orgasm', however, is difficult to define, particularly in the male. Dr Dunn attempts to define it as: 'two or more orgasms with or without ejaculation and without, or with only very limited, detumescence during one and the same sexual encounter'.

'Very limited detumescence' is an imprecise phrase, but the meaning was that the erection should be sufficiently maintained for neither partner to notice significant change in rigidity. The men in the study varied considerably in their experiences. Some ejaculated usually at the first orgasm, some at the last, and some in between. Some had only one ejaculation during a single sexual encounter, and others more.

One surprising feature of the study was that eight of the 21 men interviewed only began to have multiple orgasms in their mid-thirties, continuing to do so into their fifties and sixties. One man, a clay-pigeon shooter, still having multiple orgasms at the age of 59, recalled that he was so excited when he had the first experience, at the age of 40, that he shouted 'Doublee!' – the term for shooting two clay pigeons with a double-barrelled gun.

Dr Dunn believes that social conditioning might explain this finding. 'Men are scripted to believe that they ejaculate and detumescence and that's that. They don't hang in there. At a later date, when they're in the relaxed atmosphere of a loving relationship, those that are capable of multiple orgasms find that they don't necessarily lose their erection and so they carry on.'

Dr Dunn stresses how important the setting of each encounter was. Few of the men were multiple-orgasmic on all occasions. Most claimed they needed a non-demand atmosphere, emotional closeness and the opportunity for leisurely sex. They also needed a sexually responsive partner who did not tire of prolonged intercourse, otherwise their own interest and arousal quickly waned.

Not all men, however, discovered themselves to have this capacity by chance. Two of the 21, reasoning that if women could have multiple orgasms then men could too, deliberately set out to become multi-orgasmic. These men practised coming to the brink of orgasm and inhibiting ejaculation until they could separate the sensation of orgasm and the experience of ejaculation. In most men these two events occur a second or so apart but are linked by virtue of the point of ejaculatory inevitability, which occurs just before orgasm.

Masters and Johnson, authors of the definitive guide to sex and sexuality – Human Sexual Response – published in the 1960s, held that ‘immediately after ejaculation, the male enters the refractory period’, during which he cannot be stimulated. But Marion Dunn disagrees. ‘It seems that there is a great deal of variation in the length of the refractory period men need. As with all things, there are always going to be people at the top end of the spectrum, and these men need very little or no refractory period.’

This study shows that not all men experience loss of erection after ejaculation, but that some can continue to further orgasms, with or without further ejaculation. Dr Dunn also differs with Masters and Johnson over female orgasm. ‘They contended that all women were capable of having multiple orgasms, but I don’t agree. Some women have a single satisfying orgasm and are refractory to stimulation thereafter. Sexuality as a whole should be viewed with an open mind, not with hard and fast rules.’

Just how many men are multi-orgasmic is not known. It cannot be many, suggests Dr Dunn, otherwise the phenomenon would be better documented. But there has been great hostility to the idea of the male multi-orgasm – and particularly from scientists. It seems that Kinsey was right in his appraisal of the subject, when he wrote in 1948 in his book, Sexual Behaviour in the Human Male: ‘Scepticism over the possibility of repeated response in the male merely emphasises the incapacity of even scientifically trained persons to comprehend that others may be made differently from themselves.’

David Hildick-Smith, The Independent, 2 January 1990

Replies

Dear Tony: A few comments on newsletter 2/90: (a) I thought the descriptions of the circumcisions in Ankara were very good. But it was a little difficult to visualise the flexible probe which was clearly an important part of the procedure.

[The probe traditionally used by Turkish circumcisers is about as thick as a matchstick, with a small knob at one end and a handle at the other. The circumciser inserts it between glans and foreskin, taking care not to enter the urethra with it. While holding the tip of the foreskin, the probe is pushed as far as the sulcus, then moved around to left and right as far as the frenulum. Its purpose is first, to free any adhesions between glans and foreskin, and second, to indicate to the circumciser the position of the corona and the length of the foreskin; he may make a mark on the foreskin at this level. The probe is then withdrawn and tension is applied to the foreskin until the mark is well clear of the tip of the glans. Thus the probing is important in the guidance it gives to the circumciser on how much tension to apply and thus how much foreskin he will remove. – T.A.]

(b) It would seem that the Kikuyu carried out an initiation to manhood rather than an actual circumcision; it would seem that no foreskin is actually removed. I suggest that 'circumcision' means that some or all of the foreskin must be removed. The result of the Kikuyu procedure would seem to make masturbation and intercourse difficult and possibly painful, and would not in any way enhance the appearance of the penis.

[You are right that no foreskin is removed: the transverse slit does, however, mean that the glans is thereafter fully exposed. When healed, the shaft skin on the upper side is quite tight, and there is a circular scar-line. But the entire foreskin then hangs in a roll under the glans: one account likens it to a uvula. In time it may shrivel and become quite small. There is no problem masturbating, and the roll of foreskin retains most of its sensation. It adds somewhat to the bulk of the penis, and is said to be appreciated by the women for this reason. As to appearance, it serves as something of a distinguishing mark (though the Masai have a similar operating technique, and the two tribes have sometimes intermarried; or, at least in the past, girls were captured in cattle-raids. The initiation was very important in marking the transition from boy to man and to warrior status, in tribes where no distinction was made between military and civilian and domestic life. Tribes such as the Kikuyu and Masai have nothing but contempt for their uncircumcised neighbours. – T.A.]

(c) I thought that the quotations from the Bible about circumcision were interesting, but it should be stressed that the underlying reason for circumcision was cleanliness and hygiene. This very much extends to other aspects of Jewish culture: the ban on the eating of pork is perhaps the most obvious. I would also suggest that as circumcision was extended to slaves and other members of the household it was not only popular among male Jews but among females as well, possibly because they found a circumcised penis more satisfying.

All the best, W.M. – Surrey

[The origins of such customs may well have been in hygiene. But once established, a custom becomes self-perpetuating: "Why do you do it?" "Because it is the custom." Traditionalists and the religious faithful may find an explanation in terms of hygiene a useful rationalisation or by-product. – T.A.]

Seen On A T-Shirt

"It's hard to be good. And vice versa."

There Was A Young Lad From Dundee

There Was A Young Lad From Dundee
Whose foreskin obstructed his pee.
The doctor said he would agree
To a circumcision done for free.
His glans at last he can see
And fellatio's a time of great glee.
Circumcision for all's his decree
As he's benefited in high degree.

W.M. – Surrey

Philistine Foreskins

Dear Sir: A friend lends me your paper and I think you might be interested in the situation in the Middle East which will come as a surprise to some of your readers. I am a Christian Palestinian woman who has lived half my life in this country.

Our predecessors the Philistines were distinguished for being uncircumcised, and although most Palestinians today are circumcised because they are Moslems, you should know that there is a big minority of Palestinian Christians who remain uncircumcised like their Philistine forebears. With us the foreskin is a symbol of our Christian status in a predominantly Moslem part of the world and as such we treat it with pride and respect: an Arab Christian prizes his foreskin next to his life!

As the true descendants of the ancient Phoenecian and Philistine civilizations we consider ourselves a step ahead of our Moslem neighbours who have adopted the foreign custom of Tat-heer (male circumcision), whilst in some of the poorer families they still have the barbaric practice of Tabzeer (clitoris removal).

Whilst it is true that the Christians of Palestine, Lebanon and Jordan all cherish the foreskin as the emblem of their faith, setting them apart from the Islamic majority, the Coptic Christians of Egypt prefer to follow the Muslims in this respect and their children are circumcised. They also adopt the Islamic prayer posture and so the only distinguishing mark for a Coptic Christian is a small cross tattooed on the wrist.

During the troubles in Beirut I'm told that Christian children who fell into the hands of the fanatical Moslem militias were forcibly circumcised before being returned to the Christian sector – they could not have invented a more devilish punishment for those poor kids! Such boys will henceforth be isolated in their own community. They will have problems in marrying decent Christian girls and will probably have to emigrate to Egypt or the USA. Although we would not be so cruel as to ostracise such boys, everyone in the community would be acutely aware of the damage done to them and their Christian status and unconscious barriers would exist. The case is similar to Hindu boys in India who were forcibly circumcised by Moslems during the troubles, since like us they take a pride and zeal in preserving their foreskins.

Imagine my surprise then in arriving in the UK to find that my first boyfriend, a Christian of course, was circumcised. Due to my background I was slightly disgusted. How could a Christian undergo an operation which is associated only with the Jewish and Moslem religions, or with some of the more primitive people in the world? Have the English got Semitic blood? Are they the lost tribe of Israel perhaps?

My faith in the rightness of things has been restored since then when I found all my subsequent male acquaintances were properly uncircumcised, although I'm still amazed at the number of Englishmen who have submitted to the tat-heer!

Yours faithfully, Ms G. – London E14

[Many thanks for your interesting letter, which once again emphasises the aspect of cultural differentiation bound up with circumcised or uncircumcised status. The Old Testament is, of course, full of references to Philistines as an uncircumcised people, and the implication is generally that they were also unclean. You mention that a Christian boy circumcised during the troubles would have difficulty in marrying a decent Christian girl: how would her parents know that he is circumcised? Would her father or brother insist on an inspection? As to the prevalence of circumcision in England, you may perhaps have heard that it is most common among upper class families, and not least among those able to afford to send their sons to the better boarding schools. There were several attempts in the 19th century to 'prove' by speculation a link with the lost tribe of Israel. – T.A.]

Old Member

Dear Tony: Thank you for all you have sent me, it has been most helpful. I was a 1917 boarding prep school boy, and then to public school. From the age of 14 I longed to be an Acorn but never managed it until on leave in Jerusalem in the 1940s. I was left with  $\frac{9}{10}$  cover. I am now 85 and not well, so must resign my membership, with thanks and thanks again.

H.B. – Norwich

There Was An Incurable Limey

There was an incurable Limey
Who begged his new girlfriend, "Just try me:
But I'm not like a Jew
So a tissue will do,
The uncovered end will be slimey."

Calculating The Odds

What are the odds of catching AIDS from an infected partner? Researchers at the 27th Interscience Conference on Antimicrobial Agents and Chemotherapy in Manhattan presented evidence that the odds are not equal for all players in today's sexual roulette. Drawing on a study of 357 men at a venereal diseases clinic in Nairobi, Microbiologist William Cameron reported that uncircumcised men are  $9\frac{1}{2}$  times as likely as circumcised males to become infected after exposure. According to Cameron, "The mucosal membrane underneath the foreskin may trap the virus, making it more likely to enter the blood-stream."

Cameron and others at the conference also reported that men with genital ulcers, caused by such infections as herpes simplex 2, syphilis or chancroid, were three times as vulnerable to the AIDS virus as those who were lesion free. "An ulcer breaks the integrity of the skin and allows infected blood to come into contact with a sexual partner", says Cameron. Thus, he adds, controlling treatable diseases like herpes and educating uncircumcised men about the risk could make a slight dent in the so far incurable scourge.

[Many tribal groups in Kenya, notably the Kikuyu, Masai, Kalenjin, and most who live along the coast, customarily circumcise and are contemptuous of the uncircumcised Luo and other tribes who live mainly around Lake Victoria. In the post-colonial era some tribal lines of division have been blurred by travel and commerce, but the distinction between circumcised and uncircumcised remains, even if the traditional initiation ceremonies have increasingly given way to a less painful hospital operation. – T.A.]

Advertisements

Cavaliers of the world unite. Please contact P.B. – London NW11

Brian – West Country, is considering a further cut and wishes to correspond with anyone circumcised as an adult, especially anyone who lost their frenulum either at the time of their first circumcision or subsequently.

Slim 50-year-old guy, non-smoker, wishes to add to his circle of Acorn-orientated friends, both cavaliers and roundheads. We meet regularly in Central Scotland and our interests include d.i.y., watersports, videos and photography. G.P. – Perth

ACORN

1990 Issue No 5

(Formerly Issue W)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
The Dorsal Slit	J.G.McC.	Page 2
Tight Foreskin Relieved	D.N.	Page 7
'Aiding And Abetting Grievous Bodily Harm On Himself'	T.A.	Page 7
Lubrication	Henry	Page 8
Seen In The Sauna	L.J.	Page 9
BUFF	R.B.W.	Page 10
More Wanted On Experience Before And After Circumcision	M.L.	Page 10
Long Articles	M.H.	Page 11
In Praise Of The Foreskin	P.B.	Page 11
For Sale	T.A.	Page 12
Masturbation Survey		Page 12

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Communications to the Editor, Tony Acorn, should be sent to the address on page 1. Letters to other Acorn members will also be forwarded if sent in this way.

Help: Can anyone help, please, with the distribution of Acorn, particularly with some or all of the following tasks: photocopying (please indicate price per sheet); filling, sticking, addressing, stamping and posting envelopes. About 100 copies of each issue go out, and these tasks take about 5 person-hours. Please write to the Editor with details if you can assist.

T.A.

The Dorsal Slit

Shortly before he died, my father was talking about his life and mine, the similarities and differences, the good times and the not so good. At one point he asked me whether I had any regrets about the way I had been brought up. "Only one," I replied, "being circumcised." I went on to ask why it had been done, for there was no mention of it in my medical records, but he had no recollection of the circumstances. He confirmed one thing to me, however, that it was probably he who had done it, and that would be why it had not been recorded.

He had been the single G.P. in a small remote country practice. For reasons of medical ethics, he and his immediate family were all registered with the G.P. in the neighbouring practice. To visit that doctor meant a round trip of nearly thirty miles at a time when petrol rationing after the war was still in force. For reasons of practicality and convenience, therefore, all our medical treatment was actually done by my father.

I only once questioned my mother about it: she, in her inimitable way, firmly changed the subject; it is not, in her opinion, proper to talk of such things. From conversations overheard during my youth between her and other women, it was apparent that she considered that all boys just had to be circumcised; anything else was unthinkable. The fact that I remained intact as long as I did, then, was probably the result of one of the many disagreements my parents continually lived with. These disagreements covered many subjects but always took the same form: both were strong-willed and stubborn people and would never back down; each would argue his or her case, sometimes very heatedly, over several days, neither giving an inch; they would then 'agree to differ', and so the disagreement remained, never mentioned and totally unresolved, but ever present, sometimes for years.

I think I must have been about eleven months old when I was finally 'done', although the only recollection I have is a vague and misty one, and not in the least terrifying, of a shiny oval ring backed with ether-soaked lint being pressed over my face. I suspect my mother of all too vigorous attempts at hygiene beneath my foreskin, inevitably resulting in the infection and swelling known as phimosis; perhaps it was her unconscious reaction to the unresolved confrontation. The result would have been allowed to reach the point where surgical intervention became essential, ('I told you so'), and my father would have been obliged, despite his views, to perform the operation.

In such a case it is normal practice to perform an emergency 'dorsal slit' operation to allow the infection to heal and the swelling to die down, and later to perform a 'revision' operation to leave a tidy and comfortable result. In my case, the complication of the unresolved and unspoken battle between my parents ensured that the second operation never actually occurred. I do not, of course, know how much, if anything, of this is true, I can only surmise from vague recollections of half understood overheard conversations and my knowledge of the characters of the people involved.

I ought to explain some of the terms I have used. The 'dorsal slit' operation consists of a single longitudinal slit of the foreskin performed by placing one blade of a pair of scissors under the upper side of the foreskin and sliding it part-way towards the glans-rim, then closing the scissors. The foreskin parts like the two sides of the petal of an arum lily, and heals in this position.

Phimosis is a condition where an infection under the foreskin has caused a swelling; the swelling causes a restriction in blood-flow in the foreskin; the restriction in blood-flow causes more swelling and impedes the ability of the immune system to clear up the infection. Once started, the condition is thus self-perpetuating. The normal procedure in a case of phimosis is to cut only just far enough down to sever the constriction which is causing the problem.

§ § § §

The incomplete state of my operation was not a particular problem before puberty except in one small way. The dormitory of the boarding school which I attended at the age of eight divided itself into 'roundheads' and 'cavaliers'. There were fifteen in the dormitory: seven 'roundheads', seven 'cavaliers', and me. I fitted neither category, and was initially sought by each to make their number prevail over the other in the inevitable battles. I unwisely sought peace in a claim of neutrality, a stance which antagonised both factions and left me friendless. The resulting ostracisation was as inevitable as it was degrading.

Once puberty had passed, however, it became obvious that something was seriously amiss. A mistake must have been made during the operation, for the scar-line left by the action of the scissors went all the way down to the glans-rim and included a millimetre or so of the corona of the glans. I had been unaware of this before puberty, for the severed skin had still covered the majority of the still tiny and relatively insensitive glans most of the time, and I had experienced no especial discomfort. With puberty, however, things now became very different, for the glans grows of its own accord, but the foreskin grows mainly as a result of stretching by the glans. The much increased size of the glans had forced the remaining, now too small, foreskin downwards towards the under-side, where it remained even when the penis was fully flaccid, (not often, then), leaving the upper side permanently naked. The upper side of the glans was, thus, always in contact with my clothing, and I found that it was terribly sensitive in one particular spot, and the slightest rubbing against underwear caused torment. Later, I had an injury on my hand which damaged a nerve, and I immediately recognised the resulting hypersensitivity as being identical to the sensation that I experience from my glans.

I once used a pen to plot out the affected area. There is a lop-sided tear-drop shaped area which is totally numb; the point of the tear-drop is on the glans-rim where the scar cuts into it, and the bulk of it is to the left of centre, reaching about half-way to the tip. To the right is an uneven-shaped area which covers a little more of the glans-rim and extends further up towards the tip; this area is very sensitive indeed. Most of the surface of my glans is quite sensitive, just like everybody else; this bit is more so by perhaps twenty times. Contact with clothing causes discomfort. Occasional friction produces an incredibly uncomfortable continuous prickling crawling sensation. But if I am moving about in loose clothing, the continuous friction makes it seem as if my penis is on fire. I cannot use boxer shorts; I must choose underwear which allows no room for relative movement.

But the worst problem was sex, for the scissor-cut extended so far down that whenever I had an erection, the skin on the upper surface became quite taut, applying severe tension concentrated on the point where the scar cut into the glans-rim, the hypersensitive place. Remember that the under skin is quite loose, so the tension is all applied in this single spot. I never had a wet dream, the pain caused by the tension of erection would always wake me up first. Self masturbation was not too bad, for I would draw the skin forward as far as it would go to reduce the tension to a comfortable level, then rub the under-skin. But if I allowed a girl-friend to play with it, there was no way she could avoid hurting me. You have no idea how unromantic and off putting it is if you have to keep saying: "Ouch! Not that way, it hurts! Do it like this."

Intercourse carries its own special problems. The hypersensitivity is just tolerable in a well lubricated vagina, but any dryness is a total put-off. Full penetration inevitably causes the skin at the base of the penis to be drawn down, increasing the tension on the scar, and causing intense pain. I soon learnt to hold back, and not let my penis go in all the way so as to avoid the pain, but, at the critical moment, I would always lose control and push right in, causing every climax to be accompanied by a sharp stab of intense pain. Holding back from full penetration was frustrating for my partner also, for it meant that her clitoris did not get all the attention it craved, and she was often left unsatisfied.

But worse than any of these things is a little tiny presence, an undefinable nerve sensation, a cold pressure which registers deep in the base of the brain. Sometimes it is closer, sometimes further away, but always just hovering around the threshold of awareness. This constant presence never allows me to forget my damaged penis. It may be psychological, it may be a genuine physical phenomenon, but the effect of its constant presence throughout my waking hours is far far more than an annoyance, it is an indescribably subtle torture.

For me, then, orgasm and pain have become inseparable; this has resulted in some considerable psychological consequences. In particular, I have a profound fascination (obsession perhaps?), with the relationship between pain and pleasure, with sadomasochism, and also with sexual deprivation and enforced frustration. These things are so deeply ingrained in my soul now that I will never be without them, no matter what else happens. It has also led to an interest in, (and a profound sympathy with), the victims of ethnic female circumcision, as practised in parts of Africa, for I feel that their problems and experiences must be very similar to mine in many ways. I feel certain that they suffer the same problems of pain accompanying the sex act, of hypersensitivity and discomfort from clothing and that same nagging ever present coldness deep in the brain.

Having my complete foreskin present, despite its mutilated condition, meant that the possibility of reversal existed. Because of what had happened in my infancy, I have a profound mistrust in the medical profession, so it was D.I.Y. or nothing; I decided to try to work towards this end.

Testing carefully showed that my foreskin was not large enough to meet round the erect glans, it had not grown with the glans, but I had heard that the skin could be stretched. I used Micropore tape to hold the severed sides together for days and weeks at a time, removing it only for daily hygiene and sex, then replacing it again immediately afterwards. The skin does stretch; it could soon meet round the erect glans for at least half the length of the scar.

Meanwhile I had been reading all I could on the subject of circumcision reversal and on the anatomy of that area. I acquired some instruments, antiseptic lotion and anaesthetic spray, (Waspeeze). It took months to pluck up my courage, but eventually the great day arrived. I bathed in weak Dettol and washed down everything in sight in the bathroom with the nauseous stuff. I sprayed the area with Waspeeze; this was horrible because, although it is alright on normal skin, it burns terribly at first on the mucus membranes, and then everything goes numb a minute or two later. I sprayed on more Waspeeze and rubbed it well in.

The longitudinal line of the original dorsal slit became transverse under the normal tension of the skin and had healed to lie across my penis just behind the glans. The line I chose to cut along was parallel to and about 1mm away from this original scar, proximally (i.e. on the side towards my body, not on the glans side). I cut along about half of the length of the scar, working from the centre outwards, first to one side then to the other. The elastic membrane within was the most difficult part, being slippery and tough.

Perhaps I should explain that under the skin of the penis, between it and the shaft, are two layers of slippery elastic membrane, called fascia, like the cartilage in the joints, with a very slippery clear fluid between them. It is this which allows the friction-free motion of the foreskin. It is the lack of this membrane which causes any circumcision reversals which involve skin-grafts from elsewhere to fail. The only way to sever this membrane, I found, was to pick up a pinch of it with forceps, pass a needle through it, then to run a scalpel-blade firmly down the shaft of the needle; it is very tough indeed and very slippery. Having cut the skin apart, using monofilament nylon thread I sutured it together again the way it had originally been, thirty-five years before. Instead of a transverse scar line, I now had a short longitudinal one again, and a glans partly covered with foreskin.

Healing was slow and rather traumatic. One problem was frequent erections which threatened to open the stitches despite my preparatory stretching. Another was the tendency for the healing cut-lines on the inner and outer surfaces to adhere to each other. To prevent the adhesion problem, I had to pull the skin to and fro frequently, which tended to precipitate the erection problem. Eventually, when the healing had become reasonably stable, the stitches were removed. Four weeks after the operation, sex was resumed, very gingerly at first. It was not totally pain-free, because the scar was still tender, but the awful stabbing pain of tension onto the hypersensitive area of the glans was missing. It was a profound relief, but at first, such is the contrariness of the mind, I missed it; orgasm just did not seem complete without it!

With time, the skin, which was initially tight, has stretched further. If I pull it forward, it continues to cover the glans by about 60-70% when the penis is flaccid. When it is erect, the skin rolls back, staying back until I pull it forward again. I would very much like to complete the reversal, and have as nearly as possible a full foreskin. I would certainly like to get to the point where it rolls forward of its own accord after an erection subsides. The difficulties of achieving this, however, are not inconsiderable. I wonder if I will ever pluck up the necessary courage?

J.G. McCulloch

[Thanks, John, for your interesting and informative account. – T.A.]

Tight Foreskin Relieved

Dear Tony: I was very grateful for the exceptionally fullsome article of John McC's on infibulation in Issue 7/89. I think that if I had had a slave in ancient times I would have fastened the ring or rings of the foreskin to some similar ring in part of the belly-button, thereby keeping the cock nicely upright and ensuring clear exposure of the balls.

I have written earlier regarding my once so very tight foreskin and how by perseverance and daily exercise in the last year or two I have loosened it to a point at which the foreskin will retract right back to base at body with no problem or discomfort and looks as though I am completely circumcised. Now, with my shaft and glans bared and delightfully sensitive I can enjoy the most fantastic masturbation with long distant ejaculation. With the skin turned under behind the glans rim it will stay permanently retracted, and I keep the glans fully uncovered at all times. I now seem to have the best of both worlds of cavalier and roundhead.

I have removed much of the hair around the base of my cock and the ball sack. I have done this using cream hair remover (which can sting), by shaving, or, best of all, by plucking the hairs – a very erotic sensation. As a result the cock and balls look larger and the ball sack has the feel of soft silk.

I am still very keen to correspond with any member on the subject of piercings and decorations although it is rumoured that the police have brought charges of aiding and abetting actual bodily harm to oneself. I have no wish to be involved in any form of illegal practice. Can you clarify this situation? For example, I hear that 'Scimitar' is closing down.

Yours sincerely, D.N. – Deal

'Aiding And Abetting Grievous Bodily Harm On Himself'

Thanks for your interesting letter D.N., and congratulations on the improvements you have been able to make. Regarding your final question, I think you are referring to the report (Independent, 19.9.1990) that Scotland Yard's Obscene Publications Branch had brought charges against 16 men after a two-year 'Operation Spanner' investigation. It is not clear that the 16 were acting together or were connected with each other, and there was a diverse range of charges, including 'running a disorderly house' and 'distribution of indecent material'. But what was legally interesting was the inclusion of charges of 'aiding and abetting grievous (or in another case 'actual') bodily harm on himself', 'aiding and abetting an assault', 'conspiracy to commit assaults', plus 'actual bodily harm' and 'grievous bodily harm'.

In English law consent is normally a defence against a charge of assault (for example, a rugby tackle is not an assault on the playing field but is on the street). So charges of assault against oneself are rare, but can be brought under the 1861 Offences Against the Person Act, usually if injuries were allegedly inflicted for a false insurance claim. It is well known, for example, that 'conspiracy' can be a way of widening the scope of the law to catch statements or publications describing an act which would not itself be illegal, or impose penalties for 'conspiring' more extensive than those for the performance of the act contemplated. So far as is known, the cases have not yet been brought to trial, and it is therefore not possible to say how many or which of these accusations have been substantiated, or whether the courts have accepted that such charges can be brought. All a bit legalistic perhaps, but the implications for the piercing scene are alarming and uncertain, at least until the charges are upheld or rejected.

T.A.

Lubrication

Dear Tony: Thanks for issue 3/90, which, as ever, is very interesting. In response to R.W. – Sussex, and to the article on auto-lubrication, I have found while observing myself masturbating that I have been able to produce three degrees of lubrication following the prolonged titillation which you mention. The first is a clear, somewhat sticky liquid. When feelings of orgasm start just a few drops of a thin pale blue liquid appear, about the colour and consistency of the dregs of milk in the bottom of a milk bottle. I imagine that this pale blue fluid is likely to neutralise any acid, as it tastes distinctly alkaline and almost immediately precedes the semen. Further stimulation produces orgasm and the normal creamy ejaculate. But unless the stimulation is prolonged, the amount of initial lubrication is insufficient to wet the knob. In my prime I could never rely on it solely to complete the exercise as it dried out in a few rubs.

The production of all emissions declines slowly with age, in my case, although a 'normal' ejaculate is usual provided the resources are not called on too frequently, say twice in 48 hours and then abstinence for about a fortnight. Prolonged stimulation, mental and/or physical, still produces the clear fluid in excess of that produced by a straight rub up. I agree with the old theologian's observation that a mental content is usually necessary. I am circumcised, so observation is accurate and easy. Incidentally, I find that the sulcus behind the glans rim produces some moistness. If confined by an uncut foreskin this would presumably add to the general lubrication of the glans.

I find a little soy edible oil is excellent for prolonged stimulation. It is clean, long-lasting and is easily cleaned up afterwards. Being edible it is harmless, nor is it absorbed.

Sincerely, Henry – Colchester

Seen In The Sauna

Dear Tony: Although I am still a cavalier, the subject of circumcision has always fascinated me. I have read everything I could find on the subject and considered myself fairly knowledgeable. But when I purchased Circumcision: an Ethnomedical Study I found the answers to many things that had mystified me, or found that I had jumped to totally wrong pre-conceived conclusions. It was the best value I had ever had for £20.

Other Acorn members may be interested in an incident which occurred some 20 years ago. Two men arranged to meet for the first time in our local sauna, where they sat on an upper bench which gave everyone a good view. Initially their conversation was polite and covered general topics. One kept staring at the other's circumcised penis, and then remarked: "I just can't get over it. It is so beautiful." This remark was openly addressed in a loud voice with a sweeping glance around which virtually invited everyone to have a good look and see if they agreed. But there was not a flicker of reaction to what was doubtless considered an offensive remark in a straight sauna. But what was he saying? His friend's penis was truly a work of surgical art, and it was a mirror image of his own. Although very different in build, their genitals were so alike and so unusual that in this respect they could have been twins. I have never seen anything so beautiful, either before or since, and the image remains very vivid in my memory.

They were also unusual in wanting people to stare. Does any adult male who has only recently been circumcised feel that all eyes are on his penis when he first goes nude in public? Have other readers felt exhibitionist urges just after surgery? The two glamour boys I speak of certainly did, and must have been disappointed when no-one showed the slightest overt interest. Most of us almost accept that a permanently exposed head is natural and forget that any surgery was involved.

But in the hot room I later observed just why they were so unusual. On the upper side of the shaft the skin was tight as a drum: very erotic. But the underside had received the brunt of the surgeon's knife, although there was not the hint of a scar to prove it: neither of them had a frenulum. Where others have a thin membrane of loose skin attached to the apex of the cleavage, these two had a deep clean tight cleavage. It was so deep that I am convinced that they had been cut right through to open the urethra, perhaps to where a Prince Albert ring had been. There was no visible circumcision scar, and they must have been cut close in under the head, with the original shaft skin tailored and stitched to fit. They looked so clean and so natural that it was impossible to imagine that they had not been born like that. In both cases the head was a very different skin colour from the shaft. This was accentuated, since it looked as though they had rubbed on oil or moisturising cream, which made the head look shiny and the skin tissue thin and almost transparent. By contrast, other circumcised men had tough weather-beaten heads of similar colour and texture to the shaft, which made me think that the two men who were attracting my attention had been circumcised recently.

That was not all. Their scrotums, even in the heat of the sauna, seemed unnaturally tight and held their testicles proud and high. The testicles were over-generously large, but the scrotum had not developed enough to accommodate them. Huge adult testicles were bursting to escape from a pre-adolescent tight scrotum. Even loose trousers would not have concealed their bulging crutchiness. Although totally nude they looked as though they were wearing invisible scrotal supports. They were in their prime when I saw them, but such perfection would last a lifetime.

L.J. – Glasgow

BUFF

Dear Acorn: Through your columns, may I commend the services of BUFF [a US organisation which was concerned with foreskin stretching; the initials stood for Brothers United for Future Foreskins and it was active in the 1970s, but I have not heard of it recently. – T.A.] to those of your more intense readers who get their jollies from contemplating the act rather than the condition of circumcision.

As you know, BUFF exists to restore a rough approximation of the foreskin to a circumcised penis through an uncomfortable and long-winded stretching procedure using surgical tape.

Just think, your lucky lads will be able, after savouring a year or two of acute discomfort, to reconstruct their loathsome foreskins, and then – can any greater joy exist? – they can hack the damned thing off again!

R.B.W. – Bedford

PS. You know, Tony, I almost think some of your headbangers will take this letter seriously – if you have the bottle to print it!

[So, what editor could refuse a challenge like that? – T.A.]

More Wanted On Experience Before And After Circumcision

Dear Tony: I salute the magnificent work you have done with Acorn, but I've been a little disappointed with the content this year. For me there are too many long-winded accounts of how the writer was circumcised, and not enough variety of opinion and comparison of pros and cons, such as a questionnaire to the circumcised, probing the ways they think they have benefited or not. It would be particularly interesting to have the views of those done as adults and thus able to make a good comparison. There must be many men who have toyed with the idea of circumcision, as I have, but who would not want to sacrifice the foreskin for an inferior situation.

Yours sincerely, M.L. – Gwent

Long Articles

Dear Tony: Just a quick letter this time. I am most impressed with the recent newsletters, first 'The Circumcision Master' and then 'A Trip to Ankara'. The Ankaran adventure is a definite high spot and an even bigger turn-on! It sounds very realistic and I hope it is true! I notice that he says he will think about the sunnet, but he is so intrigued that he is back at the barber's the next day. I'm sure that is how I would have been: tremendously excited and not able to stay away! What a joy it would have been, too, to see the twins receive their birthday presents.

Thanks, M.H. – Ilford

In Praise Of The Foreskin

Dear Tony: I cannot understand the preference of most of your readers for the circumcised penis. I and many of my friends, male and female, find it boring and too standardised. One is just like another, and they all might well be made of plastic.

The only reason for circumcision which may still be valid is cleanliness, but most of us wash the penis at least once a day (or don't we?) [Probably only very few men wash it more than twice a week, and fewer still pull back the foreskin to wash under it. – T.A.]

It never gets dry, though there doesn't have to be the slime which some people mention, and it can ejaculate with the skin either up or down. There are also vastly more ways of wanking with a foreskin than with a roundhead.

My own foreskin will still cover the glans 100% when stiff if I want, and I can roll it up and back at will. I'm told that it looks elegant, and that for fellatio it is interesting and far superior.

The uncircumcised penis has so many moods and shapes which the roundhead can't touch: crumpled like a bud when cold, soft when flaccid, at its most beautiful when half erect (in my view), and superb when fully up.

I could go on and on; but if anyone is interested, would they please get in touch with:

P.B. – London NW

For Sale

From the Editor. Prices include postage and secure packing.

By Rites a Man

A summary of the long chapter in Robert Daniels' PhD study of initiation of adolescent males among the Kipsigis of Kenya, including his description of the two-stage circumcision as one of the main ordeals. 25 page typescript. £3

Keyo Initiation

F.B. Welbourn's article in the Journal of Religion in Africa which mainly comprises D.K. Kiprono's first hand account of his circumcision and other ordeals when he was initiated as a schoolboy in 1958. 10 pages. £1.50

The Dangerous Journey

A 17 page summary of Andre Droogers' description and analysis of boys' initiation among the Wagenia of Kisangani, Zaire. Every seven years or so boys and young men are circumcised in groups in a three-stage operation beside the Zaire (formerly Congo) river in celebrations which last almost five months and involve the whole tribal group. 17 page typescript. £2.20

Circumcision: an ethnomedical study

200 pages covering origins, motives, methods, evolution of special instruments, traditional and tribal ceremonies, case histories. Illustrated. £20

Masturbation Survey

The Danish magazine Press, in its May 1990 number, wrote of masturbation as 'the last taboo' and asked readers to complete a questionnaire. Many of the questions raised may be of interest to Acorn readers, so we are carrying a similar questionnaire and look forward to receiving some interesting replies or correspondence from readers on this theme.

Your age.

When did you first masturbate? Under 10/10-15/15-20/over 20.

How often do you masturbate? Several times daily/Daily/Twice per week/Several times per month/Once a month/Less often.

When you have a steady partner, do you masturbate More/Less/As often?

Do you masturbate more at some times than at others? Yes/No.

If yes, in what circumstances?

When you masturbate, for how long do you do it? <5 minutes/5-15 minutes/15-30 minutes/30-60 minutes/longer.

When you masturbate, do you have an orgasm? Always/usually/sometimes/never.

If you reach orgasm, how many orgasms do you have? Once/Twice/Three times/More.

Where do you masturbate? In bed/In the bathroom/In the toilet/On a chair/On the floor/Outside/Elsewhere?

When do you feel like masturbating, and what gives you the feeling?

What excites you when you masturbate? Fantasies or day dreams/Photos or magazines/Drawings/Written descriptions/Something else – what?

Try to describe the fantasies or day-dreams/photos or magazines/drawings/written descriptions which excite you most.

Do you hide your drawings/pictures/descriptions? Yes/No.

Do you watch pornographic films/videos? Yes/No.

If so, how frequently? Frequently/sometimes/occasionally.

What fantasies do you have? Previous experiences relived/sex with the other sex/sex with the same sex/group sex/sadomasochism/violent sex/anal sex/oral sex/other.

Describe, if you can, an especially exciting fantasy.

If you have a lover, do you think of him/her when you masturbate? Always/Usually/Sometimes/Never.

What do you use to masturbate with? Hands/bedding/shower/vibrator/lubricants/other.

Which part(s) of your penis do you find the most sensitive to stimulation?

If a cavalier, what use do you make of your foreskin when masturbating?

When masturbating, do you stimulate other areas than you penis?

If so, which: balls/anus/stomach/nipples/face/other.

Are you naked when you masturbate? Yes/No/Sometimes.

If not, do you dress in a special way, and if so, how?

Do you masturbate with other people? Yes/No.

If so, who with? Lover/Friend(s) of own sex/Friend of opposite sex.

Do you think of masturbation as a substitute for sex? Yes/No.

How does a masturbating orgasm compare with an orgasm in intercourse? Better/Same/Worse/Different – how?

How do you feel when you have masturbated? Relaxed/Energetic/Happy/
Pleased/Tired/Depressed/Ashamed/How else?

What do you do with your ejaculate (semen)?

Have you talked about masturbation with your lover? Yes/No.

If you have, what did you talk about?

If not, why not?

Have you talked about masturbation with other people? Yes/No.

If you have, who with? Parents/Friend(s) of own/opposite sex/Others – who?

If you have, what did you talk about?

If you have not, why not?

Describe how you like best to masturbate.

ACORN

1990 Issue No 6

(Formerly Issue X)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Four Skin	Anthony	Page 2
Revisions	P.D.	Page 4
The Roman God Priapus	H.S.	Page 6
On Feeling The Odd One Out	W.H.	Page 8
Silly Cock-Ups		Page 9
Same-Day Surgery Could Cut
Waiting Lists By One-Fifth		Page 9
Observations	Anthony	Page 10
Observations 2		Page 11
Circumcisions Save Bunnies!		Page 11
Masturbation Survey: Reply 1	E.L.	Page 12
Masturbation Survey: Reply 2	Anon	Page 13
Bridegroom	Inuvik	Page 13

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

This is Issue 6/90, once again full of correspondence and news of priapic and phallic interest, including plenty to delight foreskin fans and circumcision enthusiasts. Many thanks to all our contributors, and please keep your offers flowing in. But please ensure that your name and full postal address are included with contributions. If you do not wish to receive correspondence, that wish will be respected. But we have had a string of rather similar letters from the Hertfordshire area written over pseudonyms, which have stayed fairly low in priority for inclusion because there is no address for replies and there is a boring similarity in their opposition to circumcision.

Thanks for offers to help with distribution. A new system comes into operation with this issue. We have done our best to ensure that all goes smoothly and that your copy of Acorn reaches you without difficulty. But please let your Editor know if any problem arises.

T.A.

Four Skin

At secondary school Philip enjoyed most subjects except physical training. He didn't mind the exercise: aboard a boat he revelled in it almost to the point of exhaustion, so that wasn't the problem. It was the compulsory shower afterwards that he feared, right from the start.

As an only child, Philip was completely unused to being naked in front of other children, even other boys. Until secondary school there had not been much of a problem. Even then, it was only after he slipped on some soap in the shower that he kept on his glasses, and for the first time could see the other boys as other than a blur. He found it a daunting experience. Blushingly self-conscious, he tried to hide himself with a towel, but this just put off the inevitable. In the shower he no longer escaped the prying eyes. Within that steamy atmosphere he also discovered that he was unlike all the other boys except his friend David. Among all the slippery boys' bodies wriggling in and out of the sprinkling water, his cock looked different. The others seemed assured in their collective likeness, assured enough to make sniggering remarks to Philip. One asked, "Are you Jewish?". It was an unexpected question, and he did not know how to reply.

From then on Philip, like David, picked a secluded corner of the changing room; but they still had to run the gauntlet of whispers and stares on the way to and from the shower. Now that everyone knew, there was no point in trying to hide his cock with a towel. He hated feeling more exposed than anyone else, hated those other slithering bodies and the shame they made him feel, and most of all hated not knowing what had been done or why.

"I never thought there would be anything else", he confided in David, "but they always find something to embarrass you. I just didn't know anything was missing."

"That's bad, not knowing. I'm Jewish, so it's talked about at home. It's a small thing done to a baby, required by our law, a token of acceptance, like your Christening. Don't let the others get you down. They don't know any better."

In the dining room they all quickly cleared their plates of meat pie, peas and chips. It was the sweet that ended on a sour note for Philip. A bowl of prunes was put in front of each of them, with a jug of custard in front of the monitor. The custard was thick and lumpy, with a heavy skin on top. The monitor's job was to share round the custard. At Philip's table the monitor was Christopher Brown. He really hated Philip and took every opportunity to insult him. Sharing out the custard gave him another chance. Walking round the table, he counted each ladled delivery – "One skin", to Julie Grant. "Two skin", for himself. "Three skin", for David Levene. Pausing at Philip's plate, he smirked and tilted the ladle, with the inevitable "Four skin", called out louder than before; quite loud enough for everyone to hear, including the girls. Philip coloured with embarrassment. "What's the matter?", Christopher Brown said with a leer. "I thought you could do with some."

Philip told his father how he felt hated at school: in class, in the shower, in the dining room. The others made him feel friendless, ashamed, and isolated. He related the custard incident, adding: "Why couldn't you have told me about my operation? I just didn't know. I found that I was unlike anyone except David."

"Son", said Bill, "I wanted to. But when I was going to, in the end I didn't because I didn't want to reopen family differences. I just hoped the Bible would explain it to you."

"The Bible?" asked Philip. "What's that got to do with it?"

Bill reached to the bookcase in the dayroom part of the wheelhouse, took out the seldom-used Bible, turned over the first few pages, and handed it to his son. "It's here in the Moses story", said Bill, "Well after the bulrushes bit, and his marriage to Ziporah." "Crikey Moses", quipped Philip.

"Here, son, Exodus, chapter four, verses 25 and 26. You'll see what it's all about there." Philip read the small print slowly: "During the journey, while they were camped for the night, the Lord met Moses, meaning to kill him, but Ziporah picked up a sharp flint, cut off her son's foreskin and touched him with it, saying, 'You are my blood bridegroom.' So the Lord let Moses alone. Then she said, 'Blood-bridegroom by circumcision'." Philip passed the heavy book back to his father. "But that was done by a woman with a flint, and to her own son. How awful."

"At least you were luckier", said Bill, glad that he had thought of using the Bible story when his son broached the topic. "They don't use flints in the National Health Service. It was something that had to be done. The Jews think of it as a covenant, a contract with God. That goes back to Abraham the founder of the Jewish race. It's in Genesis 17. Let me see if I can find it. Here: "God said to Abraham, 'For your part, you must keep my covenant, you and your descendants after you, generation by generation. This is how you shall keep my covenant between myself and you and your descendants after you: circumcise yourselves, every male among you. You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and it shall be the sign of the covenant between us. Every male among you, in every generation, shall be circumcised on the eighth day, both those born in your house and any foreigner not of your blood but bought with your money. Circumcise both those born in your house and those bought with your money; thus shall my covenant be marked in your flesh as an everlasting covenant. Every uncircumcised male, everyone who has not had the flesh of his foreskin circumcised, shall be cut off from the kin of his father. He has broken my covenant.' ... Then Abraham took Ishmael his son, everyone who had been born in his household and everyone bought with money, every male in his household, and he circumcised them that very same day in the flesh of their foreskins as God had told him to do. Abraham was ninety nine years old when he circumcised the flesh of his foreskin. Ishmael was thirteen years old when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. Both Abraham and Ishmael were circumcised on the same day, and all the men of his household, born in the house or bought with money from foreigners, were circumcised with him."

"I remember you being well and truly stitched up, and the family doctor telling your mother and I what a neat job it was. As you know, we are not Jewish, but your mother believes very strongly in doing what it says in the Bible, and she said that the command couldn't be clearer, and that God's covenant with Abraham ought to cover you too. There was no arguing with her. At least you now know that David is like you, and you are only different from the others because of a little operation, so don't let it worry you."

Anthony – North Devon

Revisions

Dear Tony: Like your correspondent T.J. (issue 3/90), I was not circumcised as a lad, and by the age of eight was fascinated with the differences I saw around me in the changing rooms. About half my London prep-school mates were circumcised and I envied them their dry smell-free knobs. I tried all sorts of ways to keep my rather short foreskin behind my knob, but to no avail, until I started to go out with my second girl-friend (to whom I am still happily married, 27 years later). I kept on having such massive erections while kissing and cuddling that my foreskin gave up the battle and stayed back thereafter! About five years after we were married I had a vasectomy under local anaesthetic, and that must have reawakened my desire to have myself circumcised: about two years after the vasectomy I experimented with small cuts to the foreskin, with and without stitching, to see how painful it might be and how quickly it would heal. At the same time I read in all the three local medical libraries to see what was said about circumcision techniques. The reading convinced me that some version of the cuff resection method would give the most accurate result, but it scared me with stories of the frenal artery. So in my first attempt, slowly and painfully, with sharp scissors, I removed a crescent of foreskin about 35 mm thick on the topside, narrowing to zero at the frenulum, and leaving about 15 mm of inner foreskin on the top. I stitched with nylon sutures and, apart from a haematoma (bruise and swelling caused by bleeding below the skin) on the right, healed rapidly enough to have intercourse two weeks later.

As will be obvious to readers, I left myself with a sag on the underside and about 10 mm of inner foreskin on the topside beyond the natural fold that is found in all uncircumcised, about 5 mm from the glans. When erect the topside was reasonably tight, but when flaccid and particularly when sitting, the topside folded forward to a concertina behind the glans rim. My wife, who did not know what I had done, did not notice any difference from the previously permanently retracted foreskin, but I found intercourse more pleasurable as my foreskin did not form a ramp behind my glans on the outstroke. Masturbation was more difficult than before.

In the next year or two I realized how to mark up my penis for a more accurate job. I also realized that for those of us uncircumcised in infancy the tendency of the remaining inner foreskin to fold forward into the coronal sulcus or over the glans was uncorrectable. To have enough shaft skin to cover 100 mm of erect shaft must mean folds 30–50 mm long in the flaccid, sitting state. The first place that folding occurs in those not circumcised in infancy is the one immediately behind the glans. I also found that the cause of my haematoma was a small superficial artery that ran from the topside of my penis at its base in a half spiral toward the very tip of the frenulum, so I began to suspect that either my frenal artery was misplaced, or that it was part of medical lore rather than anatomical fact.

When the next operative opportunity presented itself, just over three years after the first, I marked a line about 10 mm from and parallel to the glans on my inner foreskin, and with my penis erect pulled the remaining skin to a comfortable tension and drew another line 10 mm from the glans. The two lines enclosed the first scar line and a band of inner and outer foreskin about 5 mm wide on the top and 30 mm wide at the frenulum. Without anaesthetic again, but with a tourniquet, cutting was less bloody, and less painful except at the frenulum, than the first time. Healing was rapid and uneventful except for a haematoma again on the right. The scar line disappeared within a couple of years, but the remaining inner foreskin remained pinker and paler than the outer foreskin. There was a small bulge on the underside when flaccid but when erect the whole shaft was uniformly tensioned, vindicating the accuracy of the marking out.

However, matters did not rest there, as subsequent fruitless attempts with a vacuum penis enlarger only succeeded in stretching the remaining inner foreskin to 15 mm from the glans and resulted in a foreskin collar rolling over the back of my glans for the first time for 18 years. So two years later I marked a line along the natural fold line 5 mm from the back of the glans and a parallel one behind the scar line, measured to give drum-tight tension when erect. The skin on the fold was much thicker and more sensitive than any I had cut before, so I can see why conventional circumcisions do not get as close to the glans as that. Healing was as rapid as usual (stitches out after four days) and this time I photographed the process in colour. The result was drum-tight as planned, but now, six years later, I notice the inner foreskin has stretched a couple of millimetres.

So as a result of these experiences, I must conclude that those circumcised late in life (after puberty, if not older than 2 or 3 years old) will run the risk of their remaining inner foreskin rolling over the glans in the flaccid state unless it is made as short as possible, preferably less than 10 mm from the glans. I would be interested in others' observations on this dividing characteristic between those circumcised in infancy and those done as adults.

P.D. – Dublin

The Roman God Priapus

Dear Sir: Congratulations on filling an information gap on a subject which loads of people are interested in but few will admit to. I recently found a book of Roman erotica, the pictures in which make it very clear that not only was circumcision unknown to the Romans, but also that they took a delight in excessive foreskin development.

It would appear that they found the sight of the bare glans a definite turn-off, since they portray time and again exceptionally long foreskins, even when the phallus is erect, when you'd expect the foreskin to slide back to some extent. The most impressive is a wall painting of the god Priapus sporting an enormous cylindrical cock with a swollen knob: this bulges out a narrow foreskin which hangs below his knees. He is weighing this fearsome weapon on a balance. There is another statue of the same god with a huge hard on, and once again he has a long hose of foreskin swinging on the end.

Another picture depicts a bronze of a young lad with a dirty grin on his face looking down at his powerful erection, which resembles a plump pork sausage pressed against his belly. Once again his knob is clearly defined through the long tight foreskin extending to a terminal bud. There are pictures of three other bronzes with large well-depicted penises, all equipped with unusually long tassels of foreskin extending beyond their knobs. I read somewhere that the Romans used to cultivate their foreskins by stretching them, and that would explain the case of one of the bronzes where the foreskin is ridiculously long, once again hanging down to the knees.

This is of particular interest to me since my own foreskin is on the short side, barely covering the knob when flaccid and retreating all the way with the merest hint of a hard on. This is a disappointment to me and also to my girl friend, who declares that she dearly loves to peel back a tight foreskin from a powerful hard on. So I've been trying to stretch the old 'pullover' by threading it through a half inch rubber ring, in the manner of a serviette ring, and leaving it all day with a good couple of inches of loose skin hanging off the end. It looks a bit of a giggle, but it seems to work for about half an hour only after I remove the ring, before it shrinks to its normal position. Can anyone advise me on a way of lengthening it permanently? And can someone more learned than I tell us more about the Romans and their attitude to foreskins and circumcision?

H.S. – Harrow

[Thanks, H.S., for your letter. Can you tell us the name of the book where you saw these pictures, its author, and when it was published? Then we could share your interest. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary tells us that Priapus was (1) the Greek and Roman god of procreation, and so of gardens, vineyards, etc. Hence (2) a statue or image of the god which was often placed in gardens to protect them from depredators or as a scarecrow (a usage dating from as late as 1632). (3) the word was used to mean a phallus or (1613) a drinking vessel of phallic shape. The derivative Priapism refers pathologically to a persistent erection of the penis; and also to mean licentiousness or intentional indecency, both literally and, from 1758, figuratively. The statuettes would obviously use a monstrous penis to make it clear what they were representing.

The Roman medical writer and physician Celsus gives a description of an operation to 'uncircumcise' a patient by trying to recreate a foreskin. It involved cutting round at the sulcus, pulling the skin forward to cover the glans, and bandaging it firmly in place until it healed in its new position. While this would provide a covering, of a sort, for the glans, it would not be retractable in the normal way. But presumably there was sufficient demand from patients to make it worth including in his text-book. They would probably be Jews or others from the eastern Roman provinces who wished to pass for Romans on the sports field or in the bath-house.

From 168 AD King Antiochus IV tried to impose Greek culture on the province of Judah. Observance of Jewish religious laws, including circumcision, was punished by death. While the number of applicants for Celsus' operation must have increased, so did Jewish resistance. From then on, a second stage was added to the Jewish operation: after the foreskin had been pulled forward and cut off, the inner skin was torn down and turned back so that the glans would always remain fully exposed, a feature of the Jewish ritual procedure which is still retained.

To ensure that their foreskins remained in place, Romans used to infibulate the youths attending the public schools, as well as the actors, dancers, and choristers who were sold to the directors of plays and spectacles (i.e. circuses). Small statues still exist representing infibulated musicians, remarkable for the excessive size of the ring (through their foreskins) and the leanness of the persons to which they are attached. Remondino, in his 1891 History of Circumcision (p.59) tells us that 'the mode of applying this ring did not differ much from the usual method of preparing the ear for pendants.'

He goes on to tell us that 'Among the Greek monks, the infibulation serves a manifold purpose; it not only is a sure badge of chastity, but its weight and size is very often increased so as to render it an instrument of penitence, and considerable rivalry exists at times in this regard.' He also mentions that the Hindu 'fakir at times submits to infibulation at the same time as he takes his vows of chastity. This ring is at times enormous, being sometimes six inches in diameter, so that it is a burden. These saints are held in great esteem and veneration.' Presumably the skills of actors, dancers and chorister were thought to be helped by ensuring their inability to perform sexually, either in coitus or in masturbation. But wearing a heavy ring in a pierced foreskin would be one way of extending the foreskin. – T.A.]

On Feeling The Odd One Out

Dear Tony: I had experiences in my childhood and youth much like R.B.W. of Bedford. He was perceived by his peers, and so by himself, as mutilated and deficient because he was circumcised. I experienced similar teasing and ridicule during my childhood here in the USA, but in my case it was because I was not circumcised. Therefore, in the perception of my peers, and in mine too, my cock was abnormal, dirty and stinky.

When I was five or six the older sister of a boy I often played with wanted to see my penis. She said that she would show me her 'pee hole' if I would show her my cock. I was reluctant, but her brother said he was not afraid, and showed her his penis. She fondled his circumcised penis, making it grow hard. I then showed her mine. She said, "Yours does not have any head on it." I pulled my foreskin back to show her that mine did indeed have a head. She was repelled by what she saw and smelled, and ran away without touching my penis or showing me her 'hole'. Her brother had told me about girls' genitals, and I really wanted to see her hole.

On a later occasion I was caught by a gang of older boys. Being bigger than me, they easily held me down. Then they pulled my pants and underpants down, and started making remarks about how ugly my penis was. There were girls in the gang, and they gathered round and looked too. I was very embarrassed, especially when they fondled my penis and it got hard. They called my foreskin 'ugly baby fat', and pulled it back to expose my glans. This released an odour which they all made nasty remarks about.

The gang leader was rather a bully. He pulled back so hard on my foreskin that the end of my glans pointed at right angles to my shaft. This hurt. It hurt even more, however – almost more than I could stand – when he started rubbing my exposed glans. I started to cry, and one of the girls said "Let him go. We have seen enough of his cock – it's ugly and it stinks." One of the boys said, "Let's cut that baby fat off and make a man of him." Another said, "Naa, we don't want to get blood all over the place." They let me go, but made it very clear that if I told anyone what they had done, they would catch me and cut off my cock. As I ran away the bully leader yelled after me to go home and clean my stinking cock. After that, whenever he saw me he called me 'Stinky'. Other picked it up. How I hated the nickname, 'Stinky'.

Throughout my youth I tried never to let anyone see my cock. I avoided sports because of the shower room. When I became 21 I circumcised myself. Since then I have had a clean, odourless, attractive, larger than average cock that others could envy rather than disparage. No longer do I feel the odd one out.

W.H. – U.S.A.

Silly Cock-Ups

A review by Miles Copeland of The Imperfect Spies: the History of Israeli Intelligence by Yossi Melman and Dan Raviv in the Daily Telegraph of 6.1.90 reports that some Mossad agents have undergone reverse circumcision to support their cover stories. The reader who sent in this cutting comments: I thought the Jewish operation was so effective that later 'rectification' was impossible. Evidently not!

Same-Day Surgery Could Cut Waiting Lists By One-Fifth

Waiting lists for operations could be cut by up to one-fifth if more surgical patients were admitted and discharged on the same day, according to the Audit Commission. It has concluded that between 100,000 and 200,000 people could be removed from waiting lists if all hospitals followed best practice in twenty procedures dealing with, for example, hernias, varicose veins and circumcision. The commission's backing for greatly increased 'day-case surgery', in a report due out in October, will be popular with the Government, which has made waiting list cuts a central policy objective.

Independent, 1 October 1990

Observations

I have tabulated observations of 45 penes observed in school and leisure situations. My entire class of 36 at school were observed (some years ago) at ages 14-16; the remainder were aged 20 to 55, all white gentile males, of whom only two had been mohel circumcised. Sixteen of the 45 (36 per cent) were circumcised. The size distribution was as follows:

- 5 (11%) small.                      60% of small penes were circumcised.
- 7 (16%) small to average.
- 21 (46%) average:                33% of average-sized penes were circumcised.
- 3 (7%) average to well-endowed.
- 9 (20%) well-endowed: 44% of these were circumcised.

The extent of flaccid glans coverage in the uncircumcised was also variable:

- 1 with 30% coverage    }
- 1 with 40% coverage    }    10% at or less than half covered.
- 1 with 50% coverage    }
- 1 with 90% coverage
- 9 with 100% coverage   }
- 9 with 10% overhang    }    83% with full cover or overhang.
- 6 with 20% overhang    }
- 1 with more than 20% overhang

Most had an average skin thickness, but 8% had thin and membranous foreskins and 10% had thick, fleshy ones.

Two circumcised had partial glans cover, of 10% and 20% respectively; in both cases the organs were exceedingly underdeveloped. In my class at a selective secondary school, 45% were circumcised. In my nephew's, two decades later, 9% are circumcised.

Other less complete observations take the total to just over 100. Work acquaintances (mainly professional) were 24% circumcised, whereas outside acquaintances (mainly non professional) had a circumcision rate of only 15%. Of personal friends, 21% were circumcised, confirmed visually in two-thirds of instances. Two actually asked for an examination: one had an exceedingly short foreskin and was unsure of his status, and the other, circumcised at nine years of age after a tree fall, was concerned about a retained suture.

I discovered during showers at school that modesty towels were used mainly by the circumcised and those with small penes, whether clipped or not. Also the bared glans is exposed in urinal stalls more discretely, and with a modesty bordering on embarrassment. It is the cavalier who makes exhibitionism an art-form, with frequent adjustments prior to urination, the pinched tip splashing, and with a concluding orgy of sleeve-shaking. The latter is so commonplace that roundheads do likewise so as not to be thought circumcised for lack of shaking.

In my generation at school, short trousers were worn into teen-age years, and access for urination was overwhelmingly via a pulled-up right trouser-leg. Repeated stretching to the right caused the penis to veer in that direction. Although this fashion no longer holds, penis-handling – especially masturbation – is a right-handed affair.

Anthony – Devon

Observations 2

A visit to the swimming pool yielded the following observations:

- (1) a boy of 14, with well developed pubic hair, neatly circumcised, without visible scar.
- (2) his slightly older brother, with a slightly larger penis, complete with foreskin offering  $11/10$  coverage despite loose opening.
- (3) a boy of 11, circumcised with evident scar visible well back along the shaft, no pubic hair but well endowed for his age.
- (4) his father, fairly small penis, tightly circumcised.
- (5) an Asian boy of about 5, circumcised but with a prominent collar of skin surrounding his small glans.
- (6) a white boy of similar age, circumcised tightly, with his bright red glans and a little pink inner foreskin contrasting sharply with the paler skin of his shaft and body.
- (7) his rather corpulent father, early 40s, also circumcised, with short flaccid foreskin.
- (8) a man in his 30s, slim, well endowed, foreskin giving  $11/10$  coverage to his glans, the rim of which nevertheless showed prominently.
- (9) a very corpulent man, late 40s, minuscule uncircumcised penis – indeed, almost the only thing visible was the loose end of his foreskin.

Overall score: 6 circumcised, 3 uncircumcised.

Circumcisions Save Bunnies!

Medical researchers in Massachusetts have found that new formulations of drugs or cosmetics don't have to be tested on rabbits or other laboratory animals. Hitherto the standard test has been to drop the substance to be tested into the eyes of laboratory animals and study the adverse effects, if any. Now they have found that foreskins removed at circumcision can be kept alive, grown as tissue culture and used in similar tests.

Independent, September 1990

Masturbation Survey: Reply 1

I first masturbated to spunk ejaculation at age 12. I masturbate as often when I'm alone as when I have a steady partner, more when my partner is having her period.

I masturbate most days after work before going home for 5-15 minutes, mostly in car in lay-by on the way home at the end of the working day, after visiting the toilet in the lay-by, where I can see other blokes' cocks at the urinal and look to see if they are circumcised or not; sometimes I go to orgasm, which is single.

My fantasy is of group sex with a willing female who likes blokes with hard erect cocks standing around her wanking whilst one of them fucks her doggy-fashion.

A friend has a collection of magazines showing large cocks being sucked and in various fucking positions in a forest. I sometimes imagine a group of blokes with large cocks engaging in various sex activities leading to a slow fuck of each other, not necessarily to ejaculation, and then entering a woman who likes group activity. I sometimes think of my partner while I masturbate. But I don't think of masturbation as a substitute for sex.

Some weekends I lubricate my cock with soya oil and masturbate slowly with my hands. I find a full grip along my shaft and holding my balls away from me the most stimulating. I have a permanently retracted foreskin and use my thumb to slide it over my knob when masturbating. I am not usually naked, but do not dress in any unusual way. I occasionally masturbate with a very randy bisexual friend who fucks his wife most days.

Masturbating can give a greater climax than intercourse because I can vary the grip or tightness. I feel very relaxed after a wank, particularly if I can shout out at the point of climax. I catch the spunk in a tissue, or if in the woods just let it go.

I have talked about masturbation with my partner and watched her masturbate herself, and have also talked about masturbation techniques with a male friend.

I like best to masturbate on a beach – I once visited a nudist beach where most were male and watched them slowly wank from time to time whilst I kept myself hard.

E.L. – Avon

Masturbation Survey: Reply 2

Now aged 50, I first masturbated at age 13, and now do so daily. I masturbate as often when I have a steady partner. When on holiday from work I masturbate several times daily. I make it last longer than an hour and sometimes orgasm. I have a single orgasm and try to build up a really good volume of spunk.

I feel like masturbating after seeing a slim teenage boy, in reality or pictorially. Photos or magazines, drawings, written descriptions and videos excite me: any literature or photos on the subject of slim boys. I do not hide my drawings/pictures etc, and frequently watch pornographic films/videos.

My fantasies are of previous experiences relived, sex with my own sex, group sex, anal and oral sex, and pissing. An especially exciting fantasy would be spending the day with a slim 13/14 year old lad, kissing, wanking, pissing etc. I sometimes think of my lover when I masturbate.

I masturbate with my hands and a lubricant. I find the head (glans) and my balls the parts of my penis most sensitive to stimulation. When masturbating, I also stimulate my balls, anus and stomach. I am sometimes naked when I masturbate. If not, I particularly enjoy wearing short shorts.

I sometimes masturbate with friends of my own sex, and do not think of masturbation as a substitute for sex. I think that a masturbating orgasm is better than an orgasm in intercourse because all the action is visible. I feel happy when I have masturbated, and drink the semen afterwards if possible.

I have talked about masturbation and the randiest techniques with my lover, but not with other people: I have always assumed that the subject is of little interest to them.

I like best of all to masturbate sitting on a bean bag, sipping a drink, enjoying a video of male action, pissing occasionally, and rubbing my cock, balls and anus with a mixture of piss and olive oil. If I am lucky, spunk escapes gently, which is most enjoyable – so it goes on!

Anon

Bridegroom

Way back in the Swinging Sixties when I was working for a time in Madrid I had a girl friend who worked in a high-class 'establishment'. There was a house-rule that sheaths were never used: instead a girl used a bidet before and afterwards, and carefully inspected and washed the client's penis before intercourse. Maria-Teresa said it was always a relief to see someone circumcised. With uncircumcised clients it was a messy business to peel back the foreskin, and invariably she would have to wash away a deposit of smegma.

She would never, ever, perform orally on the uncut. In non-working hours she and I had a marvellous relationship. About five years later I was invited to her wedding, and in a quiet moment with her I asked, was her husband circumcised? As I had guessed, the reply was yes: she had made it a condition of her betrothal that he went and had the operation!

Inuvik

ACORN

1990 Issue No 7

(Formerly Issue Y)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Visual Aids		Page 2
Infibulation	M.D.	Page 2
Wildcat International		Page 4
Circumcision – The Video?	C.P.	Page 4
Masturbation Survey Reply	W.H.	Page 5
Childhood Curiosity	M.P.	Page 9
Sex And The Mature Dutch 12-Year-Old		Page 10
Soviet Students Undergo Mass Circumcision		Page 11
Masturbation Survey Reply	S.W.	Page 12
Subscriptions		Page 12

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the seventh issue of Acorn for 1990. Time has been short because of other commitments, so this November issue is later than planned but still full of the usual excitements for our readers. The final 1990 issue will go out at the end of the year, probably after Christmas. It will soon be time to ask you to renew your subscription so an order form is included on the back page of this issue. 1991 issues will only be sent out after your 1991 subscription is paid.

This issue includes two replies to the masturbation survey; let's have more for future issues. We also have an interesting contribution on the theme of childhood curiosity, plus a scattering of smaller items. This is your newsletter, and it depends on your contributions for its success. To the extent that there is an editorial policy, it is a preference for variety and for contributions from members who have not been published before. There is also a tendency to favour a pro-circumcision view, partly because the anti view is the dominant one in Britain not least in the medical profession, but mainly because that is what clearly interests most of our members. But we will also try to range more widely, as will be seen from our masturbation survey replies and from the item below on infibulation.

Tony Acorn

Visual Aids

In order to encourage the use of condoms and slow the spread of aids, the government in Zimbabwe has ordered 5,000 artificial penises. They are made from wood, and will be used by instructors to illustrate the correct use of a condom.

Infibulation

Dear Tony Acorn; As a new member of Acorn I am writing to thank and congratulate you for Acorn Newsletter, which I find very interesting and informative. Your comments on infibulation (Issue 6/90, page 7) prompt me to add some details. You mentioned a few sources of historical evidence (statuettes, written references), and I have heard of vase paintings. These survivals are scant but informative sources sufficient for historians to make rational assumptions. The ancient Greeks and Romans believed in 'a healthy mind in a healthy body', mens sana in corpore sano. Hence their preoccupation with physical training, exercises, and cleanliness. Their schools and towns were provided with gymnasia and baths for the youths and men to use frequently and were places which they attended nude. The participants as well as the spectators were also required to attend the Olympic Games naked.

The exposed glans or erect penis were considered barbaric or uncivilised. Vase paintings and statuettes, etc, always depicted the satyrs and foreigners in such conditions, implying their lack of classical civilization, with its emphasis on self-control and moderation in all things. Hence the need for their youths and men to keep their glans covered in public. To achieve this they probably resorted to the fitting and wearing of infibulation rings. This is not as drastic as it sounds: the operation is simple and heals quickly; youths were expected to bear pain stoically; and wearing a ring in the piercing can be quite comfortable.

Imagine the humiliation and sense of helplessness experienced by those endowed with a short foreskin, 'barely covering the knob when flaccid and retracting all the way back with the merest hint of an erection', as H.S. of Harrow, described it (Issue 7/90, p.7). I chose infibulation for this very reason.

The ring worn through a pair of perforations pierced on opposite sides of the foreskin would keep the glans hooded when flaccid, but any erection caused discomfort, increasing in intensity with the intensity of the erection. To eliminate this (which was sometimes the reason for infibulating slaves), the foreskin can be easily stretched by attaching a weight to the ring so that this extends both the foreskin and the holes so that thicker and heavier rings and weights can be used.

I did this and found the experience both stimulating and practical. My elongated foreskin has an 'overhang' of over two inches when a weight of 600 grams is attached and an 'overhang' of over an inch without a weight. I have also extended the circumference of my elongated foreskin, transforming a 'bottle-neck' type overhang (a long, narrow nozzle of excess foreskin at the penis tip) into a flared 'bell bottom' look. If Acorn readers are interested, I would be happy to describe the mechanics, the stages, and the foreskin effects (the peek-a-boo look, the tassel, the rosette, etc) which I experienced while creating a long, loose foreskin. [Yes, please! – Ed.]

My endeavours were probably similar to those of the Greeks and Romans interested in the same pursuits. In the societies of Ancient Greece and Rome, and of the American Deep South up to 1865, slaves were infibulated for a variety of utilitarian purposes: to prevent them getting randy (a safeguard for their masters' womenfolk); to preserve the slave's vigour, for their master to exploit in physical work; to prevent breeding by unsuitable males with household or estate slave women; to facilitate selective slave breeding for the market – suitable stud slaves were loaned or hired to be used like prize bulls or stallions, and were ringed to control their sexual activities; and last but not least, as a badge of bondage, reminding the slave of his status and his submission to his master's needs and whims. The last served as a type of ritual emasculation and has its appeal today for dominant women and submissive men.

These practices and reasons are vividly portrayed in the novel Mandingo by Kyle Onstott, set in the American Deep South during the era of slavery. Indeed this novel and others of the same genre by such authors as Ashley Carter, Lance Horner, Tressilian, and Simon Finch, engendered my interest in the subject of infibulation. If Acorn readers know of any other novels or writers on these themes, please write in. Any other ideas on the theme would also be welcome, such as those of D.N. – Deal, who mentions ‘thereby keeping the cock upright and ensuring clear exposure of the balls’. This was practised by ancient athletes, who attached their infibulation ring to a cord tied around the waist to prevent it flopping about when running a race. But readers should note that piercing can be dangerous unless performed with knowledge, under hygienic conditions, and using stainless steel rings.

M.D. – Oxford

Wildcat International

Readers may like to know of Wildcat International, 16 Preston Street, Brighton, East Sussex, BN1 2HN. Tel: 0273-23758. This firm caters to those who have an interest in the piercing scene. It has a substantial list of videos on this theme, and also supplies items of innovative body jewellery in stainless steel, including barbells, ball-closure rings, enlarging crescents and tapered stretching staffs, tapered insertion pins, horseshoes, stirrups, ball weights, nipple stretchers, etc., all in a range of gauges and sizes. They specifically do not supply pointed or hollow needles, anaesthetics, hypodermic syringes or any other such merchandise. They will send a list on request, and will also make up special orders.

Circumcision — The Video?

Dear Tony Acorn: Thanks for the latest copy of Acorn: I always look forward to its arrival. It is good to see men (and women) talk freely about circumcision.

When I was a lad of about six or seven, I remember that my mother would sit me on the kitchen table after my bath. Auntie was called in from next door and between them they would pull my foreskin back and forth and then talk very quietly to each other about whether I should be circumcised. After much talk they would conclude: ‘I think we must keep an eye on it just in case it gets tight or sore.’ This would be repeated next bath night. I think they just enjoyed playing with my foreskin.

The same thing happened to my brother. His foreskin was tight, and he was circumcised at the age of eleven. I can remember asking my mother if I could go to the hospital with my brother to have my willie done, but I got a great big NO, and was told not to talk about it to anyone.

Needless to say, unfortunately I have still not been circumcised although I have a very long foreskin which needs removing. I made a booking with the Surgical Advisory Service to be circumcised but cancelled it in case they made a mess of my penis and made it look unsightly. I would dearly like to see a penis being circumcised, or see one immediately afterwards to see what it looks like while still not healed.

It would be very helpful to see a video in close-up of a circumcision from start to finish. If I could pluck up enough courage to be circumcised, I would love to have my operation videoed, to be able to see it all happening at a later date, and also to share my experience with other men and women, who I know are just as keen as I am to talk freely about this subject. Watching a video would, I am sure, give people more confidence to have that unsightly piece of skin cut off. What about it, chaps? How about being a video star and encourage us to have the best cut of a lifetime?

I have many friends, some male and quite a lot female, who get together and discuss circumcision. The females mostly seem to like the uncovered penis head. As naturists we have no shyness and we can see both tight and slack foreskins demonstrated and discuss who needs circumcising. Most of the lads are in favour of the circumcised penis.

C.P. – Wiltshire

Masturbation Survey Reply

I started to masturbate so young that I can't remember when. It seems like I always masturbated. I masturbate daily on the average. Sometimes I miss a few days, but other days I may masturbate more than once. I have coitus about three times a week. We nearly always masturbate each other, but not to orgasm, before coitus.

When I masturbate alone it is usually for 5-15 minutes if I do not continue to orgasm; if I go on to orgasm it is 15-30 minutes. About one time in three I continue to orgasm. In mutual masturbation we seldom masturbate to orgasm but continue into coitus to have our orgasms. I always have an orgasm in coitus. I often come first but continue by hand if necessary until she has her orgasm. I only have one orgasm now, but when I was younger I often had several a few minutes apart without pulling out. Along the way she has her orgasm.

I usually masturbate in bed. Sometimes I masturbate in the bath tub or shower – I like the feeling of a pulsating shower on my cock. When I masturbate by myself I use only my hand. In mutual masturbating we sometimes use a vibrator and frequently use KY lubricant. Fantasies, erotic video tapes, pictures, erotic stories, showering with my wife, or being teased sexually by my wife all excite me to masturbate. I often think of my wife when I masturbate. Daydreaming about circumcising someone probably excites me most. We sometimes watch pornographic videos. We hide sexy stories, pictures and videos from our kids and nosey neighbours.

Before circumcision I masturbated by sliding my foreskin back and forth over my moist slippery glans. Now I generally place my thumb in the sulcus on top and my fingers on the scar underneath where my frenulum was cut and sort of rub.

In my teens masturbation gained a tremendous hold over me. I knew I was masturbating far too much, often several times a day – so frequently that often I didn't come. I had acquired a very bad habit of rhythmically squeezing my legs together while sitting and studying. This made me lubricate and my foreskin slid back and forth over my glans giving me very erotic sensations. At the time I didn't know of any other male who masturbated in this manner, but I observed that a few girls, including my girlfriend, did. Girls generally crossed their legs to increase the pressure on their clitoris when they did it. My girlfriend did not consider this to be masturbating, because she did not use her hand. I concluded that this form of masturbating was rare among males because most [in the USA] were circumcised. I had read and firmly believed that removing the foreskin removed  $\frac{3}{4}$  the temptation to masturbate.

The squeezing habit continually became worse during my college years. It was a particularly pernicious habit because it was so very easy to do. The worst part was that frequently I would not even be aware that I was masturbating until I felt myself about to come. Usually I could stop before coming, but sometimes I soiled my pants [trousers], once in class. I started wearing a Kotex pad over my penis to catch the come and prevent soiling my pants.

I decided during my Junior year of college that to break the squeezing habit I would have to start keeping my foreskin retracted even if it meant losing glans sensitivity. So I fashioned a rubber collar to wear in the sulcus behind my glans to keep my foreskin retracted, but this didn't work. The collar would press against my sulcus and corona when I squeezed my legs together and produce sufficient, although less pleasant, erotic sensations, to let me masturbate.

So I made a New Year resolution: I would stop squeezing myself and would masturbate only by other means, and no more than once a week. I wrote in my diary that if I broke this vow I would go to the College free health service and have myself circumcised. Honestly, I didn't want to get circumcised. Yes, I wanted to look circumcised, but I didn't want to lose my foreskin or lose any more glans sensitivity than I had already lost. I really enjoyed masturbating with my full foreskin. I thought that knowing this would be the punishment would make me control my masturbation. But the habit was too strong. In less than a week I had broken both parts of my vow.

So I went to the College health service, told them that my foreskin constantly itched and bothered me, and asked for an appointment to get circumcised. The doctor examined my penis but couldn't find anything wrong with it. He said that my College health insurance did not cover an elective circumcision and there was no evident phimosis, disease or irritation. This gave me an out. I told myself that I had tried to get circumcised. I gave myself a second and third chance to bring my masturbation under control, but still I couldn't. I had to get circumcised. My integrity was at stake. If I didn't keep my word, even though it was to myself, my word wasn't much good.

My girlfriend gave me the final incentive. I was dating a very sexy nurse. I felt sure that before very long we would be in bed together. Then during some heavy petting she discovered that I was not circumcised. This turned her off completely. She said she thought an uncircumcised prick was dirty and unattractive. She feared that I would give her cancer of the cervix. Moreover, by retaining my foreskin I was, she said, risking cancer of my penis, which could require amputation of my entire penis. This clinched it! My foreskin had to go. There could be no more hesitation.

Since I knew my Dad was against circumcision and I didn't have the money to pay for a circumcision, I decided to do the job myself. I had read widely about circumcision in medical journals, army and navy reports, medical and surgical text books, patents, etc. I felt confident to do it. Primitive people performed circumcisions safely with much less knowledge of medicine and surgery than I had. I chose the ecraseur or strangulation method because it was bloodless and seemed simple and safe. I had seen a picture of the Plastibell circumcision device, and had also seen my cousin's infant son wearing one when he came home from the hospital. Using a lathe available to me at the College, I fabricated a bell to fit over my glans with a deep groove in the surface at the rim, and a hole at the other end for urine to escape.

Instead of going home for the Easter holidays, as my room-mate and nearly everyone else did, I circumcised myself. First I sterilized all my equipment with either heat or alcohol. I shaved off my pubic hair and took a bath, carefully washing my genitals. When everything was ready I slipped the bell over my glans, pulled my foreskin forward over the bell, and held it in place temporarily with a rubber band. Then I looped a piece of fine nichrome wire tightly twice round the back part of my foreskin, over the groove in the bell, and pulled and twisted the ends together with pliers. I used no anaesthetic because at that time I still did not know I could obtain a topical local anaesthetic without prescription. So I applied tension slowly, stopping when the pain became too great. Surprisingly, my penis thought this was fun and became very hard. As a result I shot my wad – this didn't help. My hands were full, so cleaning up had to wait. I knew that the wire had to be tight enough to stop all blood circulation. At the same time I didn't want to break the wire or make the wire so tight that it cut through the skin. If anything went wrong, I planned to go to the doctor and tell him that I had caught my foreskin in my zipper and made it bleed badly: 'This bell-like ornament was handy, so I made a tourniquet of it to stop the bleeding.'

I had considerable concern that the wire might not be tight enough to cause the two layers of skin to grow together as they should. However, everything turned out fine. I was sore, but there was no great pain except when I had an erection. For the first two days I had a slight burning sensation in my penis. The skin grew together where the wire pinched it to the bell, and on the sixth day my dead foreskin and the bell, still bound together, fell off while I bathed. The remaining foreskin retracted by itself behind the glans and stayed, leaving my glans and the sulcus behind it uncovered. I had removed a bit more foreskin than I had planned, but still could pull my foreskin forward to cover  $\frac{2}{3}$  of my glans. The skin is taut only during an erection. I did not lose any additional glans sensitivity. My previous exposure had fully toughened it.

In fact circumcision increased the erotic sensitivity of my penis. I was amazed at how erotically sensitive my circumcision scar was, particularly for the first few months. It still continues to be my most sensitive area. It seems that all the nerve endings that went to my foreskin are now concentrated in the scar. The most important result was that circumcision also brought my masturbation under control. Squeezing no longer worked. For masturbation by hand to be as erotic as before I have to apply a lubricant. Then it is super, but it requires preparation and is now a controllable act, not a habit.

When I told my girlfriend that I had circumcised myself for her, at first she didn't believe me, but she gave me a date and when she examined my penis she couldn't believe her eyes. She took my penis into her mouth without my asking. It was great. This was the first time I had ever experienced fellatio, although other fellows had told me about their girl friends doing it for them. This turned out to be another advantage of being circumcised.

My most erotic areas, in order of decreasing sensitivity, are now my frenulum scar, my circumcision scar, my sulcus, my glans, my nipples, my inner thighs, my lips, my ears, my balls, my anus. When I masturbate alone I stimulate only the first five; however, when we pet, I enjoy my wife stimulating all of these areas. Sometimes I am nude when I masturbate, but not usually. Nude masturbating is sort of special and very erotic.

Masturbating can be a substitute for coitus, but the orgasm from coitus with someone you love is psychologically superior and more satisfying, probably because it is shared. I now feel relaxed and satisfied after masturbating. I used to feel ashamed before I brought my masturbating under control. I generally catch my ejaculate in a paper towel.

My wife and I have frequently discussed masturbation, including how we used to do it when we were single, and how often. We like to watch each other do it – this usually leads to our doing each other. I like best to lubricate my hand and slide it back and forth over my penis. It is even more erotic when my wife does the same to me. I also greatly enjoy her tickling my sensitive spots with a feather.

We have discussed masturbation with our children. We have explained that it is a perfectly normal thing to do, but it is something one should do only in private.

W.H. – Pennsylvania, USA

[Thanks, W.H., for a fascinating article. You don't mention the genders of your children but I wonder whether your experience influenced you to decide to have your son(s) circumcised, if you had boys? – T.A.]

Childhood Curiosity

Childhood sexual curiosity is natural and healthy. It can also be a tremendously exciting experience the first time it happens to you. I was about 13 and just embarking upon puberty when it happened to me. My friend Steve had a pretty sister, Karen, who was a year younger than we were and one day he led me with an air of secrecy to the potting shed at the end of the garden to find Karen waiting there, blushing and giggling. He came straight to the point. "Karen wants to see your cock," he said, and they both gazed at me expectantly. The thing is that, a year previously, I'd caught my foreskin in my zip and had to be circumcised. All the kids at school knew about it and I was the uncomfortable object of much curiosity, especially from Karen who was apparently dying to see what a circumcised cock looked like.

The request came as a bit of a shock, and as I stood there wondering what to do, Steve decided to provide a bit of bait. "Come on," he said, "she'll pull it for you and let you feel her up if you do, won't you, Karen?" She nodded, still giggling. Then Steve lost patience and said, "Look, there's nothing to it. She does it to me often", and under my disbelieving gaze he opened his fly and extracted his large uncircumcised organ, which by this time was in a state of semi-erection. Karen sat down on a crate next to him and, watching my face intently, started milking away at his cock, every now and then pulling his foreskin right down to uncover his wet plum-coloured knob. Steve stood there with his eyes shut, his back arched and his face as red as fire, until suddenly he let out a whoop and, knocking her hand away, rehooded his penis as he went into a wild though dry orgasm.

As he sat gasping, Karen turned to me. "Come on", she said, "don't be a spoil-sport. You can feel me till I come too if you like." She then stepped out of her knickers and, raising her skirt, thrust my hand between her legs so as to lodge my fingertips in her moist and hairless little slot. "Go on", she said, "that's lovely", and got me to slip my fingers rapidly up and down inside the lips of her twatty. I was by now in a state of disbelieving and shuddering excitement and barely noticed as she undid my fly and extracted my erection.

She examined it curiously, noting the puckered red scar that encircled the shaft and the permanently denuded knob, before she started to manipulate it like she had her brother's. This, of course, she found much less easy to do because of the lack of mobile skin, but she overcame this by wetting her hand and sliding it rapidly up and down my taut shaft. Steve watched keenly as both Karen and I got more and more excited, until finally I came with a roar of achievement. To Karen's delight and Steve's envy I produced a powerful jet of sperm which shot clear across the shed – my first ever! The trouble was, I no longer had the energy to maintain my manipulation of Karen's pretty little twatty and the poor girl was on the very threshold of her own orgasm. But Steve immediately stepped in and continued rubbing between her thighs until, with a faint shriek, she too arched her back and showed that girls can come just as well as boys.

These fumbblings and gropings had been a regular feature between Steve and Karen for a long time, and now I joined in on a regular basis until, with puberty, we found our own separate friends and went our separate ways. But it is to this childhood experience that I give the credit for my having grown up without hang-ups, and I now enjoy a happy and fulfilled sex life.

M.P. – Watford

Sex And The Mature Dutch 12-Year-Old

Contrary to some newspaper reports, the Dutch have not lowered the age of consent to 12. But the change which they have introduced is possibly more interesting. They have lifted the fear of prosecution from children aged between 12 and 16 who engage in a sexual relationship, provided that it is of their own free will. Freedom of choice and lack of coercion are the crucial principles underlying the proposal, which was agreed by the lower house of the Dutch Parliament in mid-November 1990.

In the Netherlands the act of sex is still in principle forbidden to both boys and girls between the age of 12 and 16. But if there is no complaint, there is no prosecution. It is still open to a child, or its parents, or a member of the regional Council for the Protection of Children, to complain. And someone who feels they have been abused may bring a complaint via the police within 12 years after the event. The intention of changing the law is to recognise that young people under 16 who want to have sex will do so anyway, despite their parents' disapproval or the risk of prosecution, but to remove the element of guilt and secrecy: to say that it is their own choice.

Unlike Britain, the Dutch have the same age of consent for boys and girls. They also have a much more open acceptance of sexual behaviour. In newsagents, pornography is displayed at knee level, not on the top shelf. It is acceptable for the security guard at the door of a government office to say goodbye to his male friend with a frank, unselfconscious kiss. And everything in the new Bill that applies to teenage heterosexual couples applies also to two girls or two boys.

The punishment for illegal sex with children under 16, of either sex, is six years' imprisonment, but in practice it is only expected that this procedure will be invoked where one partner is an adult and coercion has been used. In such cases consent is irrelevant and if the child is under 16 the act remains illegal.

Based on a report in The Independent, 21.11.90

[This seems to be an admirable liberal piece of legislation, recognising as it does the liberal principle of freedom of action provided the freedom of one is not at the expense of the freedom of the other. At the same time it seems to offer all the necessary safeguards against coercion, either explicitly, or the implicit coercion by the old and experienced of the younger and more immature partner.

It will be interesting to see whether the freedom of movement of people and goods implicit in the single European Market of 1993 will bring pressure on the British government to bring its legislation on the age of consent into line with the Dutch, and/or to reduce the heavy censorship on pornography which operates currently. The British view is based heavily on the view that pornography acts as an incitement to rape and other acts of sexually motivated violence. November 1990 also saw the publication of a Home Office report which carefully reviewed the evidence which might support or refute this view, much of it from the US, and concluded that the link was not established. Indeed, the balance of evidence seemed to point in the opposite direction: availability of pornographic material seemed to offer an outlet for sexual frustrations which reduced the incidence of sexually motivated violence.

That seems to be borne out also by Danish experience: in 1968 they removed the legislation which legalised censorship. Producers of pornography flourished, and it was widely available in newsagents and more specialised shops. But within a very few years the market was sated. A visit to Copenhagen earlier this year revealed less pornography on sale or display than pre-1968: but, if you are going there, the best place to look is Istedgade, the first few hundred yards of the long street which runs west from the side-entrance to the main railway station.]

Soviet Students Undergo Mass Circumcision

Twenty-seven Soviet Jews queued up for an operation which is largely unobtainable in their native land – circumcision. On Sunday, Monday and Tuesday, the Garden Hospital in Hendon was the stage for one of the most unusual ceremonies held in this country in recent years. Six mohelim (qualified circumcisers), two of whom were doctors, performed the operation on the Russian men, aged between 15 and 30. They had come to Britain as part of a learning programme organised by Rabbi Sender Dominitz of Stamford Hill. He said: "The boys did not come here for this purpose. We had to explain to them what it is all about. Now they are queuing up for it." The operations were done under local anaesthetic. A total of 32 Russians came to Britain for the programme. However, five of them were already circumcised.

Jewish Chronicle. October 1990 (From B.H. – Leeds)

Masturbation Survey Reply

I'm now 57, and first masturbated from the age of about 4, initially pulling my foreskin back and forward to produce an erection. By the age of 5 I had discovered the wonderful feeling produced by rubbing to [dry] orgasm. From the age of 6 until I was 40, I masturbated at least once daily; in my 40s, three times a week, and currently three or four times a month. When I have a steady partner I do it less, but otherwise circumstances make no difference. I masturbate for 5-15 minutes and usually have a single orgasm.

I usually masturbate on going to bed, in bed or in a chair, nearly always naked, especially with a porno book. I find written descriptions most arousing, especially any detailed description of sex or circumcision rituals. I don't hide this material, and watch pornographic films/videos 3-5 times a week. I sometimes think of my partner. My fantasies centre on group sex and oral sex.

I use my hands or bedding to masturbate with. The parts of my penis that are most sensitive to stimulation are my frenulum and corona. I am well circumcised – the shaft skin can be drawn as far as the corona but not over it. When masturbating, I do not stimulate other areas than my penis.

I have masturbated with friends of both sexes and think of masturbation as a substitute for sex: to me a masturbating orgasm is the same as an orgasm in intercourse. I feel relaxed and tired afterwards. I wipe up my ejaculate with a tissue, or if it is on my body let it dry.

I have not talked about it with my partner, but have talked about masturbation methods with friends of my own sex. I like lying on my left side on the bed and using my right hand to wank.

S.W. – Gwent

Subscriptions

Subscriptions to the Acorn Newsletter for 1991 are now due. One of our principal costs is postage, which has risen substantially since we first set our price at £10. With regret, therefore, the 1991 subscription goes up to £12.

ACORN

1990 Issue No 8
(Formerly Issue Z)

Editor
Tony Acorn

Contents

Editorial	T.A.	Page 2
Sex At 70	J.D.	Page 2
Survey Reply	V.	Page 3
Circumcision Available In Oslo	G.N.S.	Page 4
First Wank	M.S.	Page 5
Male Multiple Orgasm	R.H.	Page 6
Wankers Of The World Unite!	A.F.	Page 7
The Gomco Circumcision Clamp		Page 8
Malaysian Experience	H.C.	Page 10
Final Call For 1991 Subscriptions		Page 12

---

Membership, Fees, Advice, Personal Matters,
Newsletter Contributions, Letters for Forwarding

To:- ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1990 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Here, at last, is the final issue for 1990, with apologies for the production delay. We hope you enjoy it, and keep sending in the material. We also hope that you will renew your subscription for 1991 (there's a form at the end, to make the process simple). If you have enjoyed Acorn, please recommend it to your friends too.

As those who have already renewed for 1991 will know, David Acorn will take over the task of editing the Newsletter, at least for the first part of 1991. This will be a great help, as my commitments have become increasingly demanding. The business arrangements remain unchanged, however. Best wishes to David, and a happy and enjoyable 1991 to all our readers.

Tony Acorn

Sex At 70

I have always been very sex-orientated. For many years my wife and I have made love at least daily, usually averaging 11 times a week. I find it difficult to differentiate between mutual masturbation and sex play or foreplay. I am now over 70 and rely on stimulation of my penis before actual intercourse. This my wife does by sliding my foreskin up and down the shaft – the 'normal way', if there is such a thing. I have an elephant's trunk foreskin, completely covering the glans at all times except when it is deliberately moved back, and during intercourse when it slides back during penetration. Although my father was a GP I was told so little about the mechanics of sex that my foreskin was never moved back until I was in my 30s and contracted balanitis – inflammation of the foreskin due to smegma. I remember the discomfort when the doctor pulled back my foreskin for the first time! I also remember his disgust at the collection of smegma etc which he found. I had not been taught any genital hygiene and by then I had had frequent and regular intercourse.

I do not remember when I first masturbated as a child. But I certainly did so soon after sexual maturity. I used to masturbate to orgasm by rotating my foreskin and also squeezing it. I masturbated several times a day, and allowed the come to go into my underpants or wherever. They became stiff with come, and then my father talked to me but still explained nothing. Sex was constantly on my mind and I experimented with anything that would rotate my foreskin. My father had an electric motor and I would hold my foreskin to the rotating spindle. Sometimes that resulted in a bleeding foreskin, but this did not stop me. The gramophone turntable was also useful, though a bit too gentle.

We had a kitten that had been taken from its mother too early and consequently tried to suck at anything remotely suitable – usually a finger tip – and that gave me an idea: I gave it my tip to suck, and when it was reasonably clean the kitten would oblige. I couldn't understand why sometimes it would refuse, but now I know that sometimes my urine was particularly ammoniacal. I never washed in those days, so the poor thing did not like the idea.

As an adult I masturbate three or four times a week. I am usually dressed but the penis bare, twisting and squeezing while fantasizing, or in a sex cinema. I also liked very much the spray of a hot shower in the bath, my favourite method when away on business trips and missing my wife's fond attention. I have little experience of mutual masturbation except as part of foreplay to intercourse. In school as a teenager I sat next to a boy who was into touching: our ploy was to make holes into our pockets and slide a hand into each other's pocket – even then, I was surprised when he came into my hand. We did that during lessons, and not surprisingly were moved apart by the class teacher, but again no-one actually explained anything.

I know a sex cinema in Germany which caters for homosexuals, and there, to my surprise, men openly masturbate each other. This is the archetypal 'zipless' masturbation – it is dark and you have no idea who it is who touches you. When I noticed that, I got very excited. But it took me a further two visits before I had the courage and got active. I sat there with my cock out and masturbated while watching the screen, and a man soon sat down next to me and took me in hand. Naturally I retaliated, and was amazed at the rock-hardness I encountered. I had always wanted to know what it felt and tasted like to suck cock, so I did this to my neighbour (he was evidently very clean, as it tasted of nothing in particular). He soon went with a gentle touch as thanks, to be followed at once by another man. We exchanged the same type of caresses. Then I noticed a queue of men standing in the gangway: word must have spread like wildfire! I had to get up and leave.

In my sexual heyday, when my wife and I had frequent intercourse during the average week, there was no need for me to masturbate. Sometimes on holiday we made love three times a day. I merely used to visit a sex cinema once a week and masturbate to climax. Now that I am 70 we still have intercourse five or six times a week, but I no longer masturbate to climax.

J.D. – London NW2

Survey Reply

Now aged 78, I first masturbated before I was ten. These days I masturbate about twice a week. When I have a steady partner, I masturbate less. This does not vary much. A 'quickie' takes less than 5 minutes. If I have a video I may make it last an hour or longer. I always go to orgasm and normally do so once, but may do so twice after a gay video. I usually masturbate in the bathroom. I feel like masturbating when I feel the need for relief, or when stimulated by a magazine or video.

Fantasies, photos or magazines excite me best. My fantasies are of experiences relived, of sex with the same sex and oral sex. My fantasies always centre around the uncircumcised penis, presumably because I am a roundhead. I imagine meeting two 21-year-olds in a pub; when the conversation turns to sexual matters, I take them home. After a while they will begin to fondle each other and indulge in a spell of deep kissing, proceeding to gradual undressing. I will slowly open their flies and get out their penises, both of which have long loose foreskins. I will play with each in turn for quite some time, working the foreskins up and down until they are fully erect. At this stage they will play with my cock and attempt to pull their foreskins up over my bare knob. If either is successful he will attempt to masturbate with our two knobs covered with his skin. Often I will reach orgasm as a result of fantasizing this far. If not, I imagine that I am performing oral sex on them in turn, pushing their foreskins back with my lips as they enter. When they are near to orgasm, I get them to kneel astride me so that I can finish them off, one with his foreskin forward, and the other with his back. When I get this far in my fantasy, I almost invariably come myself. While I vary detail each time I masturbate, the basic ideas are always the same.

I never think of my lover when I masturbate. I use my hands, a shower and a vibrator to masturbate with. My frenulum and the rim of my glans are the most sensitive to stimulation. When masturbating, I also stimulate my balls, anus and nipples and am usually naked, and seldom masturbate with a friend of my own sex. To me masturbation is a substitute for sex. However, a masturbating orgasm is worse than an orgasm in intercourse because it misses full stimulation of the glans. When I have masturbated I feel relaxed and pleased. I sometimes swallow my semen.

I have not talked about masturbation with my wife because she regards sex as 'dirty', but I have talked with other friends of my own sex about methods and the use of the foreskin. I like best to masturbate when I am on my own in the house watching a gay video of two or more chaps in their late teens or early 20s with uncircumcised cocks playing together and finally reaching orgasm by oral sex. While watching I play with my own cock, finally coming by rubbing with two fingers on the frenulum and my thumb just brushing the glans rim on the outward stroke; for a quickie I rub with my whole fist.

V. – Shropshire

Circumcision Available In Oslo

Our Oslo correspondent reports an advertisement in the Oslo phone directory placed by Dr Jon Langeland's Skin Clinic. The Surgical Section offers various procedures including male sterilization, prostate evaluation, and circumcision. A telephone enquiry revealed that circumcision would be no trouble: the operation would take about 30 minutes, and the patient could go home afterwards. The cost would be 750 Norwegian kroner, or about £65 – a very reasonable price compared to the charge in Britain. Brief inspection revealed that the premises appeared first class. The address is Postboks 8764, Youngstorget, 0028 Oslo 1, with access from Operapassasjen, oppgang 2B, 9th floor, and the telephone number is (02) 41 83 96.

G.N.S. – Oslo

First Wank

I was first introduced to the noble art of wanking by being in the right place at the right time: a huge derelict bomb site (or 'debris') used by local kids as an exciting if dangerous playground just after the war. I was a plain ten year old with plaits and glasses, desperately curious about sex, but although I'd seen my elder brothers' cocks on many occasions they were a po-faced lot and didn't think the subject suitable to discuss with little sister.

So I felt a tinge of excitement the day Ronnie, a disreputable red-haired twelve-year-old whom I'd been forbidden to play with took me on a tour of the debris. We found ourselves in the secluded remains of a kitchen and Ronnie immediately voiced the thought uppermost in his mind and asked me to show him my fanny. I declined (only because I was put off by his blunt approach), whereupon he undid his flies and produced a long fat white sausage which hung dejectedly over his balls. Its appearance immediately struck me as different from my brothers' cocks: they each had a small round tomato on the end whereas Ronnie's cock tapered to a skinny white worm with a pink rosette. I told him it looked different, whereupon he told me he would show me why, but first I had to show him my fanny. So this time I stepped out of my navy blue knickers and bared my tightly closed hairless little vulva to him. He stared at it eagerly, ran his fingers up and down it, and as he did so he lifted his penis up by the loose skin on the tip for me to admire. I was fascinated to see it swell and lengthen jerkily till it stood upright pointing at his navel.

He sniggered and asked me if I knew what wanking was. I shook my head and he gave me a demonstration, claspings his erection in his fist and rubbing it up and down. I noticed that on every back stroke his spout of skin stretched open to form a ring framing a glistening bluish area with an eye in it. He then generously offered me a go and I took over with relish, captivated by the feel of this rock-hard column of flesh in its loose velvety envelope. As my strokes got more energetic I found more and more of his juicy blue plum was revealed: just like my brothers' tomatoes, only more moist and darker coloured. At the same time Ronnie shuddered into a dry climax and collapsed with a lewd grin on his face.

I thus took my first step in the male preserve of wanking. (It wasn't until much later that I found girls could enjoy similar pleasures.) At the same time I discovered that cocks came in two configurations: with foreskins and without.

Since then I must have handled dozens of both sorts of cock over the years, and have come to the conclusion that although 'peeled' ones are cleaner and seem to appeal to your better-class or so-called 'respectable' girls, foreskins are more fun, particularly in the wanking game, and they are preferred by your unassuming and down-to earth working girl.

This harmless childish exercise in growing up which I experienced in the 'debris' led to an enthusiasm for the sport which has never faded, and even now I get a thrill out of giving my husband's gnarled old hampton the same treatment as I gave Ronnie's all those years ago. Incidentally, my husband is a lovable old reprobate called Ronnie, and he has more foreskin than sense!

M.S. – London N11

Male Multiple Orgasm

I have just started to subscribe to Acorn, and I've spent the last fabulous three hours lying in bed with a dozen back numbers when I should have been weeding the garden. Both hands have been fully occupied, one turning the pages and the other under the sheets! As one of your older readers (57) and a gay medical journalist of some twenty years standing, may I congratulate everyone involved in bringing together so much fascinating material.

I suspect there are a lot of people who would find the contents of the Newsletter offensive. For them sexual matters are a very private affair. I imagine, however, that your readers are a select group who share my uninhibited need to express my sexual thoughts openly. To gain the greatest fulfilment from my homosexuality I must share my fantasies and experiences with others by recounting them in the same way as I would enjoy telling friends of a good holiday or social event. Reliving past pleasures is to savour once again the enjoyment of the day. I know already that I shall be one of your frequent future contributors but, on this occasion, I would like to concentrate on your feature in issue 4/90 on the male multiple orgasm.

The best 'student holiday job' I ever had was away back in 1951/52, when I was 18/19. During the long vacations I was 'on the game' as a rent boy. In those far-off pre-Wolfenden days I was a rare breed in a highly risky business. My services were in great demand and I could often count on nine or ten clients in an evening. I soon learnt that to ejaculate with my first 'trick' of the day was a fatal mistake. Subsequent punters weren't amused by a refractory call boy who couldn't get a hard on. Usually, therefore, I stopped myself short of orgasm and helped my partner to climax on his own.

But I enjoyed my work and it wasn't always easy to control myself. Sometimes I would go over the top – beyond the point of no return. Then it was a desperate struggle to exert mind over matter to inhibit my muscular reflexes and attempt to avoid ejaculation. Masters and Johnson hadn't told us about the 'Squeeze Technique' in those days and, anyway, I've never been able to make it work. At first I could delay the inevitability of cumming by only a few seconds but, with practice and supreme effort, the delay period became more and more prolonged until the great day came when I achieved the total retention of my semen whilst at the same time enjoying the full pleasurable sensation of orgasm – the intense emotional uplift, the quickening heart rate, the heavy breathing, the raised blood pressure, the tightening up of all my muscles, the pelvic thrusting and the jerking penis were all there, but the spunk wasn't. I had managed to completely separate orgasm from ejaculation, and to totally suppress the latter. My cock remained erect and, as soon as the orgasmic sensation had died away, I was ready to go again without any refractory state.

To me, at the time, this was nothing more than an extremely useful yoga trick. I didn't realize that I had accidentally hit upon something which is pretty unusual in men. The more I practised, the more efficient I became and latterly was able to suppress ejaculation during about 90% of orgasms. This was excellent news when it came to combining business with pleasure.

Time passed. I qualified and began to lead a slightly less frenetic sexual existence. Gradually the need to contain myself became less imperative and I began to lose the knack. I thought nothing more of it until I read an Editorial Comment in the British Journal of Sexual Medicine (Feb 1980) describing work in California by Professor Gordon B. Jensen and Mina B. Robbins. They clearly identified a male multiple orgasmic response in 13 men ranging from 22 to 56 years old. My interest in the subject was rekindled and, since then, it has come up many times amongst correspondents who have written to my 'Medical Advice Column' in various gay magazines.

One thing I learnt, and should pass on to others, is that it is usually best to allow ejaculation to occur at the final orgasm of any session. If it doesn't, a rather painful testicular ache and an uncomfortable sensation of genital engorgement can ensue which may last for some hours.

Contrary to the comment in your feature (4/90), that older men may find multiple orgasms more easy to achieve than younger men, I am less good at it nowadays than I was 38 years ago. However, there are still times when it is a great advantage to employ this very useful 'trick of the trade' ... during those three happy hours I spent in bed before I commenced this communication, for example!

Ray Hamble

Wankers Of The World Unite

Dear Tony: Thank you for publishing my follow-up article on 'Fucking Wankers' in issue 3/90 of Acorn. You will be pleased to know that it has resulted in three more contacts, one originating from Finland – which perhaps justifies the above title.

I am writing mainly to offer some feed-back from the letters I have received. First let me quote a delightful paragraph from an anonymous letter. The writer could not fully participate in my work, but his letter was a delight and encouragement. At the age of 78 he can be a delight and encouragement to us all: "Unfortunately my wife tends to regard intercourse as an unfortunate necessity, a prelude to getting herself pregnant, so that my sex life with females has been almost non-existent. The result has been that I have been thrown back on wanking for relief. Even now, at the age of 78, I need to do it two or even three times a week." Before proceeding with further comments, may I remind readers briefly of the procedures I follow when people write to me (see also Acorn, 7/89, pp.22-24). There is an initial test with the simple combination of towel, plastic bag and tapes, the latter items supplied by me. If successful, this is followed up with a specially designed sponge, with plastic lining. Finally comes the double sheath. The sponge is about the size of a car sponge, so I am not sure that one will be departing for Finland! However, my respondent there is practical with his hands, and our experiments will continue.

Two specific points have arisen from Acorn correspondence, both from the same individual. He sent me some super close-up photos of his cock in a state of maximum erection. Its direction was perpendicular to the body. He tells me that he can bend it up to lie parallel with the stomach, but it certainly looks as though this might be uncomfortable. My research so far has shown that, for at least half my respondents, the natural direction of their cocks, is such that it is uncomfortable to bend their cocks, when firmly erect, out at a right-angle to the body. I would be interested to hear from anyone who, like this correspondent, has a natural erection that is perpendicular to the body and for whom bending the cock up, parallel with the stomach, is uncomfortable.

The other surprise was this correspondent's preference for 'dry' masturbation. He is circumcised. He uses what looks like the centre of a kitchen-paper roll; this he lines with a soft woollen lining; he then applies baby talc. I would be most interested to hear, either direct or through the pages of Acorn, about those who like 'dry' methods. If you wish to write to me direct, the address is:

Andrew Ferguson, 11 Harcourt Close, Henley-on-Thames, Oxon, RG9 1UZ

The Gomco Circumcision Clamp

An example of this instrument recently reached the Editor. In the US it is said to be the most widely used circumcision instrument. Its introduction in 1935 and the development of the 'bloodless technique' by Yellen, improved by Brodie in 1939, did much to encourage neonatal circumcision. The operation became safer, the chances of infection were reduced, and the haemorrhage risk was practically eliminated.

The Gomco Clamp is made up of four parts: a bell (or cone) and stem, a plate with a hole slightly smaller than the rim of the bell, a levered arm (yoke), and a nut to tighten the clamp. The bell is introduced into the preputial cavity and the prepuce drawn over it. The hole of the plate is placed over the bell so that the prepuce is sandwiched between them. The arm is then fitted into place. When the nut is screwed tightly it pulls bell and plate together, exerting a crushing force on the prepuce where the bell and the plate meet. The clamp is left on for five minutes to achieve haemostasis; then the prepuce is excised, using the hole in the plate as a guide. The screw is loosened, the clamp disassembled and removed. Stitches are inserted, the penis is bandaged and allowed to heal. The clamp is made in a range of different sized bells and plates to fit different patients.

It is a simple operative procedure which can be readily carried out in the office. The following items are necessary: procaine 2 per cent (with vasoconstrictor), 27 gauge needle, 4 small haemostats, scissors, knife, probe, thumb forceps, needle holder, a piece of No.25 gauge annealed copper wire, No.00 plain catgut suture with atraumatic needle, and a proper size circumcision clamp.

The action of the clamp is dependent upon pressure being exercised upon a very narrow rim of tissue, which ensures adherence of the outer skin and the inner preputial surface. With that accomplished, it permits removal of the redundant tissue and temporarily prevents retraction of the blood vessels.

With the patient on the examining table, the penis is prepared and draped. Hertzler's method of local anaesthesia has been found the most satisfactory. Usually 3 to 5 cc of procaine are sufficient. A circular subcutaneous injection is made about midshaft; 1.5 to 2.5 cc are adequate. Following this, the foreskin is retracted and a series of injections are made about the corona. The solution is forced towards the base of the glans. Considerable care should be taken to prevent distortion of the tissue. The anaesthetic ring must completely encircle the glans and the frenulum should also be infiltrated. Usually 1.5 to 2.5 cc are ample.

If the foreskin is not retractable, a line of infiltration is made dorsally and a slit, just long enough to allow complete retraction, is made; then the coronal infiltration may be done. All adhesions are freed. The redundant tissue is grasped by haemostats at the junction of the skin and mucosa and then retracted. The cone, lubricated on its inner surface with a little vaseline, is slipped over the glans. The mass of tissue is then pulled over the cone. Tension on the haemostats and counter pressure on the cone permit almost any amount of tissue to be removed. However, care in applying the cone is necessary since this prevents any injury to the frenulum. Next a piece of copper wire is twisted about the redundant foreskin to maintain its relationship to the cone. The haemostats are removed and the base plate is slipped over foreskin and cone. The top plate is then hooked under the arms of the cone and slipped into its notch in the base plate and the screw is turned down until it is tight.

At the end of five minutes, the redundant tissue is removed by holding the knife parallel to the base plate and cutting about its circumference. The instrument is loosened and removed. This pressure has given temporary coaptation of the cut edges and haemostasis. Since neither of these is permanent, considerable care is necessary in suturing. The first step is a mattress stitch at the frenulum. Next, two interrupted sutures are placed on either side of this, to complete and maintain the triangle at the frenulum; then a mattress suture is placed dorsally. A simple running suture on either side with rather closely placed stitches completes the procedure.

Considerable care should be exercised in suturing; any large vessels that can be seen should have a mattress suture placed about them. With care in this step, the operation is practically bloodless. The sutures usually drop out on the fifth day and the wound is sealed in a week. Simple daily dressing are done. No unusual complications have been observed or reported.

It is, of course, necessary to have a cone which properly fits the glans. This can be determined by a trial fitting prior to the procedure. Following a preliminary report in 1935 of the use of his circumcision technique in 10 cases, Brodie presented a survey of 51 additional personal patients who had been operated upon, and data obtained by questionnaire on 102 more. In the cases reported, 6 required a clamp with the base diameter of 3.2 cm, 52 with a diameter of 2.9 cm; and 4 with a diameter of 2.6 cm.

The technique for using the Gomco clamp in infant circumcision was devised by Yellen (1935), who reported 500 cases. Brodie collected records of 300 additional infant circumcisions. There were no complications noted in this series of 800 cases. The method is essentially the same as in the adult, but a few precautions must be carefully noted.

All adhesions must be dissected free before applying the clamp. Ordinarily, stretching the prepuce will permit retraction for the dissection; if it does not, a dorsal slit is done. The slit should not be too long, however, since difficulty in keeping the cone in place will be encountered with a deep slit. Only a clamp of the proper size should be used. No sutures or anaesthesia are needed in the newborn. In older children a few interrupted sutures suffice.

Malaysian Experience

When I was 16 or 17, living in SE Asia, we had a Malay family chauffeur, Mohammed Rahbi. He was about 30, quite handsome in a stocky frame, dark brown in body complexion, Islamic, circumcised in his early teens, with a very large and fat black glans, almost no penis shaft, and very small testicles: indeed they were the smallest I have ever seen, though his scrotum hung black and loose. Although of great girth, it measured about 2.5" flaccid. He said it erected to about 5". The glans rim is very prominent, and I never saw it covered by any surplus shaft skin. His public hair was often cropped or shaven. Though he did not tell me it was an Islamic requirement, I was told this recently by a Turkish friend.

His cock seemed to consist only of glans – and what a wonderful cock-head it was. I could pull, squeeze, and torture it beyond normal endurance, but he never complained. Strangely he never erected in my hands, though his wife became pregnant during our relationship. His small balls were similarly tortured by me and he was likewise resilient.

His attitude was totally passive. He never made the first move, but whenever I asked for his cock, he never refused. No matter how tired or how inconvenient it was for him, if there was a moment's privacy he would always open his fly or lift his sarong (depending what he was wearing) at my request. Indeed, he told me that I was the owner of his cock, while he was its custodian for my enjoyment – a custodian had no right of refusal. How I loved him for this.

One day we were alone together in a secluded part of the house, except for his baby son, aged about 3, whom he was carrying. He had just come from his bath, and they were wearing only sarongs. I jokingly asked whether his son had inherited his big glans. He smiled and without a word, removed his own and his son's sarongs. Sitting down with parted legs, he put his son on his lap and, without a word, invited me to look. He had already retracted his son's foreskin, which would be circumcised in puberty. The boy's cock was remarkably similar to his own: the same big black glans without much shaft and the small balls, although it was impossible to tell how the child's cock would develop. When he put the boy down between his legs, thinking his father's cock was some new toy, he began to play with it. Rahbi said he intended to let his son grow up familiar with his naked body, just as he frequently saw his own father's nudity when women members of the family were not around – an unusual attitude for a Muslim, but then, he was unique.

He told me his unusual circumcision experience, when he was about 14 or 15. His father took him along to the English doctor who practised in the town. The doctor, putting his patient at ease prior to getting him to undress, began to talk freely and easily about cocks and the advantages of circumcision. The conversation quickly became uninhibited. The doctor was a well-built man in his 40s, with a beard, and admitted that he was circumcised. Rahbi's father jokingly remarked that he must have a big cock, as he had heard that Europeans had big ones. The doctor said he would satisfy their curiosity, if they were discrete, and stripped off.

Neither Rahbi nor his father had seen a naked European, and the doctor's cock, large hairy pink balls and brown pubic hair proved a startling sight. When the doctor suggested that Rahbi and his father undress, they needed no further prompting. Rahbi told me that his father's cock was very similar to his own but that the glans was even larger. The doctor told Rahbi that after circumcision his penis would probably look like his father's: big, black, dry, desensitized, and good to play with. By now Rahbi had lost all his inhibitions as the doctor got to work. So Rahbi was circumcised by a naked English doctor with an 8" penis, attended by his naked father with a 4.5" penis.

Rahbi's father had been a village fisherman, spending most of his life in the water in a brief loin-cloth. When out in more remote waters he was always totally naked.

Rahbi was always with him and grew up in his father's nude company. Sometimes when out on a long trip, his father would suddenly have the sex urge, his penis erecting in full view of his son. The father would sit down quietly and masturbate, so Rahbi learnt sex young. When puberty came, Rahbi masturbated as unselfconsciously as did his father.

H.C. – London SW6

Final Call For 1991 Subscriptions

Subscriptions to the Acorn Newsletter for 1991 are now due. One of our principal costs is postage, which has risen substantially since we first set our price at £10. With regret, therefore, the 1991 subscription goes up to £12. As renewing members will know, the newsletter covers topics such as the foreskin, circumcision, and related matters as masturbation, genital development, modifications such as piercing and infibulation, etc. Membership is international and is open to both individuals and couples. Back numbers and other publications may also be ordered on the form below. Please complete and return it to Acorn.

Date: .....

Please complete/delete as appropriate:

Please enter my subscription to ACORN 1991 @ £12 = £

Please send the following back issues:

ACORN 1990 ..... (number) issues ..... @ £1.25 = £

OR all 8 issues for 1990 (122 pages) @ £10 = £

ACORN 1989 ..... (number) issues ..... @ £1.25 = £

OR all 8 issues for 1989 (122 pages) @ £10 = £

ACORN 1988 ..... (number) issues ..... @ £1 = £

OR all 8 issues for 1988 (86 pages) @ £8 = £

Please supply:

..... copies of the 202 page book,
'Circumcision: an ethnomedical study' @ £20 = £

..... copies of the 25 page article,
'By Rites a Man', on Kipsigis male initiation; }
the 10 page article, }
'Keyo initiation', on African male initiation; } @ £8 = £ and the 17 page article, 'The } Dangerous Journey' (male initiation in Zaire) } _____

I enclose cash/Postal Order/cheque/draft for £
in a securely sealed envelope. =====

Cheques etc should be made payable to Acorn. Mailings will be securely packaged in plain brown envelopes and posted by second class mail to the address given by the Acorn member. Orders for the book will be despatched separately from orders for the Acorn Newsletter. Receipt of an order will normally be acknowledged by despatch of the items requested. Please allow 28 days for delivery.

Mailing address:

ACORN

1991 Issue No 1

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Medical Rites	Anthony	Page 2
Circumcision Endorsement	F.K.	Page 3
Shonky	J.D.A.	Page 4
The First Rites Of Man	S.L.	Page 6
That Old Circumcision Chestnut	Andree	Page 11
Nature Study	Ms D.C.	Page 12
You Name It	M.L.	Page 14
What A Lot Of Balls	Miss S.S.	Page 14
Your Sexual Status	D.A.	Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to the first edition of your magazine for 1991, and we hope that this year will bring as many interesting contributions as in the past. It's only as good as you make it, and you certainly have done that so far.

Tony, as he wrote a couple of editions ago, has been finding it hard to fit this work in with a busy career and has asked me to have a stab at editorialising (nice word, that). All, we hope, will go on as usual, but we have decided that I shall be known as David Acorn.

Most of the contents in this edition is a backlog of contributions that haven't been able to find their way in previously. I'm particularly glad to see contributions from the female sector; after all, they are the ones who mostly use the commodity in question. Also a long article on the ritual side.

Confidentiality

Contributions are identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for greater anonymity or, conversely, you state that you would like a name and/or address published.

David Acorn

Medical Rites

I was disturbed by the description of seeming misconduct towards the prepuce at medical inspections. Those examined must have been taken aback in both senses, but decapping was necessary for a full glans inspection. I can recall a Naval rating telling the Medical Officer, "Do that again, sir, and I'll shoot my load."

When traction was put on a decades old circumcision scar to 'test it', for no reason, to the point of redness, the misconduct would have advanced to indecency.

I was told by one who had served on wartime Merchant Navy convoy duties that sailors reaching the United States were given a compulsory 'medical'. Seamen were examined in batches, the medic greeting each one with a strongly accented, "Cocks out, skins back." Men were required to present the denuded glans which, I feel, to be more acceptable both morally and ethically. This is automatic to the Japanese to whom appearing 'Kawakamuri' (skin covered) would offend against decency. In public, the European would quickly draw his retracted foreskin forward, but the special needs of a medical examination should override normal etiquette.

My own remembered experience of medical examinations started at 10 years old at primary school. News of the lady doctor, the dropping of shorts and underpants, the curious pencil lift, and the tap if arousal should take place (naughty boy), raged like brushfire through the affected classes. Boys went in one by one, and when it came to my turn I felt very apprehensive. Before my underpants had reached knee level the lady announced “That’s alright.” I didn’t even see the pencil, let alone feel its varnished edge. Only one boy in my class met with similar nonchalance; we felt disappointment when hearing the bravado of the others.

Works’ medicals over the years have become more thorough. My recent comment to a colleague was, “It’s so thorough, they don’t leave a stone unturned.” The five second flash for the “Drop ‘em and cough” has extended to “Everything off” before a thorough going over, with a quick cough at the end. Never has the term ‘circumcised’ arisen from the lips of the examining physician, but I have had to face the nurse acting as medical secretary. I dreaded the question “Any surgical procedures?”, and always answered “Tonsils out”. Then a pause, blood surging to my head, and a deepening blush as I continued “I, er, was circumcised”. One inquisitive sister followed that up with “When and why?”, leaving my face as ruddy as a fresh circumcision scar itself. For one ‘topped and tailed’, I had to wait some time for the reassuring comfort of a lady supervisor who remarked, “I like men who have been under the knife”.

Anthony – North Devon

Circumcision Endorsement

(Letter From Another Magazine)

I would like to add a vigorous and knowledgeable endorsement to the ongoing debate on the merits of circumcision. I had this operation at the age of 21 after a prolonged period of recurrent problems with my foreskin. I have had no problems since and have never regretted the decision. It has been 10 years since my circumcision, and I can attest that there has been no loss of sensation in my penis.

I also have an enhanced self image. Though this benefit is intangible, I consider it just as important as the medical aspects of this procedure. Being uncircumcised in this day and age for men under 40 means being different. [This is in the U.S.A. – Editor] During maturation ‘being different’ can cause great emotional stress. I can cite several examples in my own experience. When I was in the 9th. and 10th. grades we were required to take swimming. In the all-male classes, due to problems with suit fibres in the pool filters, the boys all swam naked. I can still remember 30 or 40 of us, all nude, standing in line or sitting along the edge of the pool with our legs dangling in the water. Being uncircumcised meant being one of only three in that group. Even if nobody made a wisecrack, I felt extremely different. It is normal to compare yourself with others, and I remember seeing eyes on me, checking me out.

I’m sure many of the boys didn’t even realise that they had been surgically altered – to them ‘cut’ was natural and I was not. Sadly, ignorant as I was about such things, I entertained the same thoughts. It was not until some time later, about the time I was 17, that I finally understood the difference between the cut and the uncut. I was glad to know that I was not a freak, but I was still unhappy about being different.

Though I had thought about having the procedure done and had wished that it had been done at birth, ultimately it was the onset of troubles with balanitis at 20 that precipitated my surgery. Two physicians at my college clinic had recommended the procedure, then treated me for the inflammations.

I was in the hospital for 5 days for the procedure. I had excellent care and felt that my privacy was greatly respected. I was examined by my doctor, a resident, and an intern prior to the surgery. However, I was not given an enema prior to the operation and was not shaved. After the surgery I awoke to a mild pain. The nurse who changed my bandage told me that during the operation I had bled less than 20cc. I still had erections at night and were painful, for which I was given painkillers. I found that these were very effective in lowering these painful erections. I was sore for a week and was fully healed in a month. There has been no loss of pleasure since.

I feel better about my body and my genitals. I have swum in the nude during men's hours at the college pool and am not self-conscious about it. This is a liberating feeling.

I had a medical problem. Since my circumcision I have it no more. For the first time in my life I enjoy being nude in front of people. If you are considering having it done, I recommend you do it, and if you have a son I think it is the kindest thing you can do for him.

F.K. – Michigan

Shonky

Reading R.B.W.'s lament for his lost foreskin in past issues struck an immediate chord with me and I feel he should know that he is not alone in the sense of deprivation and unhappiness caused by an unthinking act on the part of a well meaning parent.

I too lost my foreskin to trendy notions in the face of medical thinking, and although I can't claim to have suffered as a smaller child the way he did, my problems became only too apparent when I reached puberty and started getting seriously interested in sex. After the humiliating discovery that I was not acceptable to take part in a wanking game because the girl who organised it found my penis difficult to manipulate, I went on to find that I was condemned to a second class love life when I grew to maturity.

In a desire to see the world I joined the army for a 3-year stint and found myself living in an ancient barrack-block in Gibraltar. The bed next to mine was occupied by one of the most repulsive human beings I have seen; a latterday Neanderthal, no less. He was covered from head to foot in bristles, had a receding forehead which barely separated his eyebrows from his hairline, and I swear his knuckles brushed the ground when he walked. This fellow's one redeeming feature though, was an extremely impressive and well-appointed cock, which he never stopped fingering. He would spend a lot of his spare time flopped out naked on his pit reading comics (or rather looking at the pictures) with his cock lying on his belly like a huge white slug, and the whole time he would play with the wretched thing, totally oblivious to the rude remarks he got. I was fascinated to see how he would lie there winding his hose-like foreskin round his finger and then stretching it out to an unbelievable extent, well beyond his navel, before letting it spring back into place like a length of elastic.

As the only circumcised man in the unit I was lost in wonderment to see just how different and exotic-looking his streamlined length was from my own tightly clipped prim looking prick, and, I have to say it, was consumed with envy. And not without very good reason. Of course the other fellows had all cottoned on instantly to the fact that I was circumcised and I was christened 'Shonky', despite my protestations that there wasn't a drop of Jewish blood in my veins.

What really hurt though was the fact that the small select band of WRAC girls in the camp also called me Shonky, which brings me onto the nub of this tale. Most of the girls were fairly free with their favours, and being in tremendous demand, could pick and choose at whim. But after a couple of them had been out with me once and satisfied their curiosity about my altered organ, I was dropped in favour of the other chaps in the unit. To my intense annoyance my Neanderthal roommate was the one most in demand. I can tell you, my faith in British womanhood took a devastating blow when I realised that these girls, who were all specialists with A levels, without exception, preferred a sub-human as a boyfriend to a fine chap like me! It became sadly clear that, whilst these females might have heads full of brains, their basic instincts were located between their legs, and there was absolutely no connection between the two.

From remarks during conversations, I gathered that one thing these girls liked about my ape-like friend was the dense pelt of fur that covered him. But one of them, who had overdone the lager, let the cat out of the bag when she giggled and said he was a sexy beast and had the best cock in the garrison. She then looked at me and giggled again. "Pity about yours, Shonky" she said, and I could have crawled under a stone. The thing is, those girls knew what they liked and liked what they knew. What they didn't know about was cocks like mine. Several said it was odd looking and one said that it made her teeth go on edge at the thought of having an internal organ permanently on show.

I consequently found myself excluded from the favoured group who enjoyed the goodwill of these girls: my cock was a figure of fun and disqualified me as a serious sex partner.

So I know how you feel, mate. But don't let it get you down too much. I eventually met a girl who couldn't care less about my 'alteration', and this improved my confidence to the point where I almost stopped thinking about it. But I still hanker after the intact state, and shall never forgive my father for overruling my mother and having it done.

J.D.A. – Herts

The First Rites Of Man

(An article by Steven Levy in Esquire Magazine, May 1981)

The day is hot, but the mohel's Oldsmobile diesel station wagon is air-conditioned. The car is a concession to his comfort and, especially to his image, which had threatened to get out of hand. The sports cars and vintage motor cycles that he collects and restores in an 8-bay garage alongside his tree-shaded house are fine for many things, and they give him his second greatest pleasure, his greatest being his two children aged 6 and 8. But sports cars are no longer for working. People had come to call him the Jaguar mohel. He prefers to be known simply as the mohel (pronounce it oil with an m).

His work is sensitive, and it depends on people trusting him. He has earned respect and takes pains not to jeopardise it. But nothing he does will eliminate the jokes. They are a hazard of his rare occupation: his is a public function, yet many of his audiences are unprepared – physically, spiritually, and emotionally – to witness what he does.

What he does is this: he performs ritual circumcision. He removes the foreskins of 8 day-old Jewish males. He recites Hebrew blessings, he names the children, and he fulfills the covenant between God and Abraham: "You shall circumcise the flesh of the foreskin".

It is no insignificant pact. Abraham's circumcision of Isaac with a sharp stone marked the boy as a Jew. Though circumcision wasn't unknown then, it had been performed mostly on adolescents as a pagan coming of age ceremony. Performing this act ritually upon infants represents a blood commitment to monotheism. The officiating mohel, as circumciser, literally makes Jewish males Jews.

It is the 4th of July. Jews and gentiles alike have postponed their labours in order to celebrate America's independence. The mohel works. Jewish law holds that nothing – not the Sabbath, not even a high holiday – supercedes the obligation to perform circumcision on the eighth day of life. Exceptions are granted only in case of the infant's poor health or prematurity.

As is customary, the parents of the baby open the house to guests for the bris, or circumcision, (the word means, literally 'covenant') ceremony. In the past, mothers would maintain an all night vigil, staying by the cribside to ward off any evil that might bedevil the boy on the fatal day. Now, instructions to the parents are less exotic: have handy a box of 4 x 4 gauze pads, extra diapers, some Betadine antiseptic ointment, a tiny bottle of formula or glucose solution, and a hungry baby.

“There is something incredible about the biblical command to circumcise on the 8th. day.” Joel Shoulson muses. “Because that day is ideal – hemostatically and dermatologically – for the operation.” Shoulson prides himself on his expertise in both the liturgical and the medical aspects of his work. In the latter, he is so proficient that he frequently acts as consultant to doctors in correcting faulty hospital circumcisions – of which there are more than the medical profession would care to admit. Though no formal medical training is required of mohels, Shoulson survived a rigorous apprenticeship with a master teacher, a man who has helped to modernise the circumcision procedure with new tools, new research, and a new compassion. The teacher was Rabbi Morris Shoulson, Joel’s father and circumciser.

Joel Shoulson was born to his role but was reluctant to assume it. For generations the Shoulsons had been rabbis and mohels. The pressure was great for Joel to follow and take his place in the hereditary mandala. As soon as the youngster was tall enough to see over the circumcision table, he would observe the rite. He would accompany his father to bris’n, setting the table with the appropriate tools. One day, at a hospital bris, the elder Shoulson made the usual announcement that no one was required to stay for the surgical part of the ceremony. Everybody left but the 16 year old Joel. Morris stepped back from the table and said to his son, “You do this one.”

“Was I nervous?” recalls Joel with a smile. “Yes.” Morris Shoulson was not. “I have trained over 115 mohels,” he later explained, “and there comes a time in the training of every one of them when they ask, “Rabbi, excuse me for being blunt – but how do you know how much to take off?” Joel was different. He was the only one to ask the right question. “Daddy,” he said to me “how do you know how much to leave on?”

But the extensive training to become one of the nation’s few full-time mohels (the vast majority are part-timers) had to wait. A spell in the army as a photographer and then rabbinical training but deciding against ordination. It was not until it looked as if Morris Shoulson would turn to another as his successor that Joel decided that he wanted to do it. After another year of learning the finer points and details he was ready to become a future craftsman.

“There are so many things to go wrong,” he says, “and the scandal is that some mohels are... butchers. People just don’t know; they take more care choosing a podiatrist. The local Board of Rabbis certifies mohels for competence, but some don’t bother to take the tests and perform anyway. It’s perfectly legal.

Joel Shoulson has tried to restore sensitivity to the rite. It is not an ingredient of many Jewish circumcisions, in which the mohel is a strange and ominous visitor, cloaked in orthodox garb, rigidly performing an archaic ceremony. Joel himself realised that his performances were emotionally inadequate when, several years ago, "I looked over the table and realised that those people had no idea why I was there." This feeling was reinforced when he circumcised his own son and, for the first time, empathised with the fears and confusion of the parents. He resolved to contemporise the ceremony, to make it relevant to the participants – and to the mohel.

In the process, he elevated himself from a technician to a respected figure in the Philadelphia area. Since many of his clients are people who haven't been in a synagogue for years, the mohel meets a larger public than rabbis do. And in the religious community this mohel has come to be regarded as a special figure. He carries both his religious and his secular authority with distinction, and unlike many in his profession, he does not just cut and run. He explains his actions forthrightly and precisely, even as the parents watch him take a scalpel to their newborn boy.

This change was difficult, and important, because the prevalence of circumcision throughout America had created a fuzzy idea of the religious rite among American Jews. For gentiles, the procedure is similar only in a raw surgical sense. The site is a hospital and not a home. The baby is strapped – arms and legs – to a plastic form-fitting board for long minutes, waiting for a doctor. Often, hospitals will line up several babies – all males in the nursery from 3 to 5 days old – and when the doctor arrives (the wait varies from a minute to the best part of an hour) he or she performs the task mechanically, lingering over no infant. No anaesthetic is used. Parents are not present. Many obstetricians avoid performing this low-status, non-lucrative operation, and it is the interns and residents, relative novices, who have circumcised most of America. The procedure is optional, and though doctors give the impression that circumcision is as routine as cutting the umbilical cord, it is illegal to circumcise a child without his parents specific permission. Of course, the prophylactic rationale for the operation has prevailed in America, and circumcision is the norm. But some gentile doctors, knowing the haphazard quality of hospital circumcisions, choose to have experienced mohels perform the operation on their own sons.

In Philadelphia, Joel is the one the doctors usually turn to, though gentile babies form only a tiny percentage of his cases. He has conducted clinics for doctors wishing to improve their own circumcision skills. His witnesses have included an audience of several hundred in a hospital observation chamber and thousands of others attending some of the twenty bris'n he performs each week. He also performs circumcisions on adult converts to Judaism, his oldest case being 72 years old. Asked if he has ever harmed any of his 20,000 patients, he replies, "Not to my knowledge, and I would have known." He relies on keeping his record perfect: carrying insurance would mean raising his rates from the average 100 dollars he now charges. Working without a liability doesn't bother him. "I'm doing second generation circumcisions now, so I must be doing something right."

He pulls up to a split-level house in the suburbs, where a sloping lawn is dotted with people holding cocktail glasses. Some are wearing suits, others casually dressed. He enters a living room filled with people and seeks the parents. The mother is almost slim again. The father is wearing white shirt and jeans. A couple in their late twenties, they are doing well.

Apparently this is not a day that the mother has been looking forward to. Her smile is of forced bravery as Shoulson leads them into the kitchen. "Now, I'd like to warn you," the mohel says, "that several things are going to make the baby unhappy today. Not the circumcision itself, because, unlike his parents, he doesn't know what's going to happen, and he's unable to localise pain at his age. But he will be restrained and on his back, and babies don't like that. Also, the spray I use to freeze the area is cold, and he'll respond. But that's why he'll be crying – not because of what I'm going to do with the surgical tools." The mother nods with a trace of scepticism.

The circumcision area must have light and space for observers to crowd around; the surface for the baby to lie on must be firm and high. Almost always this means the kitchen or dining room table. In this case the mohel approves the kitchen table and sets out his own sort of silverware. From a small steriliser he removes two scissor-like hemostats, a scalpel, an odd-looking, squarish metal clamp, and a bottle of Cetacaine dental anaesthetic. Other tools include a can of skin-freeze, some maroon-coloured Betadine ointment squeezed on a gauze pad, and a folding board upholstered in blue. This circumcision board was designed by Joel and his father, and will allow the baby to lie down as comfortably as possible, his legs restrained by soft straps stabilised by velcro strips. A bottle of wine and a special cup are brought to the table. The mohel leaves to wash up.

In his absence there are jokes. People drift into the kitchen, amiably discussing whether they will stay in the room to watch the mohel work. As the men enter, they put on shiny black yarmulkes (skullcaps) with practiced solemnity. Some previously gregarious guests fall into a throat-clearing silence. The parents exchange distracted small-talk as the mohel returns, having replaced his sports jacket with a white smock. He nods to the guests, smiling reassuringly. A few nod back, acknowledging his command of the situation, recognising that, from this point, the stage is his.

A grandmother enters, carrying the baby. The tiny newcomer senses that something is up. His pinched hobbit-like face twitches with what seems like pained annoyance. He is handed to his mother.

"I'd like everyone to stay in the room," says the mohel, "at least for the non-surgical part of the ceremony." More guests enter until there are about thirty people in the normally roomy kitchen. There are three parts to this," says the mohel, his voice rising automatically to the level required to hold the attention of all, "and I would certainly recommend that you stay for the first. The second is the surgical part, which takes about 20 seconds, and you're all welcome to stay for that, too." He turns to the mother. "I strongly recommend that you stay for that," he says, and she nods slowly. He repeats what he has said to the parents about what might make the baby unhappy, and after explaining that the third part of the ceremony – the naming – will require everyone's presence, he begins.

First the mohel recites blessings as the baby is passed to the godparents, to the parents, and to the sandek, a man chosen as the honoured elder patron. In the past, the sandek was responsible for holding the child on a pillow nesting in his lap during the actual circumcision. Joel Shoulson, like all but the most orthodox mohels, does not favour that custom. Instead the mohel carefully lowers the baby to the blue padded board and rests the child's head on a blanket, under which he tucks the baby's arms. He wraps the soft straps on the board around the baby's legs. The board may then be placed on the sandek's lap, but this time it is not. By now the child is whimpering.

A few faces turn grey, and one or two people leave the kitchen. Joel has seen people pass out while watching his handiwork (seldom women, almost never the parents) and can recognise a spectator in distress. Everything here is smooth though. Working without hesitation, but deliberately, the mohel removes the baby's nappy and slips a clean one round the groin, leaving the shaft of the penis exposed. "The circumcision table is the first place you see that all men aren't created equal", he has noted. He sprays the shaft with the skin-freeze, then takes a hemostat and grips the foreskin with it.

Why must the foreskin go? According to Jewish law, it is unclean, not kosher. Some uncircumcised males have problems in cleaning underneath the foreskin, and for this reason, most American males are circumcised. A controversy still stews over its necessity, even though retention of the foreskin has been linked with cancer. In Judaism, the reason is not health; it goes back to Abraham's covenant, an act of faith that has spanned centuries.

The keeper of this covenant now dips a hemostat in the maroon ointment and slips it underneath the foreskin, stretching the skin to separate any stray membranes attaching it to the head of the penis. This second hemostat, fastened opposite the first, is used to hold the foreskin away from the head. Moving fluidly, the mohel takes the metal clamp – it is called a Mogen (Hebrew for shield) clamp – and angles its open jaws to trap the foreskin. When the clamp closes, the head remains on the clamp's underside while the foreskin is pushed above. With an almost imperceptible movement of his hand, the mohel slices off the foreskin with his scalpel, quickly whisking it away. (Later it will be discarded.) As he cuts, he recites a Hebrew blessing in a low voice. It has, indeed, taken only 20 seconds.

Removing the clamp, he pulls back the skin bunched around the top of the infant's tiny shaft. Shining and red – not with blood, since the firm-closing Mogen clamp has prevented any serious bleeding – a perfect glans is exposed. There are murmurs of approval, and intense wailing from the owner. The mohel sprays the area with Cetacaine, and in 10 seconds the anaesthetic takes effect. The baby accepts the glucose formula and the mohel holds the baby.

"You can take pictures now," he says, "but not of the table, though. In twenty years time the boy might not appreciate it." From his bag, the mohel extracts a tiny white yarmulke and places it on the newly circumcised child. He begins his spiel, an explanation of the origins of the ceremony, and then recites the prayers that will give the child its name.

Finally, the kiddush – the drinking of wine. The mohel dips a gauze pad in the wine cup and puts it to the infant's lips. The lips twist with displeasure, then take the droplets in. The mohel nods in delight and everyone laughs. "He's Jewish now", says the mohel. The mother holds her son, not hearing. Eight days old, and the baby has taken a step towards manhood.

The mohel has three more cases today, the 4th. of July 1980: the 20th. of Tammuz 5740. The day is hot and he misses his own children. But the job has its rewards.

That Old Circumcision Chestnut Letter to Health & Efficiency Magazine.

Always a naturist and a regular reader of H & E for thirty years, I note the same three subjects cropping up again and again:-

1. Whether to shave the pubic area or not.
2. Fear of erections in public.
3. Should they circumcise their penis or not.

Lots of advice always, but never mine! So, here's my point of view.

With or without 'fur' a naturist is always beautiful on the beach. If my husband and I shave each other it's not for the aesthetics, but for the sexual pleasure caused in the course of our lovemaking.

As for erections, I have never been traumatised by the sight of an erect penis on the beach, a condition which is not an intentional happening.

'Do you have obsessions?', in the last issue, discusses again the question of circumcision. If all circumcised naturists feel that their penis is mutilated, then they should wear a G-string.

Those that arrive at the state through religion, that's a terrible inhuman practice to cut an innocent child who is unaware of it. An affront to freedom and the Rights of Man, fixed in this way for life. Some, though, do it for hygiene, with freedom of choice. Others, because of some fantasy about their body, or because they think it makes their love life better.

I'm 63 and have been a nudist for 40 years. I have had, and still have, a complete sexual life. I've had circumcised lovers, and others who were not, but they've all given me orgasms each as good as the other. The vaginal pleasure of a woman can't be augmented in the least by circumcision, because, anyway, the skin must draw back when the penis penetrates. The pleasure for a circumcised man would be inferior, the glans being permanently without skin would rub constantly against the material of the underwear, and after some years become less sensitive (that's proven medically). Conversely, the penis that is only denuded during the game of love keeps all its sensibilities for the contact with the vagina.

Hygiene? Come now, a man knows well how to keep himself clean under his foreskin.

Andree – Roanne, France

Nature Study

One of the myths perpetuated by the naturist press in search of respectability, is that nudism is totally separated from sexuality. According to them, unselfconsciousness reigns supreme, with no one giving their own or anyone else's willy a second thought. This totally ignores the theory that nudists are impelled by an equal measure of exhibitionism and voyeurism, which, I'm sure, is much closer to the truth.

My own experience as an unprotesting conscript (I was brought up in the tradition, both parents being keen naturists) certainly supports the less sanctimonious view. Although I was used from the earliest to seeing people naked on holiday, the rest of the year was spent in a clothed environment, so there was always an impact whenever the time came round for me to confront winkle en masse.

Consequently, I and all my childhood friends, were intensely conscious of what we and others had between our legs. I became a compulsive cock-watcher, and quickly discovered the astonishing variety, in particular the immediately identifiable appearance of circumcision, although only the middle-aged and elderly seemed to be affected. More of this later.

Children's natural curiosity towards sex and urge to experiment are made so much easier in a nudist environment: far from being unconscious of each other's parts, we were forever calling attention to them. There was no end of groping and touching up, quite openly if adults weren't present, with the girls more often than not taking the initiative. I used to love embarrassing the boys by teasing them to erection, either by touching, or at a distance by some unspeakably rude or provocative act – like standing over a potted geranium and giving it a prolonged watering whilst nonchalantly engaging them in conversation. Pissing games were very popular because:- a) they were 'not done' in the outside world, and b) they were so easy to perform before a selected audience.

My observations over the years brought home to me the individuality of men's cocks, and I discovered that they often have a character totally different from that of their owners. For example, I once saw a cock like a rolling pin sported by the most shocking wimp as ever had sand kicked in his face, whereas it was often the case that a fine figure of a man had a tiny little dicky such as to make a toddler blush.

To return to the subject of circumcision. My experiments with the boys in our group had instructed me in the art of pulling back the foreskin to reveal the same knob which was permanently on display on men who had been circumcised. I asked my Mum about it. She looked embarrassed and told me it was called circumcision and that it was no longer practised. She tried to change the subject when I asked why my Dad and brothers had not been done like the chap in the next chalet, and said it was a matter of personal choice, but was not done much these days as it served no useful purpose.

Another thing which tickled me and my friends was a couple of men who tried to pretend that they were circumcised by keeping their foreskins permanently retracted. It looked so funny to see the bunch of skin bulging out behind the knob. I tried to get the boys in our group to try, but they all found it uncomfortable except for one who succeeded in keeping it back the whole afternoon – until his Mum caught him and made him pull it forward again, telling him it was rude and he'd do himself a mischief. In fact the poor kid got his exposed knob sunburnt during those hours and was in agony for days.

Finally, I was able to fill in the gaps my mother had so tantalisingly left in my knowledge about circumcision when a woman with a boy who'd been circumcised moved in. We got friendly and one day I asked him why his plonk looked so different from my brothers'. His mum overheard me and gave us all a lecture on the subject, demonstrating on my brother's foreskin with a felt pen where the cut had been made, and pulling his foreskin back to show where on the lining the scar would occur – my brother of course let the side down by getting a monstrous horn on, much to our amusement. Apparently the boy had suffered from an infection after getting it caught in his trouser zip. The poor kid felt very self-conscious about it and tended to keep in the background.

My verdict? I don't think I'm qualified to say very much since the males of my age group are almost exclusively uncircumcised, and I've only had one circumcised sexual partner. But I think I go along with a woman who wrote to one of the naturist publications recently (letter above) on the subject, saying that there was no difference as far as a woman's satisfaction was concerned, but that the pleasure for a circumcised man would be inferior. She went on to say that the operation was an affront to freedom and the Rights of Man, which I think may be over the top, but I do think it should be reserved for those that need it or want it. Since the lady had 40 years of experience with circumcised and uncircumcised men, I bow to her greater knowledge. The lady was French: is that significant, do you think?

Ms D.C. – London

You Name It

I wonder if any other members share my feelings of irritation at being described as ‘uncircumcised’.

The word has biblical connotations of being unclean, unchristian, a Philistine, a person to be derided. Yet Christian teaching is that men need not be, arguably should not be, circumcised, though this is generally overlooked.

I see that in the U.S.A. the term non-circumcised is used for this very reason, and this is more acceptable. Alternatively, not having had our penises messed about with, could we not be described as intact.

Those of us who have foreskins represent over 80% of the world’s population and probably over 90% in Britain and Europe. I suspect we wouldn’t mind being called normal.

M.L. – Gwent

What A Lot Of Balls

There must be a lot of girls like me around, who hear about circumcision and its benefits through Forum and the like, but who have little chance of satisfying any resultant curiosity, since hardly any younger men are circumcised these days.

I first became interested in the subject through being a keen supporter of a rugby club. I used to watch all their home fixtures and as a result was offered a place on the bus for away fixtures as well. These little trips proved to be a fund of information – and entertainment – on subjects I’d never otherwise given a thought to. For example, at the end of one match on a bitterly cold day, the scrum-half Dai decided for a joke to invite me into our side’s dressing room to coincide with the boys’ return from the shower. So, plucking up courage, I marched in, to be confronted by a shocked silence, as I stood there with 15 bollock-naked rugby players, and asked nervously, “Where’s the ladies, please?”, followed by a roar of scandalised amusement. After that it became standard practice for me to sit in the warmth of the changing room, pretending not to notice, as cocks of all shapes and sizes flopped about on every side, the boys growing less self-conscious and more boastful as the novelty wore off. My main impression then was how tiny their willies were from the cold until they’d warmed up in the shower. I may say that I was considered a ‘good sport’.

Although it was a tremendous giggle to join the boys at their ablutions, I did feel rather conspicuous, and to spread the load I invited Joan, one of the livlier girls from work who said she'd love to see such a sight, to join me on the next match. She came into the dressing room with me to the appreciation of the fifteen naked blokes, but had such a fit of the giggles that she wet herself. Which brings me onto the next point.

On our away trips we always retired to a local hostelry for a celebration before starting home, and the boys put away vast quantities of ale. On the way home we'd have to stop for a pee break with the lads lining up at the side of the bus to relieve themselves, whilst Joan and I had a grandstand view from our seat on the bus. One day we helped celebrate and drank a few too many G & T's in the process and as a result we found ourselves feeling merry but in extreme discomfort. When the bus stopped at the layby to let the lads drain off, instead of sitting there for the rest of the journey with our legs crossed, I thought it would be a bit of a laugh to strike a blow for sexual equality. As the last player got off, Joan and I slipped off too, and joined the end of the line of boozy tinkling players. Standing in the shadows so far unnoticed, we pulled our skirts up, tucked our knickers to the sides, and took a standing pee, almost finishing before anyone noticed. Of course, when they realised what was happening, a roar of joyous disbelief went up, but by that time we had dropped our skirts and scuttled back on the bus.

By now you'll be wondering what all this has got to do with your chosen subject. The thing is, quite a lot of the rude songs the boys sing on the coach (to the untold amusement of Joan and myself) concern circumcision, and poke fun at circumcised cocks. Since it was only too evident from our visits to the changing rooms that none of the lads were circumcised, I couldn't understand why it figured so much in the songs. Dai told me the songs dated from years ago when lots of the players were circumcised, but that nowadays the only teams likely to contain circumcised players were public school ones. By now my curiosity was well and truly whetted, but first, an observation.

Anyone who watches football has to be impressed by the amount players fiddle with their cocks. It struck me that they must all have itchy foreskins and need circumcising, but I'm sure that really it's just to remind themselves what real men they are. Anyway, from my viewpoint in the bus, I was able to ascertain that the boys played with themselves while having a pee. One or two pulled their foreskins right back to pee, but most didn't bother, but pulled and stretched them afterwards to milk out the last drops.

To continue, I was dying to know what a circumcised cock looked like, and to compare it with my boyfriend's long muscular foreskin. Joan provided the answer: she offered to introduce me to an ex-boyfriend who was circumcised. The result was that I went out with this fellow two or three times and was able to satisfy my curiosity once and for all.

Your readers might (or might not) be disappointed to hear that there was no glorious revelation – the difference between the cut and the uncut cock, as far as female satisfaction is concerned, is no big deal; and as far as I personally am concerned, whether a guy's circumcised or not has hardly any bearing on his desirability as a boyfriend or a lover. But I do have one or two personal views on the subject. Firstly, I'm not sure I'm all that happy about the ethical and the aesthetical aspects of disfiguring a boy's genitals for such a questionable benefit. Also, a plus, as far as my regular boyfriend is concerned, is the fact that on the thrust stroke his extra skin bunches up around the base of his cock, giving that extra bulk just where it's needed. This was noticeably absent with my circumcised friend. Also, I reckon that every circumcised cock should have a set of instructions with it for the benefit of a girl who likes to give a 'manual'.

Miss S.S. – Harrow

Your Sexual Status

Current contact magazine ads sometimes start with, 'Although I consider myself a totally heterosexual male, I would be happy to meet another male to indulge in fondling, masturbation, etc...' Or words to that effect.

Where, then, does heterosexuality end, bisexuality start and finish, to end in homosexuality. Each member of Acorn falls somewhere within the parameters of this grouping. The middle section appears to be the grey area, no debate or article can I ever remember having defined bisexuality. Just by being members of Acorn shows that we are all interested to one degree or another in male genitalia. Taking that everyone is happy getting inside female knickers, where, through the following, would the consensus of opinion be for bisexuality to start?

- a) Covertly watching other men pee.
- b) Mutual masturbation.
- c) Mutual oral.
- d) Mutual anal.

Or is it not strictly confined to sex, but possibly more in the mind, confining it to the ability to fall in love with one's own sex, as well as the other.

Comments!!

D.A.

ACORN

1991 Issue No 2

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Americans Find Out	Mrs E.C.	Page 2
Turn On	J.B.T.	Page 3
Penile Development	Anon	Page 4
Self Lubrication	V.	Page 4
Masturbation Survey	C.T.	Page 5
Multi Orgasms	H.M.	Page 8
Surrogate Foreskin	Warren	Page 8
Photos and Videos	C.P.	Page 9
Warning	N. Anthony	Page 10
Incidence of Circumcision	Richard	Page 10
Contributors' Statistics		Page 11
Penis Survey		Page 12
Books	R.B.W.	Page 12
Bisexuality	Tony Acorn	Page 14
Contact Corner		Page 17

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Here is my second effort, and a nice long mixed bag it is too. I hope you enjoy it. Really it's all your work though, so keep the contributions coming in. When I have plenty of contributions I will give priority to members' letters first, then articles in answer to members' letters, then fantasies (sorry you Hertfordshire Girls!!), but please state that they are fantasies. How many noticed last year that J.H. of Helsinki had two full circumcisions, one by his own hand and one by a Turkish barber? Some of these fantasies sound so real that others might try to emulate whatever the subject is, to their possible detriment. The last priority goes to articles purloined from other magazines. Of course, if anything of red-hot interest comes up, it goes in.

Anyway, happy reading.

D.A.

Americans Find Out

Some years ago I was on my way to join my husband in New Zealand and stopped off for a few days in Bali. I managed a bus tour and shared the back seat with three American women.

You see things abroad which would never happen in U.K. and it pays to keep your eyes open – it certainly did on this trip! The bus stopped in the town of Denpasar for half an hour and we decided to stay put. A high sided hay cart, pulled by a donkey, parked itself sideways on at the back of the bus, and, on looking over my shoulder, I found myself staring at the cart driver who was only a couple of feet away from me on the other side of the glass, sitting on top of his load of hay. He couldn't see me though, because the bus had one-way glass to cut down the tropical glare, and I was able to admire his well-proportioned brown body undetected. Suddenly he looked round, sat on his heels, and poked his hand under the scrap of cloth round his loins, producing a large and perfect specimen of masculine beauty, all brown and velvety. "Hey, look at this", I whispered, and the American girls turned round to see. The young man was cradling his sleek penis in the palm of his hand and studying it with careful and admiring attention. So were we. We were so close we could have leant out and shaken hands with it if the glass had not been there. "Gee, he's uncircumcised", said one of the Americans. He was too, with a long foreskin terminating in a rosebud, with a long and pendulous underlip. He squeezed the shaft hard, making the bulge of his glans stand out sharply through his skin, and then kneeled up and proceeded to take a powerful pee down the back of our bus. I almost burst out laughing, but the American next to me motioned me furiously to be quiet. As he peed he absently stretched his foreskin, squeezing off the tip from time to time to interrupt the flow, making his foreskin swell out round the knob. The Yankees were almost beside themselves! Finally he finished off, kneeling there under our gaze, tugged and squeezed at his foreskin to milk out the last few drops trapped behind his glans. To make absolutely sure he then drew his foreskin right back, revealing a wet and glistening dark red knob, then shook it vigorously before rehooding it and tucking it away. Obviously a well-brought-up young man who's been trained by his mum to look after his underpants, I thought.

This scene made a huge impression on the American girls because, unbelievably, none of them had seen an uncircumcised penis before, let alone the interesting little games you could turn it to. It made rather less of an impression on me, since the men in my family had been known to perform similarly, though not in public. The Yanks, being totally uninhibited, then started a lively and embarrassing discussion on the subject of circumcision, in which I got reluctantly involved. They quickly forced the admission from me that my husband and both my sons were uncircumcised. They were deeply curious about 'how the foreskin worked' and 'cleanliness' and, although they were intrigued and attracted by its possibilities, they were all repelled by the thought of 'smegma', until I explained that it was no problem with any normal man who understood soap and water; to me sex with a foreskin was the norm – I didn't imagine it could possibly be better without. The upshot was that they all declared their wish to try one out before their return to the States, and to my knowledge, they did.

On reflection, the thing that puzzled me, and still does, is how an adult Indonesian came to be uncircumcised, since I'm told that Indonesia is a strongly Muslim country. Any ideas?

Mrs. E.C. – Herts

Turn On

I recently sent an inquiry to the Forum Society and noted from the literature returned to me that there is a special interest group devoted to foreskins (or lack of them). Circumcision is a subject I have long been interested in, since the age of 5 in fact, when I saw my first circumcised cock on the boy who lived next door. I can remember being fascinated by it and wondered how his cock came to be so different from mine. It was only later that I discovered it was caused by an (often painful) operation, but my interest really manifested itself at grammar school. The open showers and changing rooms gave me the easy opportunity to examine the other boys' equipment. I discovered that 'cut dick' was more common than I thought, at least in our school. I came to feel very envious of boys who had received circumcision, especially those who had received the more radical forms of the operation, ie, permanent fully exposed knob and tight shaft skin. I found (and indeed still find), seeing circumcision scars a terrific 'turn on'.

My early attempts to emulate my circumcised classmates met with frustration as my foreskin would not stay retracted. A change to tighter underwear and trousers helped, although the resultant erection caused by the friction on the newly exposed glans was not appreciated by the authorities in my all boys school, resulting in painful disciplinary arrangements being made. On leaving school I decided to keep my cock stripped of foreskin for at least some of the time. For the past 10 years or so I have kept it retracted all my waking hours, but have given up trying to keep it retracted at night. Frustratingly however I find my foreskin bunches against the glans rim – I personally prefer the skin stretched tightly back so the ‘neck’ behind the rim also receives friction.

I would be pleased to hear from other members of the group – it’s nice to learn that there are others with a similar interest to mine. For the record, I am 41 years old, single, 6ft. tall, weigh 11.5 stone, with an 8" uncut dick. My interests are swim/sportswear, leather, denim, and some discipline.

Hoping to hear from you all soon,

J.B.T. – Essex

[Join the Club, as they say, J.B.T. I know that you will find many members who have had the same childhood experiences as yourself and developed them into maturity. — D.A.]

Penile Development

I have been reading Acorn since the beginning and have found the articles interesting and informative. There is however a concentration on roundhead/cavalier matters, although Acorn is intended to encompass everything about the penis and particularly ‘getting the phallus into the best possible shape’.

Could I ask you therefore to encourage more articles on, the appearance and development of the penis as a whole. Personal experiences of exercises to maximise the rigidity and size of erection, muscle control and strengthening, overall appearance and feel enhancement, would, I am sure, be of great interest to many, including not a few of the ladies.

Thanks for all your hard work in keeping Acorn running so successfully.

Anon

Self-Lubrication

The letter from R.W. – Sussex in Issue T raises a number of questions that have puzzled me too.

From the onset of puberty I have always lubricated readily and copiously, and for a time assumed that all males did so. However, in years long past, I have had physical contact with a few others and was surprised that in about half the cases the penis remained quite dry although erect for long periods.

Evidently, this absence of lubrication must be more common than I and, from your comments, you also imagined. There is further evidence of this from some of the hard-core videos I have seen, where, again, in spite of long and vigorous stimulation, the penis appears to remain basically dry in about half the cases.

In my case, lubrication appears most easily as the result of thought processes, whether in expectation of intercourse, or just in anticipation of a good story when the postman delivers my copy of Acorn. The presence or absence of an erection does not seem to be a factor, although if the stimulus is strong enough to induce an erection, the time for the lubricant to start flowing is reduced. Merely lying in bed, snuggling up to my wife, without any thought of sex, is also enough to induce a flow after about 20 minutes or so.

I secrete quite copiously, with more than enough to coat not only the glans, but the full length of my penis when erect. Clearly I have never suffered the problems of dryness of which R.W. complains. The lubricant certainly enhances the sensitivity of the glans and whenever possible I delay starting to masturbate until I am wet. In this respect R.W. has my sympathies because dryness detracts from his performance.

I have never imagined that circumcision would reduce the ability to lubricate, and would say that I was fully circumcised at birth.

In your comments on R.W.'s letter you wonder how age affects the ability to lubricate. I am now 78 and still lubricate as readily and copiously as I ever did whenever I need relief which is normally twice a week still.

It will be interesting to see a summary of other people's experiences if you receive a meaningful number of replies.

V. – Shropshire

Masturbation Survey

Age: 60.

When first: My first clear memory of masturbation dates from about 11, when I was teaching a younger brother how to do it.

How often: Younger, several times a day. Later on, mainly daily, although there are periods when I don't do it for 5 or 6 days – only to find that I have to do it twice a day when starting again. All the above is defining masturbation as an act leading to ejaculation. If I also count penetration without ejaculation as masturbation then my answer would read: several times a day.

More at some times than at others: See above. I have not been able to discover what phenomenon causes the periodicity. However, it is not lack of stimuli. Maybe weather or physical fitness in general. (Of course, a whisky or two heightens the interest).

How long: Also here it is a matter of definition. Even if you count from the first tactile, rubbing penetration onwards, it varies from only a few minutes (less than 5) up to certainly more than an hour. But you could also say that the 'act' starts when you, for example, pose before a mirror and initiate masturbation without handwork, and in such case the time will of course be a good bit longer. When using soap and hot water there is only one or two minutes work preceding ejaculation.

How many orgasms: Sometimes I manage to stop immediately before an orgasm, when only, say, one half of the semen comes, which I could use for drinking or for lubricating the penis for further masturbation. In lubricating cases there is usually less than a minute until the final orgasm occurs.

Where: Everywhere! Standing before a mirror, sitting in a chair, lying in the bed (especially in darkness when awakening at night), in the toilet, at the beach, in my office-room; wherever you could be alone.

What excites: Being extremely narcissistic, looking at my own body gives me the strongest feelings when masturbating. It could be looking at the penis (when dressed) or at the whole body (when naked). It could also be – and is most often – playing with my piercing jewellery in the frenulum. I often use a large – 8mm gauge – circular barbell (dangling), but at other times a couple of smaller circular barbells (one 4mm, plus two 3.5mm, plus one 2mm), and seeing them and hearing them bangle to each other gives me a heavy kick. As I have an extremely long foreskin (thanks to carrying heavy weights – up to 400g – in my piercing now and then during the years) I could easily collect the surplus skin of the flaccid penis in a bunch, more than 4cm long, above the tip. Fastening a rubber band at the lowest 'free' point, I could play with the rosette, so to speak, apart from the main penis. However, I have to loosen the rubber band rather soon for two reasons: the erection demands part of the foreskin and it could be dangerous to stop the free blood circulation for too long a time. Pushing my foreskin so tight and heavily forwards that it takes on a blackish look is exciting, and improving my glans tattoo by sticking a blackened needle into some part of it: (if you don't stick too deep it is quite delightful).

Films/videos: No

What do you use: Mainly the right hand, but I have now and then succeeded in orgasms without any handwork at all, e.g. by swinging the body in such a way that the penis swings from a position right out on the left side to right out on the right side. The barbells, weighing about 100g together, help to give speed and strength in the swinging. Also heavy swinging up and down (to the stomach and to the perineum) are often practised until orgasm, sometime combined with 'banging' the penis on the edge of a table. The long, loose foreskin gives an acoustic sensation too, a loud 'smack' when meeting the body. Other 'look no hands' varieties include, for instance, standing at an open door, one leg on each side, and frigging against the door. A most interesting variety, also without handwork, consists of – while sitting with the legs crossed and the penis, but not the balls, up between the legs – pressing the legs so hard together that a strong erection occurs, which often results in ejaculation. When using hands, you could hold sticky things inside the palm, e.g. rolls used by ladies for hair curling, some models being very convenient if you have a masochistic leaning. (When using spit in the palm, it will go too fast in my opinion).

What parts: I have found that, when holding the penis in the ‘normal’ masturbating way – with either the right or left hand – scratching the skin with a sharp nail of the little finger at the side of the root, heightens the feeling substantially.

Use of foreskin: As I said above I have a very long and loose foreskin, so long that I can hide the top of the erect penis under it and still have more than 2cm of skin ‘free’. These 2cm could be manipulated at the masturbation, and the semen could be kept in the ‘bowl’ thus formed. By and large, playing with all this ‘surplus’ foreskin is a very rewarding activity.

Other areas: Balls of course. but also the perineum e.g. by ‘riding’ on one of the top edges of a stool or chair-back. Nipples and face – never.

Naked: If not fully dressed, either naked or wearing very minimal panties, hooked up behind the balls.

Substitute for sex: Masturbation is sex! (Nevertheless: I am married with three children).

Describe etc: The best tip I could give to heavy masturbators is: acquire a piercing! (I can only talk about frenulums, but they are mightily arousing.) They have given me hours of pleasurable experiences every day since I acquired them. You could play with the piercing jewellery, you could stretch the hole and the foreskin and also other areas, modifying the look of the penis substantially – all this being an everyday task. Certainly, you may have to wait years until the foreskin is very long (if this happens to be your ideal), but you will enjoy every second of trying to reach this goal. And – important – acquiring a piercing is not at all so dangerous or painful as would appear from seeing pictures or live. But do be careful hygienically.

Finally a comment: The article on infibulation in the Nov/Dec issue by M.D. of Oxford was really interesting and instructive (well-written too). He promised to return with more details of his own experiences. Please do! I disagree only on one point: he says that only stainless steel could be recommended. I myself often change between jewellery (rings, straight barbells, circular barbells etc.) in stainless steel, silver and 18ct. gold, and I have never experienced any problems with any of them. The central statement in his article is, however, this one: “Wearing a ring in the piercing can be quite comfortable”. Certainly!

C.T. – Copenhagen

Multi-Orgasms

You may wish to add the following to the list of 'what's yours called':-

Bishop – as in bashing his bishop – wanking.

Mutton – as in flogging his mutton – wanking

Pennorth (of potherbs) – pennyworth of vegetables i.e. carrot, onion and turnip.

Meat – meat and two veg. – again the inference is clear.

All the above were in use in my school in North London between 1924 and 1932. Being quite 'domestic' words for the area and period they enabled us schoolkids to refer to forbidden topics within earshot of our elders, although the fact that they might have been well aware of their significance did not then occur to us.

We also had a metalwork master who referred to any pupil whose name he couldn't recall as John Thomas, much to our ill suppressed delight.

I was very interested in the information given in 'Philistine Foreskins' – it certainly takes all sorts, thank goodness. My heartfelt commiserations to H.B. of Norwich.

During my 30's to 50's I was sometimes multi-orgasmic but cannot recall the circumstances. Usually though, it was, once ejaculation occurred, the spirit might be very willing but the flesh was definitely weak. Although, according to my diary for 1939, I once achieved 3 ejaculations in succession, a feat many times essayed but never repeated, but the following year produced several double ejaculations. Now alas, once a week is an achievement.

Many thanks for an interesting and informative publication.

H.M. – Colchester

Surrogate Foreskin

Many men, who were circumcised neonatally, wonder what it would feel like to have a foreskin. I offer the following suggestion based upon a two month experiment that I performed.

Take a piece of Saran wrap [anyone any ideas on what this is? — Editor] about 80mm wide and 400mm long and wrap it around the end of your cock to form a sleeve that extends about 10mm past the tip of your glans. It will protect your glans like a true foreskin. Your glans will become moist, and, after a time, some of its original sensitivity will return. Of course, this artificial foreskin has no nerves in it and will not provide the sensations that a true foreskin does in masturbation, but it will give your glans the sensation of being covered with a foreskin. I can confirm this because I did not get circumcised until I was 21 years old; hence I know the sensations both with and without a foreskin.

Just as an uncircumcised man must retract his foreskin and wash his cock every day to prevent odour and irritation of the glans and sulcus, one must remove the Saran wrap every day and wash as well. Throw away the old wrapper and put on a new one; it is too difficult to wash and dry the old one. Just as an uncircumcised man does, you will notice some odour after 8 to 24 hours. I haven't however, found any smegma present when using the Saran foreskin as I used to find with my real foreskin. It must be that the glands that form smegma are in the inner layer of the foreskin (the mucosa) and are removed by circumcision.

Warren

Photos And Videos

Since I last wrote an article for Acorn I have had replies from interested female readers wishing to see photographs of penises with and without a foreskin covering. I have quite a lot of photos of penises both covered and uncovered.

Some of these photos show a very long foreskin that will stay stretched along the shaft and looks as if the penis has been circumcised, and some where the foreskin has been pierced and has a little gold ring fitted. All of these photos I have taken myself.

If any of our female readers are interested, and are undecided about the circumcised look, I am quite willing for them to borrow them and have a good look, and who knows, it may encourage them to get their husbands/boyfriends circumcised.

Any enquiries will be treated with the strictest confidence.

As a naturist I find that most women like to talk about circumcision and compare notes on the subject, and are not afraid to show their problems to one another.

I know of a video of circumcision operations being performed on children and adult men, the problem being that it is on American format and will not play on VHS, and somehow I have to get it copied so that all of us who wish to see it being done can do so.

Many people that I have spoken to have said that if they could see what happens then they would be circumcised. Any further developments on this score and I will keep Acorn posted.

I had word from a clinic to say that they charge £860 for a private circumcision, which is the highest that I have heard of, the price range now in my book being between £100 and £860, London still being the cheapest area.

C.P. – Wilts.

Warning

I am enclosing my subscription for 1991 with reservations. I find your publication very interesting and unique. I am pro-circumcision and enjoy reading other people's views on the subject. I am, however, increasingly disturbed by the number of articles on 'true experiences' which mention children. For instance, 'Malaysian Experience', December 1990 was quite unacceptable by mentioning a three year old child in a sexual context. I fear that if you do not practice self-censorship you may find yourselves in trouble with the law, which would spoil it for everyone else.

If you intend publishing articles of that nature in the future, I would be grateful if you would return the enclosed cheque and cancel my subscription.

N. Anthony

[I have just reread the article in question and would hesitate to call it a sexual context. I know by putting the words 'true experiences' in inverted commas you are challenging the authenticity of the account, but the editor has no entitlement to challenge it. Different cultures have different attitudes to the human body and also, if I may say so, to sex itself. I remember once reading an article on how the Polynesians once lived as a family in one room where the children were allowed to see their parents having sex, and were also instructed by their parents in masturbation. There was no incidence of suicide and very little mental illness. Cometh the white man who put them in clothes and taught them that what they had been doing was sinful. Now their suicide rate is the same as ours, as well as mental illness.

Nevertheless I feel I should warn contributors against sending in letters and articles where children are mentioned with erotic connotations. — David Acorn]

Incidence Of Circumcision

I enclose my subscription for another year of Acorn. I must admit to have found recent issues a little dull, as they seemed to have concentrated on the actual operation of circumcision. Personally, I find this a less interesting topic than the incidence of circumcision and attitudes towards a circumcised cock.

I have been fascinated by the subject since my public schooldays in the late 50's. Ever since then I have been fascinated by cocks – both cut and uncut. Since then I have wanted to categorise all my friends into roundhead or cavalier camps. Even now, at the age of 48, I like to know the status of all my friends, and, particularly, whether my girlfriends (I am divorced) prefer a foreskin or not.

Contrary to general opinion, at one of the country's leading public schools in 1958, I would estimate that only half of my contemporaries had been circumcised. The very grand aristocrats were mostly circumcised, as were those whose parents were obviously trying to social climb and emulate the grand. There was a large body of upper middle class intelligentsia who were clearly unimpressed by the social advantages and decided to leave their sons' foreskins alone. I was among this group, but was very ambivalent towards my foreskin. My close friends all tended to be circumcised and I would have liked to have been like them.

My impression is that, despite medical opinion as endorsed by childcare books in the 60's, it continued to be practised (in the provinces more than London) throughout this period.

My own children were born in the 70's in London teaching hospitals, and circumcision was strongly discouraged by the consultants. My subsequent observations of my friends' sons is that, although the National Health born were left intact, those same consultants were still circumcising those in private care who wanted it. To give them their due, doctors were not encouraging mothers to have their sons circumcised, but were equally not actively dissuading them. Interestingly, again with personal observation, they were leaving their own sons intact.

Anyway, keep up the good work. I do suggest that you publish again the overall results of your penis survey. I suggest also that you enclose a questionnaire in your next issue asking all your members for the details of their cocks and the state of their foreskins. It would also be interesting if they could be asked to estimate the incidence of circumcision amongst their friends.

Richard

Contributors' Statistics

You may well be interested to learn, Richard, that up to the last issue of this magazine, the different contributors fell into the following categories:-

Circumcised	- 57 (26 in adulthood)
Natural	- 42
Unknown	- 14 (mostly early issues)
Females (pro circumcision)	- 1

Females (pro foreskins)	- 9
Females (no preference)	- 2

With regard to the penis survey which was taken at the end of 1989, I thought it might be a good thing if, before printing the last overall results, we ask all those who didn't bother last time to have a go now and also those who have become members since. A full survey would be marvellous. I'll now print the questionnaire again:-

1. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, flaccid.
2. Length of penis along top from base to tip of glans, erect.
3. Circumference of penis at base, flaccid.
4. Circumference of penis at base, erect.
5. If circumcised, distance of scarline from glans rim.
If uncircumcised, U.
6. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ 's) of glans covered, flaccid.
7. If uncircumcised, how much ( $\frac{1}{10}$ 's) of glans covered, erect.
8. If uncircumcised, is foreskin tight (T) or loose (L).
9. When standing against a wall with penis erect, how far from glans tip to nearest part of stomach.
10. Height.
11. Age.
12. Identification (initials and place).

Books

The recent case concerning the saucy vicar who slipped a length to his curate's wife, not to mention a lady parishioner, brings home the change in our attitude to circumcision since I was a lad. The fact that both ladies found the defrocked vicar's defrocked ding-dong remarkable enough to proclaim the fact bears witness to the increasing rarity of the operation in the country today. It is highly unlikely that either of them had previously seen a penis without its natural covering, whereas if the incident had taken place 30 years ago chances are that both ladies would, with their peer group, have had circumcised husbands, and would have found the vicar's circumcised penis nothing out of the ordinary, and certainly not worth commenting on.

This brings me on to a couple of books for your bibliography. Martin Amis proves himself a child of the times in his book The Rachel Papers, since his sexually precocious teenage subject notes smugly at a posh party where he first meets Rachel, that he is probably the owner of the only foreskin present (the others all look Jewish). Later, and this should wow some of your more eager circumcisionists, he stumbles blindly into the bathroom after a drunken sexual orgy with Rachel, and prepares to sever the teat of the condom he is still wearing so that it will flush away instead of floating. He stretches the teat as far as he can, picks up his razor blade, and then, sensing that something is wrong, looks down. To his horror he finds the condom gone and that it is his foreskin he is stretching, and realises that he has come within an ace of circumcising himself.

The Jewish writer, Howard Jacobson, describes how the subject of his novel, The Voyeur, gets his girlfriend to agree to a threesome with a gentile friend, and watches enviously while she expertly manipulates his foreskin, thereafter wondering indignantly as to where a good Jewish girl learned how to fondle a foreskin so felicitously.

Finally, Nancy Friday's compendium of authentic female fantasies, The Secret Garden, once again bears witness to the decline in the modern girl's experience of circumcised cocks, since circumcision is only mentioned once – when an incurable crotch-watcher says she is dying to find out whether the penis bulging behind someone's flies has been circumcised, declaring that she prefers uncircumcised boys, regrettably without giving a reason. On the other hand, several of the ladies who contribute, feature foreskins in their dreams. One describes entering a house, to find a huge black man, with his equally large black wife. The woman orders her to undress whilst she opens her husband's flies, extracts an enormous black cock and pulls the foreskin back and forth to harden him up before forcing her to impale herself on it. Another woman livens up her sex life by reliving an episode in her youth when she and some other fourteen year-old girls got chatting to a group of boys who forced one of their number to expose his rampant penis to them, before pairing off into a necking session. She says she can't remember whether their explorations led to actual penetration, but what really charged her sexual battery was the vision of his cherry-red tip appearing and disappearing as she worked his foreskin up and down.

Let's hear of other authors who are not afraid to feature circumcision and foreskins in their novels – they can be quite illuminating.

R.B.W. – Bedford

P.S. Although the foregoing does nothing to promote the roundhead cause, I do hope you will be able to include it, since it is genuine and should be of interest to roundheads and cavaliers alike. My continued membership will depend on the degree of balance in the last two issues outstanding for the year. But whatever the outcome, I shall always be grateful to you for the opportunity to express the unhappiness I have suffered due to circumcision, when I got it off my chest in issue Q, and wish you all the best for the future.

R.B.W.

[This surely is where our group scores. The very act of being able to uninhibitedly share your private sorrows, and also your jubilations of course, is a hugely uplifting process, knowing that there are dozens of interested people to read it and knowing also that the great majority sympathise with you. — David Acorn]

Bisexuality

Between the completely male and the completely female person lies a range of psychological and/or physical possibilities known as intersex. At the middle of the range lie the anomalies arising from genetic factors or physical development. Lesser divergences from the wholly male or wholly female types are thought to be due to factors arising from social development. Bisexuals are the intersex categories closest to the typical male or female.

Social influences which may encourage a person towards an intersex category may include:-

Female

- 1 Upbringing & conditioning
- 2 Male role envy
- 4 Masculine imprinting
- 6 Hostile father
- 7 Absent father

Male

- Upbringing & conditioning 1
- Female role envy 3
- Feminine imprinting 5
- Hostile father 6
- Feminine clothes envy 8
- Possessive mother 9
- Weak father &/or hostile mother 10

The range of sex types includes:-

A. Female: physical and psychological identity is completely female; fertile, with full female gonads; XX chromosomes. Main sexual influence 1.

B. Bisexual Female: physically completely female; sexually attracted to members of both sexes; fertile, XX chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 6.

C. Female Homosexual: physical identity is female; sexually attracted only to another female; fertile, XX chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 6.

D. Butch Female Homosexual: physical identity is female; full female genitals; psychological identity is male; sexually attracted only to another female; fertile, XX chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1, 7 and 4.

E. Trans-Sexual Female: physically completely female, with female gonads, possibly an enlarged clitoris, with envy of male role; psychological identity is male or neutral; fertile, XX chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1, 7 and 4.

F. Testicular Feminisation Syndrome: has outward sexual characteristics of a female (breasts, normal clitoris) but with internal testes and male chromosomes; psychological identity is female; infertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influence 1.

G. Gynandrous Female: physically female with all female sex organs, but very masculine in appearance (facial hair, broad frame) – male secondary sexual characteristics; most likely fertile; XX chromosomes.

H. Turner's Syndrome: outward appearance and psychological identity more or less female, but with internal testes; Y-typical congenital malformation (short stature, webbing of neck); infertile; XO chromosomes.

I. Klinefelter's Syndrome: outward appearance male; penis and gonads small, and tendency to obesity; infertile; XXY chromosomes.

J. Gynandrous Male: fully male sex organs, but deficient in male hormones; feminine appearance (lack of facial hair, broad hips); most likely fertile; XY chromosomes.

K. Trans-Sexual Male: physically male, with male gonads and small penis; has envy of male role; psychological identity female or neutral; probably fertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 3.

L. Transvestite Male: physically completely male, but enjoys adopting a female role by wearing women's clothes; fertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1, 8 and 5.

M. Feminine Male Homosexual: physical identity male; male gonads and genitals; psychological identity female; attracted only to another male; fertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 9.

N. Butch Male Homosexual: physical and psychological identity male; sexually attracted only to another male; fertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 10.

O. Bisexual Male: physically completely male; sexually attracted to members of both sexes; fertile, XY chromosomes. Main sexual influences 1 and 6.

P. Male: physical and psychological identity male; male gonads & genitals; fertile; XY chromosomes; main sexual influence 1.

(The foregoing information is based on The Visual Dictionary of Sex, editor-in-chief Eric J. Trimmer, Pan Books/Macmillan London Ltd, 1978, pp 42-43.)

It is worth mentioning that the prefix hetero- means 'the other of two, other, different', while homo- (with a short first o) means 'same'; both come from Greek, but the latter is often confused with the Latin Homo, (with a long first o), meaning a man. So a female homosexual is a woman who relates to someone of the same sex, another woman, not a woman in a relationship with a man. Equally, a male homosexual is a man who relates sexually to another man.

Physically and chromosomally completely male individuals may be influenced during their upbringing by the various factors listed so as to develop hetero-, bi- or homo-sexual orientations. While some are oriented exclusively towards the opposite sex and others exclusively towards their own sex, most people are able to manage normal social relationships with both sexes.

A bisexual male is physically, genetically and hormonally fully male. In his gender identity or sexual orientation, however, he differs from the extreme of complete maleness by being attracted to members of both sexes, but the differences are purely in his behaviour with other people.

Normal life offers a range of possible interactions with other people. The homophobe demonstrates a morbid fear of a relationship with the same sex by sometimes extreme words or actions. The fully heterosexual will keep the more intimate interactions for relationships with the opposite sex. A bisexual male feels at home in a relationship with either male or female partners, but may well go further with one sex than with the other; he may tend to deep heterosexual relationships and shallow homosexual relationships or vice versa.

Of course sexual relationships can go through some or all of many stages: flirting and conversations with a range of sexual undertones; touching or holding hands, etc; 'petting' or fondling erogenous zones such as breasts, genitals, etc; kissing and other forms of oral interaction; mutual masturbation; mutual use of sex aids and/or toys including fancy condoms, dildoes, etc; penetrative sex – penis/vagina (heterosexual) or anal (heterosexual or homosexual).

There is also an infinite variety of intensities to any sexual relationship whether hetero-, bi-, or homo-sexual, from the deepest commitment to the superficiality of a 'love-them and leave-them' one-night stand or one-hour meeting. There is also a range of possibilities from equality between the partners to the dominance and submission of a very unequal but satisfying relationship. Again, any sexual relationship may vary from tender and placid to violent and stormy.

How individuals rate on a set of analytical categories such as those listed above may not be the same as how we perceive ourselves. Acorn members (almost all male) define ourselves by our shared interest in the phallus, foreskins, circumcision, etc, which clearly indicates an interest in the essential maleness of ourselves and others. A few members indicate that they see their main or only sexual orientation as homosexual. A few more think of themselves as bisexual. But most seem to think of themselves in their main orientation as wholly or predominantly heterosexual: their interest in matters phallic is either exceptional or just a small part of their wider interest in sex. Often the Acorn interest is clearly perceived in a heterosexual context of preferences for a phallus which should be or is in best shape for (hetero)sexual intercourse.

Many members recall their interest in Acorn topics originating in situations where they first became aware of their own phallus because they could compare it with others, sometimes one-to-one and sometimes in more predominantly male situations such as changing-rooms. Often the discovery comes at a transitional stage in life, when a boy is establishing his independence or going through puberty. The social influences listed at the beginning of the article are rarely mentioned in members' accounts, however. It would be interesting but is not easy to explain why Acorn members fix and develop their Acorn interest when others treat it as a passing phase.

Tony Acorn

Contact Corner

I seek correspondence from fellow Acorns, both shiny and dry, and mini-Acorns (clitoral associates) on aspects of skin care, management, modification, statistics, sensations, secretions, art, attitudes, and aesthetics.

Anthony – Devon

Male, 33, thinning, circumcised, is very interested in making contacts with other Acorn members who are aged between 18 and 30 and are circumcised or are contemplating the operation. I can travel anywhere in the U.K. My hobbies are music, photography, and anything to do with the penis and circumcision. A frank letter with a photograph ensures a reply.

R.M. – London

ACORN

1991 Issue No 3

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Auto-Circumcision	J.B.T.	Page 2
Perfection	C.W.	Page 4
Hesitation	J.H.	Page 5
One Who Knows	Bill	Page 5
A Naturist's View	Anon	Page 6
Coming Up Roses	Ivan	Page 8
Advantages?	M.L.	Page 9
Masturbation and
    Use of Pornography	Andrew	Page 10
An African Circumcision		Page 11
1900	I.C.	Page 16
Members' Meeting	D.A.	Page 17

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Welcome to another edition of Acorn, the newsletter of the Forum group for people interested in circumcision, foreskins and everything phallic.

This month you will find the usual mixed bag of views and news. I have tried to keep a balance of pro-foreskin and pro-circumcision material to keep everyone happy in some way.

I think it only fair that you should know something about your editor. So next month I hope to be able to do just that, and how I stand on the issues that always arise.

Information

It must be clearly understood that any information given out, while supplied in good faith, in no way constitutes any recommendation by Acorn members, the Editor, or by the Forum Society. Anyone acting on any such information does so at their own risk, and must rely on their own judgement in doing so.

D.A.

Auto-Circumcision

Many thanks for the January 1991 issue of Acorn and back copies, recently received, which I have read with great interest. I must say what a joy it is to find a circumcision 'fan club' at long last.

In spite of what one correspondent wrote, I found 'David and the Circumcision Master' one of the most erotic things that I have ever read, especially the part where the Master received his come(cum!)-uppance for being cocky during his own circumcision. It must have appealed to the sado-masochistic side of my nature, as I would love to be the operator prolonging the rite to the mutual enjoyment of us both and the watching participants. I sometimes wonder why some of the stricter skinhead/leather groups don't have such initiation ceremonies i.e. foreskins a compulsory entry requirement, with infibulations, partial removals as the initiate progresses up the 'tree', culminating in radical excision of the foreskin/frenulum and an invitation to carry out your own 'Prince Albert'. Now there's a thought!

I also enjoyed 'A Trip to Ankara', as the 'cut' the correspondent received is the one I would like to receive myself i.e. drumskin-tight shaft skin both slack and erect, with a very prominent circumcision scar halfway up the cock. Is it possible however to have the frenulum totally removed with a sunnet?

My own experiences with my foreskin are similar to many others i.e. saw my first 'cut' dick at 5, was fascinated by it, got my tightish foreskin retracted by the age of 8, missed the chance of a 'cut' at the age of 11 when a prolonged bout of over-indulgence produced a very sore and inflamed glans, which took its time in healing. I really got into the subject of circumcision at my (boys') grammar school where I viewed with envy the cut shafts of some of the other boys. I found the more radically cut examples an especial 'turn-on', especially those with heavy brown scars halfway up their cocks. With others, I attempted 'auto-circumcision' (keeping the skin retracted), but this did not work well in my case as my skin was (and still is) long and loose (that's what over-indulgence at an early age does for you!!) Tighter underpants and trousers helped, but, being well hung (over 8 inches with foreskin) meant my almost constant erections were soon noticed by 'authorities', and my work suffered as my mind was on one thing all the time. 'Appropriate disciplinary arrangements' were taken, after several bouts of which, culminating in 2 beatings in 2 days, I reluctantly returned my nicely swelling glans to its usual located state.

My second bout of autocircumcision was at college, where my passion for stripped cock and tight jeans was indulged to the full. With skin-tight jeans, I found I could do away with tight underwear as the jeans provided the support required, and also meant the 'cut' shaft was nicely on display. My third and final bout was 12 years ago, since when I have kept my cock stripped all my waking hours, but have given up trying to keep it retracted at night (if anyone has any ideas on this I would be grateful). Like many others I have tried many things to keep my skin tightly retracted, but the only one that works for me with any degree of satisfaction is a cockring on an adjustable waistband i.e.

My foreskin is tucked under the cockring. With a cockring/strap alone, I found the pull of the skin down the shaft meant my foreskin still bunched at the glans rim. With my device, the pull of the waistband on the ring prevents the skin from rolling forward, ensuring a radical result is maintained. I personally wrap sticking plaster over the two knots on the ring to improve comfort, while the additional friction prevents the foreskin sliding forward due to sweat. The ring of course, provides support and maintains erection. Even when erection subsides, the foreskin being tugged back as it tries to slide forward soon leads to re-arousal. There is consequently a constant cycle of arousal/subsidence/re-arousal. A ball support allows the tightly stripped cock to swing free, while the additional friction of jeans or tracksuit (especially the old woollen ones) provides additional titillation to the swollen bared glans. With such a tight result, partners are forced to stimulate my glans and inner foreskin (my most sensitive parts) rather than rub the loose shaft skin which I personally find a 'turn-off'. I have been complimented on the result several times, even receiving commiserations from a tightly cut guy at the misfortune at losing more than he did. He was amazed when told later that I was uncut and fascinated at how I achieved such a tight result.

With my device I am able to achieve 'circumcision' at will, but it is, of course, no substitute for the real thing. I would accordingly be interested to hear (via Acorn, anonymously at first) from guys who have successfully achieved drumskin tight Islamic style circumcision with removal of the frenulum. Any advice, addresses of sunnets etc, would be most welcome.

In the meantime, I look forward to receiving the next issue of Acorn. It's nice to know that there are others sharing the same interest in the fascinating subject of circumcision. Best wishes for a successful editorship of Acorn.

P.S. How do American circumcision rings fit? Does one lie in the sulcus, the other at the base of the cock? Are they spaced evenly down the shaft?

J.B.T. – Westcliffe-On-Sea

Perfection?

Thank you for all your efforts and the knowledge you have imparted to subscribers. Whilst being heterosexual I have always been interested in the penis and its appearance.

I have come to the conclusion that for me the ideal penis should be expertly circumcised with as much of the inner foreskin removed as possible, as well as total amputation of the frenulum. The result would give the appearance of the glans permanently exposed with the scar just behind the rim, and the operation should be performed in such a manner that the glans should never be covered in any way.

I myself submitted to this operation, but the result of the operator's efforts has left my scar well down the shaft, and my frenulum still bulges down underneath. I would therefore caution prospective 'initiates' to establish carefully just what they are going to be left with when the job is done.

Do I have any regrets about being circumcised? No. I would be done again tomorrow without thinking about it, but this time I would find somebody who would leave me with just what I wanted.

It would be interesting to read other peoples views of what they considered the perfect circumcision, and also what about the ladies? Do they actually care about the state of their partners' penises or is it a matter of indifference to the majority.

C.W.

Hesitation

I suppose every Cavalier has at one time or another considered 'the chop'. I certainly have, mainly because of recurring infections of the foreskin. But I am always hesitant because of the finality of circumcision. What happens if I don't like the sexual effect or I miss my foreskin too much? It would certainly be interesting to hear from others who are either considering circumcision or have gone through the experience in adulthood – we have had some of the latter in Acorn but very few of the former. I would be interested to hear from those in the same situation and compare notes on circumcision.

For me, the ideal situation would be the 'convertible' solution – keeping my foreskin, but able to keep it retracted when slack, something I can't do because of a long foreskin and a not very pronounced knob. By rolling the skin under itself, I am able to expose part of my knob, and this helps both the look and the feel.

The extra dimension of the foreskin in foreplay is still important to me, although in masturbation I am only able to enjoy it with the foreskin kept retracted, and movement over the bare knob with lubrication. Interestingly enough, when comparing sensitivity of the knob with someone who had always kept his foreskin retracted and was eventually circumcised 3 or 4 years ago, his was far the more sensitive knob of the two. This really invalidates the argument that circumcision reduces the sensitivity of the glans.

The other factor making me hesitate to go ahead with circumcision is the hassle and pain, plus the mockery of my friends when they saw me in the showers looking somewhat different.

J.H. – Kent

[Have a try at J.B.T's device in the first letter. Who knows, it might be just the answer for you, as well as a good reason for just 'mucking around'. — D.A.]

One Who Knows

I have noticed in the newsletter over the past months that there have been a number of enquiries from members, whether or not it is better to be circumcised, and for comments from those who can remember being a cavalier before becoming a roundhead.

The main point that I would stress is that each individual must be 100% certain that they want to become a roundhead, and it can only be a personal individual decision; the more one reads, the more confusing it can become. Always if possible discuss the matter with your partner, but if in doubt do not proceed, as you may well be disappointed. Circumcision must be regarded as irreversible. Although it is only a small operation, it does take some getting used to, particularly when masturbating, as a different technique is required.

From a very early age I wanted to be circumcised. I went into a changing room and found that everyone there in the showers except me had been circumcised, and I felt different. When I subsequently asked my parents about this, they informed me that God had made me this way. I found this confusing and assumed that boys were either born a cavalier or a roundhead. It was many years before I finally decided to take the plunge and I have never regretted the decision. Although there are always many comments regarding cleanliness and appearance, I have found that the main difference is that my penis now requires considerably more stimulation before climaxing, finding this an advantage as one grows older. It is not the actual climax which is important, but the process and build-up getting there; the longer it lasts the better it becomes; reading a sexy book or magazine in bed while slowly fondling one's penis is bliss! I generally avoid vigorous rubbing to the shaft; if one does not always climax – so what. But I nearly always succeed in producing a good deal of pre-climax lubrication.

Bill – Kingston

A Naturalist's View

Congratulations on becoming editor of Acorn. May I offer my thanks to Tony who did an excellent job of founding editor. Recent issues of the magazine have provided a diverse range of material, including much on masturbation as well as on circumcision. The latter remains an important interest of mine and I would like to share my observations on this theme with other readers.

In the early nineteen seventies I first realised that penises came in two forms – circumcised and uncircumcised – when I first saw most of my classmates (at an inner city comprehensive school) naked. As we had been born in the early nineteen sixties, most of us were uncircumcised. Surprisingly, in the light of this, my closest friends had been circumcised. One was Jewish, another had recently lost his foreskin after problems with balanitis, and the third had slightly old-fashioned parents who, I assume, still believed that circumcision was 'the done thing'. Nonetheless, circumcision remained the exception – I would say we had 29 foreskins between every 30 boys.

At the age of seventeen I passed the Oxbridge entrance examination and went away to college. Then, as now, former pupils of the major public schools are over represented in the student body. As a relatively keen sportsman – running and swimming – I once again saw many of my new friends naked and noted a rise in the proportion of those who had been circumcised. I would estimate that between a quarter and a fifth of us were foreskinless. One of the neatest cuts I ever saw was on a fellow member of a life-saving class; his small penis was a beautiful shade of white and ended in a neat naked rose-pink glans. At this time I first began to notice that there were variations in the way in which circumcisions had been performed. For the first time I saw what I now know to have been an 'Islamic cut', incidentally, on a non-Muslim, but I don't know how it was acquired. In the showers after the early morning swimming sessions on Tuesdays and Thursdays I first saw a range of men of various ages naked, and once again noted that amongst certain groups – this time those over forty – circumcision was far more common than I would have anticipated. At this time I first began to realise that there was both a class and an age bias to circumcision: the older one was, and the higher up the social ladder one's background, the more likely you were to have been circumcised.

At this point an aside. These observations were possible because most men shower naked after sports and swimming. Apparently this is not the case amongst women. A recent report in The Sunday Times claimed that women in London were starting to take their communal showers in the nude, and predicted that they would soon start to face away from the wall. My girlfriend tells me that this is not so. We have been using our local baths regularly for almost a year now, and she (who always strips) has only once been joined by another naked woman. I would be interested if any other readers would share their observations on this. Are the women up here in the north more reticent perhaps?

After college I took a job as a teacher at a small private school in East Anglia. The pupils, all boys, ranged in age from 6 to 13. My duties included teaching swimming and being a house-master, hence, at one time or another, I saw all of my charges naked. Circumcision was very common. Approximately one boy in three had been circumcised. It was almost always possible to guarantee that if one brother had been circumcised the other would have been too. I seem to recall that the proportion of circumcised boys was higher amongst the older lads, at least one of whom had been born on a local American air base. This provided further evidence – if any was needed – that there is a link between circumcision and social standing. Since then I have worked at other schools but have rarely taught sports and never held a residential position. Hence I can offer no comparative data.

'Cock-spotting' in showers etc. is not the only way in which I have been able to observe whether and where circumcision is common. My girlfriend and I are naturists, and we have spent 2 or 3 weeks a year naked on the beaches of France for the last 7 or 8 years. The European league of likeliness-to-discard-a-swimming-costume is certainly topped by the Germans. They are followed by the Dutch, the French coming a close third, with the Scandinavians deserving an honourable mention. British naturists are few and far between. Circumcision is not common elsewhere in Europe, with one notable exception; amongst Dutchmen who are in their forties or older. If the view that circumcision was advocated as a way of ensuring cleanliness amongst potential colonial administrators is accepted, this may explain the pattern. The British and the Dutch had extensive overseas territories, unlike the other north Europeans – except the French, but then they are wonderfully perverse!

This summer we are likely to explore the naturist beaches of Denmark, and this will, I hope, provide more information to support or modify my views.

Some of the most memorable circumcisions I have seen were on naturist beaches. Two incidents come to mind. One whilst walking along the shore two men were approaching in the opposite direction, Both were tall, thin and muscular. Both had all-over tans and both were circumcised. Both looked magnificent. Pink glanses emerging proudly from bronze shafts. The other incident: a few years ago we spent a few days with a group of naturists. The men included two Americans, a Brazilian Jew, and another Briton (all of whom were circumcised) – the women (principally German, English and Scandinavian) were all keen, if somewhat furtive, ‘cockspotters’, and it soon became apparent to me whose penises were getting the most frequent and the most admiring glances. Circumcision might be rare amongst the young men of Europe today, but the young women seem to be very keen on it. This is not only true amidst the inhibitions of the naturist beaches. Only a few weeks ago one of my colleagues admitted in the staff room that she was having her baby son circumcised (her husband and other son, she admitted, already were), and two other women teachers openly stated their preference for circumcised partners, and praised the third for taking positive action on this matter.

Two points can be made in conclusion to this letter based on my own subjective observations. One: circumcision is more commonly encountered in older men and amongst those from the upper and the upper-middle classes in Britain. This age pattern is also encountered in Holland, but nowhere else in Europe. Two: a personal note. I am uncircumcised, but if anyone knows of a sympathetic surgeon working in the Manchester area then I will be displaying a bare glans in the showers and on the beach this Summer.

Anon

[If anyone knows of a surgeon or mohel in the Manchester area, or anywhere else for that matter, please let us know so that we can publish for all to see.
— D.A.]

Coming Up Roses

I have seen no references in Acorn to the novel Coming Up Roses, which appeared in hardback earlier last year and is now out in paperback. Since circumcision is one of its themes, I am enclosing a short review.

Coming Up Roses by Michael Carson, rather topically deals with the threatened invasion of one middle east country, Zibda, by another, Ras Al Surra. Of more interest to Acorn readers, however, may be the sub-theme of circumcision.

Abdul Wahhab Higgins is an Irish Catholic converted to Islam and now a member of the Ministry for the Suppression of Vice and the Encouragement of Virtue in Ras Al Surra. He suggests to the King that all ex-patriates should be required to undergo circumcision or leave the country.

“It is indeed a most repulsive thing, this foreskin,” he said. “I know it will be a major contribution to National Purity to eradicate them from the Holy Land of Ras Al Surra.”

Only one of the ex-patriates has been circumcised already (which readers might think a low proportion even in these times). He is not very sympathetic to the complaints of his colleagues:

“And quite right too. Everyone ought to be snipped at birth. You should be grateful for the chance to have the op on the Ras Al Surra government. No waiting lists for you like there would be in old Blighty.”

No-one else seems very keen to be cut, but since most of the Brits are there for financial reasons, they have no option but to go through with the operation. The book relates the meetings to discuss the matter, the medical inspections, and the operations themselves, although these parts are not as detailed or explicit as they might have been. Also the author appears to overestimate the severity of the operation, as he has those who have been circumcised walking with very short steps with legs wide apart, and wearing a plastic codpiece which cupped the genitalia gently as in a padded jewel box. I don't remember finding any of that necessary even on the day of my circumcision.

Eventually, war leads to revolution and all the ex-patriates are deported – so the operations were unnecessary (their opinion, not mine). But at the airport they are all strip-searched, including Abdul Wahhab Higgins, who had also been expelled. And then it is revealed that he “has a foreskin you could wrap a fish in.”

Not a great book, but it is a change to see the subject of circumcision appearing as a major theme in a mainstream novel.

Ivan Goodhart – London

Advantages?

Tony has referred to the ‘great advantages of circumcision’ in Acorn. It would be interesting to know just what these advantages are!

I have a normal healthy uncircumcised penis with which I am very satisfied. My foreskin is worn forward in the natural position, completely covering the glans, and I would not want it otherwise. I don't know what is supposed to be wrong with that, or how I am at a disadvantage. If you talk about the advantages of circumcision, tell us about the disadvantages too.

You wrote in issue M about boys and parents being made aware that the foreskin must be retracted in the loo. Why 'must'? Surely it is purely optional, and the need to do so will vary.

Like many of my friends, who were not circumcised either, I didn't have the option of retracting as a lad, and grew up peeing through the hole in my foreskin. At a rough calculation I must have done so more than 25,000 times without ill-effect, so why must it be retracted?

I will admit that one can pee more accurately with the foreskin retracted, and I now do so at home. But in the public loo there is no need at all and the glans remains under the foreskin.

Having a red tip to the foreskin is not a 'problem' either. One of our sons has always had pinkness where his foreskin wrinkles together at the tip, but it doesn't bother him in the least.

Have other readers found balanitis a 'problem'?

M.L. – Gwent

[How about all fervent cavaliers and roundheads each sending in lists of the advantages and disadvantages of their own pride and joy, and of the other cause? — Editor]

Masturbation; My Use Of, And Thoughts On, Pornography

I started using glamour photographs in Playboy, Mayfair, and occasionally other such magazines, as a basis for masturbation in my early twenties. I was somewhat astonished at how successful this material was, not only at arousing me, but also in enhancing the quality of my orgasm. I felt that I was sharing the orgasm with the lady in the photograph: a person, more real than could be created by my imagination alone. The photographs provided someone with whom to share the intense loving feelings that tend to envelope me at, and after, orgasm.

A considerable improvement in my use of this material occurred when I mounted a number of my favourite photographs on sheets of black cardboard. The use of the pictures remained essentially the same: I still knew the names of all the girls I 'fucked' and shared my orgasm with. The advantages of the new form of display were easy access to my favourite pictures, and an enhanced aesthetic pleasure from the look of the photographs standing out against a black background.

A further step forward took place when I realized how much easier it would be to view the cards if I built a small wooden stand to hold them. By this time I had so many photographs that it was not easy to remember the names of all the girls, let alone when, and in which magazine, they had appeared. I solved the problem by making an audio tape which not only reminded me of the names of the girls, but marvelled over their erotic charms in much the way I do mentally whenever I see such photographs. I found this aural stimulus a pleasing addition to the eroticism of the photographs.

Further progress in my use of pornography occurred when I was able to get hold of some good hardcore videos. Most of them are quite awful, but a few are superb. These I find a perfect delight. They are a more powerful erotic stimulus than still photographs, and now that I am suffering from a very considerable decline in potency they are a real boon. Sometimes I use the videos by themselves, but over the past year I have taken to having a couple of cards of still photographs on view at the same time as watching the video. There are two great advantages in this :-

- 1) There are always some boring passages in the videos. During these, attention can be turned from the screen to the delights of the photographs.
- 2) More importantly, at least half the time I use the still photographs rather than the video as a centre of erotic focus when approaching and reaching climax. Not only is this erotic focus more 'controllable' than what is happening on the screen, but it is easier to form a satisfying psychological bond with the still pictures, which have become 'old friends'. Moreover, the relaxed expressions on the girls' faces are very suitable to the post orgasmic phase.

To sum up. Though I shared my life with a partner for about nine years, solo sex has provided me with  $\frac{9}{10}$ ths of the pleasure that I found in sex. Pornography has made, and continues to make, a really valuable contribution to this aspect of my life. It is just a pity that there is not more open access to good quality videos, and more admiration for both the performers and technicians who make the really good ones. Over a few months I find that I will always average out at four orgasms a week; sometimes it's 13, sometimes it's 0, but the average is always close to 4. The presence of an available partner has no influence at all on this average, and I count this as a further tribute to pornography.

Andrew Ferguson – Henley

An African Circumcision

Perhaps the best and most detailed description of an African natural circumcision is at the same time the oldest. It was written down by a Polish physician at the beginning of this century, and it describes the circumcision of three volunteers in central Africa. The following story is written freely from it.

'When I was visiting a camp of the Kongo Army in 1906, I was chatting with the commandant, Colonel Boutse. By coincidence we began to talk about circumcision.

"When I came here four years ago," he said, "I organized a medical examination for all the men. During this, I noticed which soldiers were circumcised and which were not. At that time only two of the three hundred native soldiers were circumcised. But when I carried out a medical examination last year more than half of them were circumcised, although they were almost all the same men as before. The custom seems to be spreading from the Mohammedan north."

"I would be very interested," I said, "to photograph such an operation for anthropological survey, Colonel. Do you think that there would be some men who would allow themselves to be circumcised – in public – in the next few days, and that they would also allow me to photograph it?"

"Oh yes, I am quite sure about that. We have not given the men any leave for quite a long time, because they get themselves circumcised during it and are not fit for a couple of weeks. But I think we could make an exception for your sake. I suppose that there will be quite a lot of men who are willing to do that. Their women are just wild about it and keep on teasing their men until they get themselves circumcised. They say that after it a man can last longer in the sexual act, and both men and women say that the penis looks much more attractive and... well, more erotic. During the evening call tomorrow I shall ask if there are any volunteers. An old medicineman from a northern tribe will perform the operations. But of course, you will have to pay the men in advance..."

Naturally I was willing.

As I came to the headquarters next morning at 8 o'clock, about 150 soldiers were standing in line, maybe half of them all, and I supposed all the uncircumcised men in the camp were there. Many more than I needed.

But I soon found out that there were 37 volunteers who would allow themselves to be circumcised, the others being friends who were already circumcised, but were there to give courage during the operation. (Actually, they were there to hold the men down, as I saw a little later on.)

The commandant was a little surprised by the number of volunteers and he asked me what I wanted to do. I said that I would like to select three of them, and, because of that, I would like them to take their clothes off.

Soon all the candidates stood stark naked in front of me, in line. I picked out three muscular and good looking individuals of different ages and sizes. The first one was a fully grownup young man, an athletic type of about 20, and his penis was exceptionally long and thick. The second was a bit younger, about 18, and his penis was of the usual size and shape. The last one was a boy, perhaps about only 14, not a soldier but an errand boy on the camp. But he was strongly built and his penis was at the typical developing stage for his age.

The commandant had already sent for the circumciser, as the operations were to take place on that day. He was an elderly man, perhaps over 60. I am not sure whether I would have wanted him to be my surgeon, but the commandant assured me that he had circumcised most of the men in the camp and that all trusted him.

I must point out now that many African tribes use circumcision as a puberty rite, and as it is a part of leading a boy to manhood, it often puts the boy's courage to a severe test. Among those tribes the boys and men are not allowed to cry or to show any sign of fear on their faces. But now the commandant explained to me that the reasons why these men wanted to be circumcised was only erotic and cosmetic, so there was no need to be brave and hide away any pain. He had seen some circumcisions taking place, and many of the men made no attempt to hide that they felt severe pain. He also said that, interestingly enough, the newly circumcised lied to the uncircumcised ones that the pain was only slight, so that as many men as possible would have themselves circumcised.

He explained further, that when the wounds were in the healing process, the newly circumcised could not wear trousers or loin cloths – thus they were naked from the waist down during that time.

The old medicineman wanted very eagerly to begin. He, the three candidates, and I with my heavy camera, walked to a hut. In front of it there was a big pot, full with slowly boiling water, on a small fire. Here the two men and the boy took off their olive green short trousers, all they had on. Once again I admired their beautiful bodies and marvellous penises – and their long foreskins, so soon to be sacrificed.

The oldest soldier, who seemed to be thinking about what was going to happen, had a partial erection; the upper part of his penis was of a lighter hue than the underside. The foreskin was pushed backwards slightly and the tip of his glans showed. (At my first examination, his foreskin was very long and extended more than two centimetres beyond the glans' tip.) I could see from his face that, now that the circumcision was going to take place, he wasn't so assured as he had been an hour earlier.

The medicineman signalled to me to select the first one, and I selected the eldest. He guided him to the pot and carefully washed the total area between the knees and navel, then pushed his foreskin fully back and washed carefully underneath. When his glans came fully into view, it, and the inner layer, were to me surprisingly light and pale in colour. As soon as this was finished, one of his already circumcised friends sat down on the ground, legs wide apart. The man to be circumcised had to sit in front of him and also spread his legs and thighs as wide as possible, so that the circumciser would have totally free access to the penis.

The friend who sat behind him put one hand under the arm and round the chest to hold one hand, and with the other hand covered the soldier's eyes.

Two other friends were there too, and kept hold of his legs with their hands.

Then the medicineman bent down and examined his penis meticulously. He stretched it by pressing the glans between thumb and fingers to see how much skin should be left, after the incision, when the penis would be erected. He then rubbed the glans slightly, pulled the foreskin forwards and marked with white clay where he would make the first cut. Then he made the first incision.

The incision was long and almost circular, going from the right side of the penis, down and under, and up on the left side back to the beginning. A white line came to sight at the incision area, and a rather big portion of skin fell to the ground.

Up to this point the man had sat calmly and had shown no discomfort, but as soon as the knife began to cut he started to wriggle and tried to get free. He was very strong, the others only keeping him in place with difficulty. But the operation was not over yet.

His friends took a stronger grip on him as the next phase began. The remaining part of the inner layer, which still covered a large proportion of the glans, was then pushed up and back behind the neck of the glans, where it formed a kind of bleeding collar. It was about half as long as the glans, almost two centimetres. The medicineman then stretched it with his fingers and split it with his knife from its orifice to the point where the outer skin ended. Then he cut it away at the glans' rim on both sides. The man groaned, as this was obviously the most painful part of the operation, but the old man took care to be very quick at this stage. When he reached the frenulum and cut right through it, the man let out a very loud cry, but this was the final incision, and the circumcision was complete. I don't think it took longer than two or three minutes. Then he was helped to sit near the hut and pressed his bleeding wound with maniok leaves and his fingers.

The second circumcision was almost identical to the first one, although he could not wriggle as much because he was not as strong as the first candidate. I was surprised to see what a good end result the medicineman achieved in spite of the primitive conditions. Soon the second patient sat next to the first one, and now it was the boy's turn. I admired how brave he was – he had just witnessed two circumcisions, and now was going through the same himself. He could not wriggle much because the friends holding him were much bigger and stronger than he, and maybe he did not feel that much pain because his penis was not yet fully developed, and his foreskin was rather thin and elastic. However, when the knife went through his frenulum he just screamed. But soon he was done as well, sitting next to his other two freshly circumcised friends.

Because I could not understand their language I was not able to talk to them, but I clapped them on the shoulders and gave them some money.

About four months later I returned to the camp. Obviously my compensation for them had been valued highly, because I realised that they had been awaiting my return. A canoe took me across the small river to the camp, and the paddlers, who were all naked and uncircumcised, made me understand that they wanted to have me photograph their circumcisions too – they pulled their long foreskins forward and imitated a knife with their fingers. But as my camera had broken down during my journey I could not do that. But I explained to them with the help of an interpreter that I would pay them a little if I could watch their operations, which was happily accepted.

The three four-months-ago-circumcised greeted me at the river bank with friendly smiles. They were now all wearing trousers. I was eager to see the results now that their circumcisions would be well healed. They had no objections for me to examine their penises, so we went to a small barrack at the camp's sick station.

I would now find out how well the old medicineman had done his work. With the oldest, maybe because he had wriggled so much during the operation, the part of the inner layer which was left was quite uneven. The scar line went zig-zag round his penis, like the points of a star, behind the glans. It was beautiful though – the contrast between the lighter inner and the darker outer skin enhanced his circumcision state strangely. With the second, just the right amount of skin had been removed. The inner skin formed a clear light collar just behind the glans, and it was certainly wide enough to guarantee a good sensitivity and feel. His glans was also totally bare, but the skin was not overtight on the shaft.

With the boy, the scar was absolutely even and smooth, but I wondered whether too much skin had been removed. I thought that perhaps the skin would be so tight during erection that it would pull his scrotum forwards. (I soon had the chance to witness that this was the case.)

They then put their trousers on and left the barrack. After a minute or two the boy came back to the door, looking at me as though he wanted to say something. But as I could not speak his language I could only smile. Then he put his hand inside his trousers and clearly fingered his penis in there, while staring at me inquiringly. It was not so difficult to understand what he meant, and I nodded to him. He took his trousers down and showed to me that he wanted to masturbate in front of me. His almost fully-grown testicles were tightly lifted up against his body and his penis pointed stiffly upwards, as is often among boys and young men.

I could see already in fact a bit too much skin had been removed. The skin on his penis pulled his scrotal sac forwards quite a lot with the tension clearly stretching the scar line. This did not seem to bother him; maybe just enhancing his pleasure.

He formed a ring with his thumb and index finger and rubbed his penis the whole length again and again, up and down. After a couple of minutes he began to concentrate on the same place, then at the area where the rest of the inner layer was, and also on the tightly stretched rim of his glans. He closed his eyes and took a deep breath. Then he spat on his fingers to spread a slippery layer all over his penis and glans. Now he worked mostly at the point where the scar was, which was now quite prominent because of the tight stretching. That all seemed to give him pleasure beyond expression. He approached orgasm, made a pause to let himself cool down, then went to the edge again and tried to stop. But now he had gone too far and could not stop. He suddenly sank to his knees and came violently with throbbing jerks. It lasted almost a minute. Then he sat tired on the floor and looked at me with shy dark eyes, as if proud of the fact that he had performed well in his new state, having had to learn a new technique. I then left him to go to my room to write all this down.'

1900

Students of human nature and willie watchers in general of both sexes would have been tickled pink on Saturday night 15th. December last year if they watched the first episode of the epic Italian film 1900. In it two boys, one the son of the landowner, the other the son of a peasant, grow up together in a small rural community, and become inseparable friends. In one episode, where both boys are at the threshold of puberty, they are larking about in a barn, and the peasant's son strips himself stark naked. In a clear close-up you can see the boy's surprisingly large, plump penis, still equipped with the long pendant foreskin of childhood. Sitting on a bale of straw he starts playing with his penis, and the camera zooms in as he slowly and lasciviously stretches his foreskin before sliding it all the way back to reveal the moist purple glans. Whereupon he invites his companion to get his cock out and pull his skin back too. The landowner's son, who had been watching intently, undoes his trousers, produces another fat and well-developed penis, and struggles vainly to retract his long tight foreskin, finally complaining that it burns and gives up, looking despondent, as well he might.

Later, both boys are in a cornfield having a pee, when the rich boy tells his friend that he can pull his skin back now, and proudly does so in front of the camera. The peasant's son laughs and says, no doubt accurately, that it's only because he's started wanking, whereupon both boys start frantically rubbing their penises up and down.

As the boys grow into young men, they discover girls, and while the rich boy is masturbating his spoiled aristocratic girlfriend during a hunting expedition, we are treated to the sensual picture of the other boy being induced by his schoolmistress girlfriend to suck her off as she sits in a chair. Having made him kneel in front of her and kiss her knees, she puts her skirt over his head and pulls his face up to her crutch. You then watch her face as it is transformed from laughter to gasps of pleasure, while his head can be seen moving rapidly up and down over her genital area.

Assuming that Italian film makers are as keen on realism as ours are, several points spring to mind. The first is that the Italian ruling classes of those days did not share the British aristocracy's predilection for circumcision, since the Briton at the turn of the century would most probably have been circumcised. Also his mother didn't take much interest in her son's development and hygiene if she let him grow up with an unretractable foreskin; or did such things not matter in those days? And lastly, one is left with the titillating thought that Italian girls in those days could not have worn knickers. I wonder if that's still the case?

I.C. – Middx.

[If I remember rightly, an early issue of Acorn stated that boys in Spain never tried to retract their foreskins until they were about seventeen. I find that a bit hard to swallow, but there might be a grain of substance in it, so that this film might not be too far from the truth. If so, it belies the idea that vile smells and diseases emanate from unretracted foreskins. — David Acorn]

Members' Meeting

I have been asked by one or two members if we could have another meeting. Although the last one could not by any means be called a success, nevertheless if there are enough members who would enjoy meeting others, maybe we could have another try. Anyone who has any positive ideas on a format or feels that something solid could be accomplished please let us know.

David Acorn

ACORN

1991 Issue No 4

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
The Editor	D.A.	Page 2
Love of a Foreskin	H.J.M.	Page 3
The Operation	C.P.	Page 4
Technique	Bill	Page 5
Saran	J.T.D.	Page 6
Foreskin Piercing and Stretching	A.D.	Page 6
Circumcisers	T.A.	Page 9
Five Minute Tragedy		Page 10
Foreskin Stretching	Samantha	Page 14
More From The Independent		Page 16
Pissing Survey	A.D.	Page 16
Penis Survey		Page 17
Home Circumcision	D.A.	Page 17

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Time for another edition of your favourite magazine, with quite a lot to interest just about everyone I think, from lengthening the foreskin to cutting it off. Please don't be afraid of introducing any other subject which has associations with our main one.

Contributions

Most of the letters we receive start with, "I enjoy the magazine very much", "One of the highlights of my life", "I eagerly await its arrival", and other phrases to that effect. This means that you are extremely interested in other members and their stories, and likewise they are interested in yours, the magazine being almost entirely contributions from yourselves.

So please keep items coming in; your experiences, opinions, feelings, agreements, arguments, habits, likes, dislikes etc. It doesn't matter if you think your spelling or grammar is not up to scratch, that's easily overcome. It's the ideas that are important. In the last couple of issues I have tried to start talking points but have had little response. Read back a few issues and see if you have any opinions on anything you read. I personally like short items as these give the magazine more colour and variety.

Thank you.

Confidentiality

Contributions will be identified by initials and town or county, unless either you ask for even greater anonymity or, conversely, you state explicitly that you would like a name and/or address published. Letters may be forwarded anonymously if you wish. Obviously we gain in frankness from being able to write with these guarantees in mind. Other Members may be contacted by sending your letter to Acorn in the usual way and asking for it to be sent on to the person named. It is your decision whether to give your address, and it is their decision whether to reply or not.

David Acorn

The Editor

I promised last month that I would let you know something about myself.

I am an ex-married, living on my own in the west country, semi-retired, in an almost idyllic state. Although not circumcised, my interest in our subject started, like most of our members, at a very early age; and again, like most members, it was more to do with the difference rather than one way or the other. It seemed to me that only poor boys were born with this length of skin, causing me to develop a lack of self-esteem which lasted through my formative years, and took a great effort to be rid of.

The syndrome, if you can call it that, in which most of us find ourselves, will apparently never leave us; the necessity to know the condition of all our fellows, and the thirst for knowing how others feel about the same subject.

Although I do feel strongly about certain aspects, which will probably surface from time to time, my general attitude is that, in the light of my early-years' trauma, all boys should be left natural, given a good education regarding circumcision without bias, and left to make up their own minds in their teens. What is certain to me is that it has no effect on anyone except the person himself. Being of the age when I can get away with asking awkward questions to anyone, I have found that, asking a good number of women about preference, all say they can't feel any difference, during intercourse, between circumcised or not, and very few worried about the look of it.

David Acorn

Love Of A Foreskin

Thanks for allowing me to join Acorn, and I enjoyed all the newsletters you sent me. I liked the letter from C.T. – Copenhagen describing his beautiful long loose foreskin. He has the kind of penis I dream about, but don't expect to see let alone handle.

About myself, I'm 70 years of age, and very fit. I'm uncircumcised, my penis being 5" flaccid and 7" erect, and my foreskin covers my glans but not the peehole. It's very loose and will stay where it's put, but I keep it forward always. I would love to have a long foreskin like C.T. and have started stretching exercises.

My foreskin has given me great joy over the years and still does. I hope you and the readers like this poem:-

Foreskins are fun,
And there's no fun without one.
Some are cut away,
Mine is here to stay.
It will stretch like elastic and it looks fantastic.
It's creamy and white
and never gets tight.
It slides back and fore
and never gets sore.
I get so much joy
from my favourite toy.
Foreskins are fun,
I wouldn't be without one.

H.J.M. – Glamorgan

The Operation

I have just read the latest edition of Acorn, which I always look forward to very much. I feel I must share with everybody my own recent experience of being circumcised. I had an appointment with the Surgical Advisory Service in London, to be circumcised on April 16th., after trying to pluck up enough courage to have it done for the past 5 years. I travelled up from Wiltshire on the train just in case I didn't feel like driving home. On the way up I certainly had butterflies in my stomach about what it would be like on the way home and how much pain I would have.

When I arrived outside the Clinic I hesitated and wondered about going in. My ladyfriend was with me and she said, "Just think how nice it will be afterwards", and gave me that last encouraging push through the door. Once inside, with the signing in having taken place, I sat in the waiting room waiting to be called. I couldn't wait to get on the operating table, all my fears vanishing once I was welcomed in. At 12.45 the surgeon's nurse called me into a little room to get undressed, everything coming off except my small T-shirt. Both she and the surgeon were very nice and I felt quite at home, and getting very interested in the operating room and its contents.

Once I was comfortable on the operating table I had the injections in the foreskin, the needle being so fine that I didn't feel a thing, and within about two minutes the top of my penis was dead, a fantastic feeling. Once he was sure that the feeling was gone he proceeded to cut away the foreskin. It was wonderful to watch that piece of skin being cut off and not able to feel it. Once it was off he began to stitch up the cut ends, about 15 stitches in all.

When I got off the table, there was my foreskin on his little operating trolley, and I thought, "Thank goodness that's gone". The surgeon put a small piece of bandage just around the cut and that was it. I left the Clinic and was back on the underground by 1:30, just three-quarters of an hour later.

It is now 6 weeks later and all is healed up, the frenulum is gone, and the skin on my penis is nice and tight with a fully exposed glans, and the feeling is wonderful. I am very pleased and my ladyfriend thinks it is a great improvement.

The only thing that I would like to say is that I would like to have it done all over again if I had another foreskin. It was a great experience and I would recommend it to anyone contemplating circumcision.

I am 58 years old, which may seem a bit late for this operation, but it is well worth it. If any genuine reader wishes to contact me through Acorn I am quite prepared to show anyone the finished article, be it male or female, I don't mind; anything to encourage others to be circumcised and share this great feeling. I have some video pictures of myself showing the long foreskin which I had and some pictures of the various stages of healing since my circumcision.

All I can say to people who, like myself, tried to keep the foreskin pulled back, get down to London and have it cut off – no pain – no fuss – and well worth it.

C.P. – Wiltshire

Technique

Dear David,

Many thanks for the newsletters for 1991; all the best as you take on the editorship; you must get many interesting and amusing letters to read!! The fact that some of the letters tend to be repetitive doesn't matter; everyone has a chance to reveal their experiences and views to an interested readership. That is what is important.

With particular reference to newsletter No 1/91, I thought the contributions from the ladies were excellent, and do hope that in future more ladies will be making contributions. The comments from Miss S.S. of Harrow about the rugby changing rooms and coach journeys were quite hilarious!! I wonder if any men have yet been seen in a ladies' changing room? I very much doubt it, but perhaps that day is not too far distant.

Her final sentence, "every circumcised cock should have a set of instructions with it" set me thinking. Surely it is up to every good partner to invent instructions, and to build on this as the years progress? It is easy to wank an uncircumcised penis; the foreskin is of considerable assistance. But with a circumcised cock it is different, and this is where technique and imagination are important, and where a patient and experienced partner is invaluable; it is not the climax that is important but the slow build-up. I have yet to hear of a partner who prefers to give 'oral' to an uncircumcised cock, but perhaps the contributors to the newsletter will feel differently.

I do hope that Miss S.S. of Harrow is beginning to compile the chapters of her instruction manual, and that in due course she will be prepared to share them through the pages of the newsletter. By way of introduction I will offer one piece of advice – women very much appreciate having their appearance complimented upon by the opposite sex, but I have noticed that they are not always that keen to return the same. A few complimentary 'cock' comments can work wonders, and that doesn't require much technique!

Bill – Kingston

Saran

Saran: I presume that you will have had other replies, but if not: this is what is in my dictionary:-

A thermoplastic copolymer of vinylidene chloride and usually small amounts of vinyl chloride or acrylonitrile: used as a fibre for packaging and for making acid-resistant pipe (formerly a trade name). I have no idea however where you would get it; perhaps a packaging specialist could help.

I have been meaning to write to you about another subject, although not specifically an Acorn one. This refers to the ability to ejaculate into high age. I am over 70, have had a prostatectomy, and have recently begun to take vitamins and other additives. I have not noticed much benefit, except for zinc. I did not even know that this helps, but ever since I have taken a pearl of zinc a day I find that I can come again almost daily. Vitamin E is well known to help where libido is lost, though neither I nor my wife benefited much (maybe we did not need it as we make love daily). She suffers from lack of lubrication and mussel extract helped so much that she had to stop taking the pills because the flow became embarrassing. All these supplements are available from health shops and postal suppliers. Anyone who wants an address I will gladly supply.

J.T.D. – London

[I understand 'Saran' to be a form of cling-film. — Tony Acorn]

Foreskin Piercing And Stretching

I would like to respond to the requests of Tony Acorn (Issue Y), C.T. – Copenhagen (Issue 2/91) and others (who have written to me privately) to write about my experiences of foreskin piercing and stretching. I have done this before in two separate and original articles, each with a different emphasis, published in 1989, in two different magazines (Piercing World No 4 and Body Art No 7). If this article bears similarities to the other two it is not due to plagiarism (one can't be accused of plagiarising one's own work), but because I am writing about the same experiences and enthusiasms in the same personal style of expression.

Nature had endowed me with a short foreskin, the type which terminated in an exquisite rosette barely covering the glans tip. This situation changed radically with the onset of puberty. During the years of my 'adolescence spurt' I started growing quickly in all directions but one! My foreskin seemed to be growing much slower than my glans, so that in its natural flaccid state more than half the glans was permanently exposed. This gave my penis tip an 'acorn and cap' look.

This development had certain consequences. I found that various unwelcome stimuli (such as friction with underwear when dressed, the passage of warm air when nude, or certain feelings, viz. embarrassment, anxiety, excitement etc.) would cause this short foreskin to roll back of its own accord to fully expose the glans, and sometimes cause an incipient erection. I seemed to be helpless in controlling this retraction which gave my penis a bold and brazen look, when in reality I was feeling very exposed and vulnerable, especially as I grew up in an environment of uncut males (the 'cut' ones were very rare). I had to endure this whenever I had to undress in front of a group to change, shower, etc. after P.E. and games in school, National Service in the forces, and later in college, as these institutions all had open plan locker rooms and showers. In the forces I recall several medicals (for courses, postings etc.) which involved queuing up and waiting around in the nude.

During this time I had read about infibulation in the novel Mandingo by Kyle Onstett, which described how slaves were 'ringed' to control their sexual activities. As you can imagine, this concept held great appeal for me, since I could apply it to solve my retraction problem – and perhaps use it to stretch my foreskin (by hanging weights). However, I had to wait several years before I discovered the excellent services of Mr. Sebastian (a professional piercer).

My first piercings were a pair (on opposite sides of the foreskin), and these remain my favourites for aesthetic and practical reasons. As soon as they healed I used a ring to 'muzzle' the glans, and enjoyed the look and sensation of this restraint. When a single ring was fitted through both holes discomfort increased with the intensity of one's erection, because of the short foreskin. I could then empathize with all those infibulated slaves. With two separate rings this was not the case, as the short foreskin could be drawn back and forth at one's pleasure. A few people have written to me about this, wondering if such rings would impede the movement.

Later I began to stretch both the holes and the foreskin by inserting a series of thicker rings and attaching weights to them. Over the next four years (during which period I had more important matters to concentrate on, like achieving a good B.A.). I gradually transformed the length and shape of my foreskin in a series of stages – the 'Peek-a-boo' look (with the stretched foreskin almost covering the glans) – the 'Rosette' look (with the foreskin puckering into a dainty rosette) – the 'Tassel' look (with a small excess of skin dangling at the tip) – and the 'Bottleneck' (with a long, narrow tube of excess foreskin at the penis tip). My elongated foreskin was now nearly 2 inches long, over the penis tip, when attached to a weight of 600 grams and over an inch without a load.

At this stage I decided to widen the circumference of the elongated foreskin and change the 'Bottleneck' look. I did this by wearing two infibulation rings, and then wearing a simple harness, improvised from a loop of broad tape, with one end worn around the neck, and the other attached to one infibulation ring, so that the opening of the foreskin was pulled apart when a weight was attached to the other infibulation ring. This was most effective for my purpose, but I also had a second pair of piercings, this time much higher than the original pair, sited at the front against the top of the glans. I was then able to stretch the circumference of the foreskin from more angles. By suspending a series of heavier weights, and by wearing the harness for longer periods of time, I have succeeded in transforming the 'Bottleneck' look into the flared 'Bellbottom' look!

The possession of this long and loose foreskin is a source of intense satisfaction to me – versatile, practical, and pleasure-giving in its scope. I shall summarise on a few of its qualities. With a tiny ring worn through its two infibulation holes, the circumference of the foreskin is effectively halved, so that it becomes quite a squeeze to retract the foreskin and expose the glans fully. This is one solution to the problem of retraction expressed by various Acorn readers, because the foreskin is firmly but comfortably held back behind the glans' flange.

Another way is to wear a larger ring (which matches the circumference of the wearer's penis) so that it and the foreskin can be retracted comfortably, and firmly, to expose the glans fully, whilst the folds of the retracted foreskin conceal the rings behind the flange. Frequently I use one of these methods when I take an apres-squash or apres-swim shower, and change with non-pierced friends in the open-plan showers and changing rooms. This enables me to expose the glans for washing and to wear, yet conceal, my infibulation ring from certain people. Thus I enjoy the happy position of being able to modify my appendage to appear circumcised, fully hooded (with overhang), submissive (with ring through foreskin), or stretched (with weight attached) to suit my audience or my whim. Visual appeal enhances sex.

This type of foreskin is also pleasure-giving in the physical sense because it provides more surfaces for stimulation, as well as an extra channel for tactile pleasure for both partners. The pleasure of docking should appeal to the imaginative.

Sometimes (especially in summer, or wearing shorts on holiday abroad) I use the guiche ring connected to the foreskin ring to support my penis across the scrotum and under my crotch. I find this support of penis and testicles both comfortable and bulge-concealing, and wonder why ballet dancers, gymnasts, athletes etc. have not been advised about the practicality of such suspension. It would eliminate the need for jockstraps, etc. The use of a suitable barbell facilitates quick and convenient 'unhooking' for calls of nature. I find that the presence of the infibulation ring does not interfere with the flow or the aim, whether the foreskin is retracted or not. Weight hanging, for me, is a special pleasure – a therapeutic blend of the stimulating and the soothing. It can be indulged in when one is engaged in boring, mechanical tasks like ironing, washing-up, gardening, shopping, or even when watching TV, reading or writing (as I am now, with a 600 gram weight attached). The sensations of pulling, tugging, jerking, swinging etc. are akin to those experienced in masturbation or foreplay.

The infibulation holes have been widened to accommodate a 5mm gauge ring very easily. This means that I can safely remove and leave the ring/rings off for over a month with no problem experienced in refitting them. Thus I can also choose to go about 'ringed' or natural. Without the rings, the holes are not obvious to a viewer unless they searched for them. Thus I and my partner can enjoy penetrative sex with rings or without.

This account of my journey into the realms of piercing and stretching is much more detailed than the other two I mentioned. I do not encourage anyone else to emulate me, since such experiences are so personal, and probably have different consequences for different persons.

A.D. – Oxford

Circumcisers

The last issue of Acorn asked for names of circumcisers in Manchester. Mohalim licenced via the Initiation Society for the year 5749 (1989/90) were (in alphabetical order of towns, excluding London):

Rabbi L. Benarroch, 90 Bath Hill Court, Bath Road, BOURNEMOUTH (0202-296103)

Rabbi L. Book, 66 Middle Street, BRIGHTON, BN1 1AL (0273-27785)

Dr. S.B. Bolel, 36 Ashtree Gardens, Low Fell, GATESHEAD (0632-4771176)

Rabbi A. Weiniger, 94 Whitehall Road, GATESHEAD (0632-770443)

Rabbi D.S. Ezagui, 176 Queen's Hill Avenue, LEEDS, LS17 6BR (0532-692735)

M. Fine, 15 Dixon Drive, Stoneygate, LEICESTER, LE2 1RA (0533-700130)

S. Adler, 10 Roston Road, SALFORD, M7 0HH (061-740 3071)

J. Cofnas, Flat 4, Brantwood Court, Brantwood Road, SALFORD (061-792 2123)

A.L. Cohen, 48 Singleton Road, SALFORD, M7 0EG (061-792 9284)

Dr. Z. Davis, 45 Cavendish Road, SALFORD, M7 0WP (061-792 4198)

M. Heilpern, 21 Broom Lane, SALFORD, M7 0EP (061-792 2127)

Dr. D.L. Hibbert, 11 Moorside Road, SALFORD, M7 0PJ (061-792 2470)

N.M. Halpern, 27 Waterpark Road, SALFORD, M7 0FT (061-740 1185)

Rabbi A. Hassan, 47 Stanley Road, SALFORD, M7 (061-740 0906)

C.J. Heilpern, 45 Old Hall Road, SALFORD, M7 (061-792 2468)

D. Olsberg, 22 New Hall Avenue, SALFORD, M7 (061-792 1907)

D. Katanka, 354 Carter Knowle Road, SHEFFIELD, S11 (0742-350542)

A. Dee, 5 St. Bartholomew's Gardens, SOUTHSEA, Portsmouth, Hants.
(0705-815833)

Members should make their own discreet enquiries, making clear at the outset whether their request is religious or non-religious. Mohalim do not have a set charge, but expect grateful parents/patients to make a suitable donation and to cover travel expenses if necessary. Those with the title 'Dr' are more likely to consider circumcising adults, since the training of mohalim is, of course, mainly concerned with 8-day old patients.

Dr. Sifman, (whose details we have given in past issues) would be interested in hearing from Acorn members regarding circumcision or revision operations. Please write to him through the normal Acorn channel.

Tony Acorn

Five Minuets That Ended A Baby Boy's Life A Report in The Independent, April 30th 1991

It was a back-street job, carried out in a council flat on a run-down housing estate in Hackney, East London. In a hospital, a doctor would have considered it an easy operation, but there were no doctors present on this occasion.

The day after the operation, the patient died. He was a healthy baby boy, only two weeks old. The operation, which was not medically necessary, was a circumcision, and it was not an isolated case. More than 100 boys, from babies to teenagers, were treated in hospital accident and emergency departments last year for life-threatening complications – such as haemorrhaging and infection – after a home circumcision.

The child who died was Boma Oruitemeka. His parents are devout members of a Nigerian Christian sect, The Brotherhood of the Cross and Star, for which circumcision is a membership requirement. The Homerton hospital where he was born, refused to circumcise him. The operation is normally done on the NHS only if there is a medical need for it. One doctor suggested the parents go to a local rabbi, who would do the operation for about £50.

Instead, Boma's parents turned to their church for help. A member of the congregation told them of a woman in North London, a member of the same sect, who would perform the operation at no charge. Though now a chef, the woman had worked as a midwife in Nigeria 25 years previously and still did circumcisions when asked.

She arrived at the third-floor flat in Hackney, carrying a little bag of instruments. A towel was spread over a coffee table in the middle of the sitting room. Then Boma was brought from his cot and laid on his back on the table. The operation was over in five minutes. Using forceps, the midwife pulled his foreskin forwards and held it tight. Then, with a pair of scissors, she cut it off. Boma's penis was bandaged but not stitched, and after a while the midwife left.

It was not apparent until next morning that something was wrong. Boma's breathing was irregular and he was pale and listless. He was taken to a GP, then rushed to hospital, but he was dead on arrival. During the night he had suffered severe haemorrhaging.

At the inquest into Boma's death, early last year, the coroner's verdict was death by misadventure.

It is not obligatory to be medically qualified to perform circumcisions in this country and the midwife was judged to have acted competently and without fault.

Yet because doctors are seeing a rapid increase in the number of post-circumcision emergency patients, questions are being asked about the legitimacy of having the operation done at home, and about the NHS's policy of refusing to perform the operation.

Ten years ago circumcision was far more freely available on the NHS. Mr. Roger Brereton, a consultant paediatric surgeon, says a shortage of money and longer waiting lists have forced the NHS virtually to abolish the service. In turn, this has forced parents, who are unwilling or who cannot afford to pay up to £90 to have the operation done privately by a GP or a trained rabbi, to go to someone with less obvious credentials. The problem has been made worse by the demand for the operation, caused by the growth of the Muslim population, which in some areas is doubling every 20 years.

Mr. Brereton says: "In the early Eighties my unit did at least 100 circumcisions a year, but now we only do a very few, restricted to boys with serious bleeding problems or some other medical need. I have no choice. Money is tight, and if I did more circumcisions I'd have to do less of something else."

Last year, Mr. Brereton treated 12 emergency cases. He says most of the boys admitted to the casualty department were Muslims from Bangladesh, Pakistan or Turkey, or Christians from Africa or the West Indies. No Jews had been admitted. "In the Jewish faith, there is a strict procedure in which a specially trained rabbi operates on the eighth day after birth. But with the other communities there is a much less standard way of doing it", he says.

With Muslim boys the age at which circumcision is done ranges from newly born to about eighteen. In older boys, circumcision is a much more traumatic experience than for a baby. "Ten years old seems to be a very typical age for Muslim boys", he said.

The complications arising from a circumcision can be very severe. The most common problem is bleeding, but Mr. Mark Stringer, a paediatric surgeon, says he has seen boys with septicaemia, meningitis, and arthritis caused by a spread of infection. Frequently, the head of the penis is partially severed.

These are horrendous complications from a procedure that ought to be very minor. At least 100 boys every year, across the country, are now being treated in hospitals for this sort of thing, which makes it a terrible and increasing problem.

The NHS is unlikely, however, to be capable of taking responsibility for all circumcisions, in addition to all the other demands on its time.

And despite some proven medical benefits – a reduced risk of urinary tract infection and of penile cancer – Mr. Stringer believes that circumcision does not justify a greater share of the NHS budget. "The medical benefits are probably outweighed by the risks of the operation, and it would be hugely costly."

Others believe the problem should be tackled by new legislation. Emad Jumailly, an Iraqi GP in Bow, who performs 600 circumcisions a year for a private fee of between £30 and £50, says only doctors know how to give an anaesthetic and how to stitch. "There should be a law forbidding non-medical people from doing circumcisions. It is far too dangerous."

Under existing law, a boy who has been maimed in a circumcision may be able to prosecute for assault, according to Maureen O'Hara of the Children's Legal Centre in London. She says, "It is possible such a prosecution could be successful. But the best way to tackle the problem is not to confront communities that circumcise their boys, but to educate them more about the risks." In some areas with a high Muslim population, doctors will visit the local mosque to talk about the dangers of home circumcision.

Pamela Timms of the NSPCC says if the NSPCC was informed that a child was in great pain during a circumcision, they would take immediate action. "We don't want to stomp over people's traditions, but cruelty to children is our business. If it was a matter of life or death, we would send the police in."

Not stomping on people's traditions was high on the mind of the coroner who heard the case of baby Boma. He says, "If I had judged that the midwife was negligent because she didn't have all the equipment of a hospital to hand, then where would that leave all the hundreds of rabbis who do the same thing? I didn't want to stir up that hornet's nest, oh no, thank you, not at all." But until somebody does, the casualties of home circumcisions are likely to continue.

A Responding Letter to The Independent, by Tony Acorn

Sir,

Your article points to the risks of haemorrhage or septicaemia from 'home' circumcision, but acknowledges that circumcision is widely practiced as a religious commitment by Jews, Muslims, and by many Christians from Africa or the West Indies (and you could have added the Phillipines). Indeed, at a rough estimate, one quarter of all males the world over are circumcised.

The dangers arise because the NHS has always discouraged circumcision and, as your article makes clear, has further reduced its availability under recent financial pressures. But the demand remains, and is increasing in Britain, both on the customary and religious grounds you describe, and from a significant group of men with a clear preference which cannot be justified as medical emergency, but is definite none-the-less.

In the new spirit of enterprise which is to pervade general practice, the opportunity clearly exists for GPs to use their surgeries to offer circumcision at a price which can be afforded, and to advertise this service widely enough for good practice to drive out bad. The obligation to do so lies especially with GPs from the faith communities who practice circumcision. Jews have well-trained mohalim organised through The Initiation Society. Muslims and other religious communities should likewise train and organise practitioners and make their services widely available.

Tony Acorn

Another Responding Letter to The Independent Muslim Rights To Safe Circumcision

Sir,

Your report on the practice of circumcision has highlighted again our concern about the safety of this religious practice and the complications arising from it. In fact, recently this year, similar comments were made by different doctors in various issues of the British Medical Journal.

We in the Islamic Medical Association have been campaigning for years to organise proper and safe circumcision to satisfy the religious needs of the Muslim community.

Until now the Muslim community and others have been at a loss about where to go for, and where to perform, circumcisions. They have been neglected all these years, sometimes exploited by those who perform the operation, and sometimes the circumcision has been performed in unhygienic conditions. All this when Muslims are, after all, permanent British citizens and regular taxpayers.

We feel the time has come to organise properly and safely this religious practice, especially when we see that this minor operation is required by Muslims, Jews and Christians as your article illustrated.

There are also people who want to have the operation for medical reasons. Some facilities should be organised in clinics and hospitals for all those who want circumcision, perhaps at the weekend, using the free time of (Muslim) doctors and nurses, possibly with a small fee to be paid to the hospital. This could be done without affecting the hospital waiting list for other procedures.

Dr. A. Majid Katme
(President, Islamic Medical Association)

Foreskin Stretching

Both my brothers were circumcised, and it wasn't until we had a visit from my cousin that I discovered that cocks came in another variety. Cousin Stan was about my age, nine, a striking boy with fabulous black eyelashes and a pale girlish complexion. The revelation came when Our Mum paraded all four of us for a bath. The three boys were stripped down and I was curious to see that, whereas my brothers' willies were in two segments with a bare knob stuck on the end of a stalk, Stan's was a smooth banana totally enveloped in velvety white skin with a pink spout on the end like a length of fire hose. At this point Our Mum turned her attention to me and stripped me off as well. Stan's eyes bulged out of his head! Whereas my two brothers were used to seeing little sister bare on bathnights, Stan was not, and that exhibitional streak which most girls secretly have was flattered when I caught him gawping surreptitiously at my fanny. (My goodness though, he made up for any lack of experience when he grew up into the handsomest man I'd ever met – girls queuing up to get their hands on him, including me!)

The trouble was, Stan's enthusiasm at the sight of my hairless split immediately took the form of a large (for a boy of his age) erection. The chatter died to an embarrassed silence as we all stood there looking at his four-and-a-half inches of solid gristle (I took a ruler to it after so I'm sure of my facts). I watched in fascination as it jerked upwards until it was almost parallel to his belly, with the bulge and darker colour of the knob clearly visible through the distended skin. Then of course my brothers followed suit, and there was I confronted by three rigid willies all roughly the same size but so different in appearance, whilst Our Mum just stood there looking flustered.

I couldn't help it, I just collapsed giggling, quickly followed by Our Mum and the three boys. The embarrassment dissolved and horseplay started, with the three boys accusing each other of being 'rude', and trying to grab each other's erections. Our Mum soon put a stop to that and, grabbing Stan, stood him in the bath to wash him down, at which point I was in for another shock, because she knelt down beside the bath, and taking his still erect penis in her hand, drew the skin right back to reveal his glistening purple knob. She washed and dried it before pulling the skin back over his knob.

Afterwards I asked Our Mum why Stan's dick was different from my brothers'. She explained what circumcision was, and said that Dad had wanted the boys 'done' whilst the family was abroad, but it really made no difference and was not considered necessary in England. As I grew more adventurous I discovered how true this was: my brothers' were the only circumcised cocks I ever got to see.

Afterwards we four kids had lively discussions on the different sorts of cocks, my brothers stoutly defending their knobs, and saying that foreskins were sissy. I supported poor Stan, and said I thought it was very pretty and much shinier than theirs. One of my brothers then said that it got in the way when you peed, and challenged Stan to a pissing contest. I was appointed umpire. (They wanted me to take part as well, but nice little girls don't do those sort of things. Sorely tempted though, because I'd have wiped the floor with them if I had, in both range and volume.)

So I had to draw a line and mark the furthest splash in each case with a twig. My two brothers were within a foot of each other, but when it came to Stan's turn, he pinched the tip of his foreskin and caused it to balloon out to an enormous size, letting it go under pressure by squeezing the balloon of skin to increase the range. Of course he won by a mile to the fury of my brothers, who accused him of cheating. I on the other hand was thrilled to bits – not all young ladies are privileged to witness such challenging sights.

So why should you be interested in these childish reminiscences? Perhaps a lot of you are not, but there is a spin-off which might concern some of your foreskin orientated readers.

I was so taken with this exciting balloon game that I made all my boyfriends perform it for my personal appreciation. I felt so aggrieved that my own anatomy wouldn't permit such things. Also when I got married I would often stop on the way home from the pub for a slash break, and have hubby perform the balloon trick, which always gave him a stiffy, which I would then deal with by giving him a 'wet wank'. At first his foreskin would swell up like a tennis ball, but as he grew older it went all leathery and lost its give, so he couldn't manage the same impressive swelling. At the same time his foreskin receded slightly, and instead of a half-an-inch overlap, the edge reached barely to the eye, so that it interfered with the flow when he peed, causing it to spray everywhere and giving him a chafed tip from rubbing against his pants. I instructed him to pull his foreskin back when he peed, but he's such a forgetful bugger! We talked about circumcision, but neither of us cared for the idea, and anyway it was far too drastic for the problem. So I hit on another idea. I found a huge ball-bearing and, greasing it with baby oil, I inserted it under his foreskin and taped the opening up with surgical tape, leaving a hole just big enough to pee through. Immediately his foreskin sagged down towards his knees, bouncing gently up and down with the weight of the ball (1 inch plus), and I told him to leave it there until the tape gave way, which it did three days later. Then we started all over again.

The upshot is that six months later his foreskin has permanently stretched to a prodigious length, extending nearly two inches beyond the tip. This has cured his accuracy problem completely, plus his chafing problem, and prompted him to invent all sorts of rude party tricks.

So if any of your middle-aged members, who still have their foreskins, find trouble with foreskin recession, they should take heart. A foreskin will stretch, but it needs commitment on both your part and your partner's.

Samantha – London

More From *The Independent

A dozen Filipino boys had a rare treat at the presidential palace in Manila on Wednesday – after meeting President Corazon Aquino they were promptly circumcised. The palace has just started offering free dental and circumcision services for needy families living in the neighbourhood.

April 12, 1991

Sir: Though removal of the foreskin is far less abominable than female 'circumcision', it is nevertheless a mutilation. If few complain openly, it is for a number of reasons besides the private nature of the loss: many years usually elapse between the deed and adult awareness of it: hardly anyone can compare before and after: nothing can undo the damage: and it is not often clear who to blame – though responsibility is often pinned on God. To deal with this last difficulty, circumcisers should be legally obliged to endorse the birth certificate with the name of the person who demanded the operation. We might see some interesting court cases in 20 to 30 years time.

Philip Stewart – Oxford

[Not being a reader of The Independent, I am beginning to wonder if it ever has any space for the rest of the news. Should we have a merger? — David Acorn]

Pissing Survey

I do this with the foreskin fully retracted when outside the home environment. Within the home environment, I indulge in a variety of styles (like Dick S. of Southampton, Issue M, 1989), with the glans bared or hooded, sometimes rolling back and forth whilst pissing. I always rinse the glans after a pee (at home), and give it a good clean during my daily shower, and whenever I wash and dress to go out.

I am not an exhibitionist, but I do not bother to conceal my dick if strangers look whilst I use a public urinal. I tend to hold it with thumb on top and fingers curled underneath it (with right hand).

P.S. In answer to query of E.C. Herts. in issue 2/91. Before the Muslim conversion, Indonesia was Hindu (colonised by Indian imperialists in ancient times). Bali remained Hindu (just as Timor became Portuguese and R.C.). By accidents of history this is why the males of these two islands are uncut Indonesians.

A.D. – Oxford

Penis Survey

There was a very disappointing response to my request for members, who hadn't done so before, to take part in the penis survey. Come on everyone, it's anonymous, should be lots of fun to do, and where else could anyone get statistics such as these? You could be part of posterity.

Herewith the one and only response:-

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
4.5	6.3	4.3	5	U	12	11	V.L.		5'7"	45 AD Oxford

Home Circumcision

I wonder how many members saw a few weeks ago on television the film, Drowning by Numbers. A black comedy, one of its sub-stories started where a girl of about thirteen asked her boy friend of the same age if he was circumcised. He didn't know what that meant, so she told him it was where part of a boy's willy was cut off, and her mother had said it was the right thing to do.

The boy went home to his father and asked him about it, and what it looked like, so his father showed him his own circumcised penis. The boy was later found in bed with the sheets covered in blood where he had done a do-it-yourself job on himself. He was then rushed off to hospital to repair the damage, and appeared afterwards to have suffered no ill effects.

David Acorn

ACORN

1991 Issue No 5

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
An Interview	D.A.	Page 2
The Opposite View	Anon	Page 5
Before and After	J.C.S.T.	Page 6
The Necessary Operation	J.A.	Page 7
Yearnings	P.H.	Page 9
Thoughts	Anon	Page 13
Technique and Tradition	Anthony	Page 13
Short Foreskin	J.M.	Page 16
Penis Survey		Page 17
Hawaiian Habits	H.J.M.	Page 17

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

With the summer almost over you all might find time to read your next edition of Acorn, and possibly find some contentious point of view that you don't agree with, to move you to pick up a pen. I have to say that I don't agree with all the viewpoints, but firstly, I'm sure no-one wants my interjections all over the place like a journalistic dictator, and secondly, I'll defend everyone's right to have printed what they think and feel.

I would like to thank all of our contributors and must congratulate them on their efforts. My work is made very easy inasmuch as editing is very minimal. I feel that if anyone takes a lot of time to write, then it is not for me to muck it about.

Anyway I enjoy reading everything as much as everyone else, and for some reason the topic never flags. Can we call our regard for the penis a fetish? I've just looked at my mini dictionary, and it describes a fetish as:-

- a. An object worshipped by primitive people.
- b. A thing given foolishly excessive respect.

I'm sure we would all agree on the word fetish if they cut out the words 'primitive' and 'foolishly excessive'.

As usual, happy reading.

D.A.

An Interview

I have a friend who is a very frank and open person, and also has some firm ideas on male appurtenances and associated subjects. She stresses that these are all purely personal and other women might have the completely opposite point of view on some of the subjects.

Thinking that her views would be of some interest to our members, I asked her if she would agree to a form of interview. In this way I thought that I could put myself in the place of members and ask those questions, pertinent and impertinent, which might be relevant.

Q. What age are you?

A. 47.

Q. Are you single, married, or divorced?

A. Divorced.

Q. And how long were you married?

A. 19 years.

- Q. How many children do you have?
- A. Three boys and a girl, aged 27,26,21, and 19.
- Q. How old is your ex-husband now?
- A. 63.
- Q. Would you describe your ex-husband's penis?
- A. Ah, yes. Well. He was rather well endowed as they say nowadays. About 9 inches long, with a very big helmet. He'd been circumcised, with a very, very deep cut, and there wasn't any loose skin left on the shaft, but there were very prominent veins on it.
- Q. Did these veins become more prominent with age?
- A. Yes.
- Q. You didn't mention his frenulum. Did he still have that?
- A. Yes. I remember it wasn't very sensitive though. The knob was very, very hard and also wasn't sensitive. I know that I've read that when grown men have their foreskin removed they tend to say that they have an increase in sensitivity, but surely this can only be on the scar, as nothing should be more sensitive than a knob always covered with a foreskin.
- Q. More to the point. Did he satisfy you?
- A. In the early years, yes. Later he took me for granted, I was always available to him, and I then felt I was only a vessel for dirty water. As long as he was satisfied it didn't matter about me.
- Q. What were your feelings about his penis? I mean, as a penis.
- A. I was young when I first met him. I'd seen a few penises of course, but only seen. And when I saw that, I thought, "Ooh lovely", but later, especially after my hysterectomy, and his treatment of me, his knob used to hurt at the end of the inward stroke.
- Q. Can you describe your ideal penis?
- A. Well first, one that's got a foreskin. Not too tight and not too loose, so that there's a satisfaction in pulling it back and forward. With a knob that's soft and smooth, you know, satiny. About 7 inches long and medium thickness. I like the feel of a longish foreskin bunched up behind the knob during intercourse. This to me is better than a large rigid rim of a hard knob, and is soft and moves. Mind you, no sort of prick is any good without a caring attitude, that's of utmost importance.
- Q. Right, now let's move onto your sons. Were they circumcised?
- A. No.

- Q. What were your husband's feelings about them not being circumcised?
- A. He didn't appear to have any opinions on it. He was done as a baby, took it as a matter of fact, as it was so common in those days, and thought no more about it one way or the other. I don't think he had any interest in what other people had or what they looked like, only where he was going to put his next.
- Q. Did you have any problems with your boys' foreskins when they were babies?
- A. Only with the eldest. His foreskin was a bit tight, but the doctor eased it back and told me to do it during bathing just with soap. This I did and there was no trouble after that.
- Q. At what age was this?
- A. As soon as they were born. I know that nowadays they say to leave it alone until they are about 4 years old, but it didn't seem to harm mine. It was part of the post-natal education given by the maternity unit that I attended.
- Q. Was there any adhering of the inner foreskins to the knobs?
- A. No, they went back completely.
- Q. As babies, were their foreskins very long?
- A. Two of them were and one of them wasn't. The two youngest had about half an inch hanging over, but the eldest only came to the end of his knob.
- Q. Have you seen them since puberty?
- A. I think I last saw the two younger ones when they were about 16. The eldest I've seen as a grown man.
- Q. Would you say that they were all built alike.
- A. No. The books say, 'like father, like son', but in this case I don't think it worked, (yes, they all had the same father), as I think the range is from 9 inches down to 6.
- Q. Have they ever discussed circumcision?
- A. Not with me, but I've heard them between themselves. It seemed just curiosity, they didn't know much about it, it's so uncommon now. I wouldn't have objected if one of them had wanted it. After all, it's up to him to be the way he wants.
- Q. What was your attitude to masturbation?
- A. I knew they all did it. I never said anything as it might have embarrassed them. I used to find their books, read them, and put them back. Nowadays, the two youngest sons are away most of the time, but the eldest is around, and we talk quite frankly with each other about all aspects of sex.

- Q. You've had other relationships since your divorce. How have you found them?
- A. Mixed. There'll always be men who just want a quick leg over, which isn't my cup of tea. I can now indulge my tastes, so now I want a man who has a nice foreskin, and likes soft touching as part of a long foreplay (my husband didn't like touching). Present company is fine.
- Q. You like foreskins. Have you ever suffered bad smells or deposits under any foreskins?
- A. Just once. I ran. A dirty person in one way is a dirty person in others. A dirty circumcised person has to be found out in another way, I suppose.
- Q. Last question for the record. Did you find any difference in the tightness of your vagina before and after having four children?
- A. Yes. There was much less feeling afterwards due to slackness. Then funnily enough, after my hysterectomy it all tightened up again.

If any readers have any other questions, I'm sure I can get the answers.

David Acorn

The Opposite View

Two brief items which might be of interest to Acornists. One is a typically whimsical item from The Guardian's diary column. The other is from Health and Efficiency. Mrs. B. Moore's lucidly expressed and quite understandable preference (it's my own 49 year old lady's too) made me question something.

Is anything known about women's age and preference for/against circumcision? Do women in their forties and fifties, whose partners/brothers etc. are more likely to have been circumcised, have different views to women in their teens and twenties, whose experience of 'the snip' is likely to be much more limited.

Anon – Derby

[The above interview is one. Let's have some more. — D.A.]

The Guardian – June 12, 1991

Sand in anything is a nuisance, but sand in your pants is something else. The Royal Army Medical Corps enjoyed a swift trade in circumcisions during the Gulf War. Operation Desert Storm caused troops to complain of inflammation of the important parts, on account of having half the desert down their trousers. Any urologist will tell you that this can lead to the infection balanitis. The quick snip cure is nothing new. It was used during the second world war when the Desert Rats came under the knife to protect themselves from the ravages of the evil grain. It is a little known fact that German troops also adopted circumcision as a preventative measure, but Rommel was less inclined to shout about it.

H & E Vol. 92 No 6.

I can never understand why circumcision causes so much controversy. As a woman I have always felt that circumcision is a sensible thing to do.

The foreskin serves no useful purpose and should be removed, preferably at an early age. The circumcised penis is easier to keep clean and therefore more hygienic; this is important to me personally. My husband is circumcised, for which I am thankful.

I also think that the penis is more attractive to look at when the glans is permanently revealed by circumcision. It is neater and, frankly, more sexy that way. Men who feel 'incomplete' because they are circumcised should stop worrying and go on a nudist holiday.

There are plenty of nice women who appreciate a well-circumcised penis. I met my husband on a nudist holiday and the fact that he was circumcised was one of the things which attracted me from the outset.

Mrs. B Moore, Avon

Before And After

I am responding to several points raised by both yourself and other contributors in the last issue of Acorn.

I am 40 years old and was circumcised two years ago under a local anaesthetic at the Surgical Advisory Service in London, and, like C.P. of Wiltshire, I could not fault the reception or treatment I received. The operation was carried out entirely without pain or embarrassment, and I have had no regrets or misgivings since.

I disagree with Phillip Stewart of Oxford's anti-circumcision comments for the simple reason that it is impossible to generalise. Every penis is different, and what may suit one man, or woman, will not suit another. However, as one who has experienced both states, I can say without hesitation that my sex life has been improved since the operation. Not only has my glans become more enlarged than before, freed from the restrictions of a rolled-back, hair-trapping foreskin when erect, but I now also enjoy a much deeper sensation during foreplay, and a greater satisfaction after ejaculation, which I previously did not know existed.

It is often said by pro-foreskin writers that circumcision desensitizes the glans and restricts masturbation. On the contrary, several months after the operation my glans became smooth and silky, making it much easier to stroke without the need for lubrication. The pleasure too of being able to feel the rim of the glans during foreplay, creating a very different and protracted orgasm, has to be experienced to be fully appreciated.

As far as I am concerned my foreskin was an appendage inherited from a distant ancestor who went around naked and vulnerable, and valuing its protection against the rigours of rough living. In these modern times I no longer need this natural sheath, and personally I am delighted to be rid of it.

Like the majority of other men who have been cut in later life my only regret is that I waited so long.

Unlike you, David Acorn, I would advocate routine male circumcision on the grounds that no matter how good a job the surgeon does with the adult member, the end result is never as good as that performed when young.

Finally, what about Acorn producing ties and small lapel badges with the acorn motif for its members? Who knows what interesting conversations might spring up from them!

J.C.S.T. – Argyll

The Necessary Operation

I would like to offer some advice to any readers who suffer from unretractable foreskins (phimosis). I am sure you will have heard it before, but the message is – don't delay – get yourself circumcised now. I endured my phimosis for twenty years before having the op., and because of the delay results are less than perfect.

My problems began at about the age of 11, when my foreskin, which had previously been fully retractable, became progressively tighter, until I was unable to uncover even the tip of my glans. A tight, inflexible collar of skin seemed to have formed around the opening of the prepuce, just in front of the glans. At first I was not too worried about this. I had not yet discovered masturbation and I did not know much about sex, so I did not realise the importance of being able to expose the glans. And in any case I knew that some of my schoolfriends were unable to pull their skins back, without any apparent problems.

Later in my teenage years I began to realise the loss of pleasure I would suffer during sex if my knob remained covered, and by then I had learnt that the cure for the condition was circumcision. However, I was too embarrassed to tell anyone about it, and, dreading it being discovered at a medical, I started making attempts to stretch the opening. One method was to insert the end of a pair of long-nosed pliers under the foreskin and opening them out. The skin would hardly stretch at all, and the attempts usually caused minor tears in the skin, which meant that I would have to leave off the treatment until the soreness went down. Even when I managed to stretch the skin a little it would tighten up again if it was left for only a few days. What I didn't realise at the time was that, when the tears in the skin healed, scar tissue formed which made the skin even less flexible than before.

These efforts at retraction continued on and off during my twenties without any success, and I began to accept the fact that I would never see my glans again. I even wrote to Forum Adviser asking if there was any means of stretching the skin, but their answer was no – the only option was to face the dreaded knife. I was still reluctant to submit to circumcision, due to a combination of fear, uncertainty as to whether it would really be an improvement, and the persistent faint hope that I might one day succeed in my efforts at retraction. I never suffered from any discomfort during erections, nor did I suffer from any infections.

Two factors eventually made me decide to undergo the relieving cut. First was joining Acorn and reading the accounts of readers who had taken the plunge and had been delighted with the results. Second was the fact that the opening in my foreskin seemed to be 'migrating' upwards, and was no longer in line with the slit in my glans. The skin had become so hard and inflexible that it would not move or stretch, and when urinating it was extremely difficult to avoid spraying in all directions.

I made the decision to be cut last year, and had it done by The Surgical Advisory Service in January of this year. The surgeon was quite horrified at the state of my penis, although he said that he had seen worse. After twenty years of being tightly pressed together, the glans and prepuce had more or less fused together in some places, especially around the rim and the frenulum, and he had great difficulty in separating them. He eventually managed, but had to remove all the inner foreskin as it was so badly damaged. The shaft skin then had to be attached directly to the rim of the glans, which has resulted in a rather unusual final appearance, especially on the underside where the shaft skin seems to merge into the glans gradually with no trace of the frenulum, and not even a 'dip' where it should be. Also the areas of the glans where the foreskin had adhered are still redder than the remainder of the glans, six months after the operation.

Even though the outcome has not been as I had wished in terms of appearance, I do not regret having had the op. My penis still functions perfectly of course, and it really was a great joy to be able to pee with a nice neat jet. I must add though that, like some of your correspondents, I have found masturbation less pleasurable without a foreskin, even though it wasn't retractable. It is nice to have the semen squirting out, though, instead of just oozing out of my foreskin.

Although there have been accounts in Acorn from readers who have successfully managed to free a previously unretractable foreskin, I think that in my case circumcision was the only option, and I would urge any other readers who suffer from severe phimosis to get themselves cut as soon as possible. It really is just as simple and painless as everyone says, and I am sure you are only storing up trouble for later if you leave things as they are. And this is advice from someone who is basically anti-circumcision (I would dearly love to have a foreskin back, provided it wasn't tight), but who has accepted that there are situations where it is necessary.

I would be interested to hear accounts from any other readers who have suffered from phimosis, especially if they managed to overcome the problem, and finally achieved full retraction.

J.A. – York

[It's great to know that we can be of positive help to one another with our contributions to our magazine. — D.A.]

Yearnings

I have read several of the Acorn magazines sent to me by a pen-friend who is a member, and now that I am a member I thought I should write and thereby make a contribution to the magazine.

I suspect my story will read much the same as everyone else's who has ever gone through the burning desire to be circumcised, and to take eventually what I consider the ultimate and inevitable step, of finally submitting to the surgeon's knife.

I suppose my awareness of cocks and their different styles first came to my knowledge at about the age of ten when at primary school. My best mate Alan and another classmate, Rodney, both had, I noticed when changing for swimming lessons, no skin covering the end of their equipment; unlike mine which was well and truly covered with ample to spare. I didn't know then that they were circumcised, but upon inquiry Alan told me that "It has always been like it!" I was immediately envious of the look of the naked helmet and spent hours trying to keep my rather long, loose and bulky foreskin permanently retracted behind the glans rim. Looking back now, I'm surprised that at the age of 10 I was not able to effect some sort of permanent retraction, but no matter what I did it would not stay back. I tried everything; elastic bands, sellotape, string and thread, all of which achieved nothing but discomfort and pain.

From then onwards my interest in circumcision took on monumental proportions. By the age of 12 I could be seen looking through books on baby care or health matters in the local library etc., and it was as a result of this research that I discovered the word circumcision, and from then on there was no stopping me – even dictionaries were read to discover more about the whole fascinating topic.

Also at this age my Father began to supervise our bathtime (I have three brothers – all younger), and he would regularly ask, “Does that skin push back? Let me have a look”, and I would have to pull my foreskin back for inspection. I suppose he was just checking to see that the skin was retractable, and that there was no hint of phimosis or any other related problems.

On one occasion he had me and my three brothers line up naked in the bathroom, and some comment was made to my Mother, though what the comment was I never found out. But shortly after that night the village doctor called and inspected each of our cocks, and checked the degree of foreskin retraction, though I quite clearly remember he did not push the skin back to behind the corona. He seemed to study the meatus for some time, gently squeezing the glans as he did so. I wonder now, does my Father share the same curiosity for the exposed glans as I do? He himself is not circumcised, but prefers to keep the skin fully retracted all of the time.

On joining secondary school and taking part in PE and games, the necessary showers began to reveal that about one in every ten boys were circumcised. It was at this stage that I began to realise that all was obviously not quite right with me, as I was beginning to find boys a sexual turn-on, and especially so if they were circumcised or had a retracted foreskin.

As I progressed through the school and went through the year groups it was interesting to note the different rates of growth and apparent masculine development that was occurring with my mates – several of them were beginning to develop hairy stomachs, some the beginnings of chest hair, and some were beginning to acquire well-proportioned cocks. My own cock at this time was already quite a lot bigger than the others, and I was constantly referred to as “the guy whose dick’s too big”. There was one other boy who was bigger than me who took great pride in displaying it for all to see.

By the age of about 16 or so I began to explore my sexual feelings with a close friend, and we would run naked through the woods etc. He was lucky; he could pull his foreskin back and it would stay back without any help on his part as he ran around. Mine, however, would only remain back if I held it firmly in place, and I became increasingly unhappy about the fact that I was not circumcised.

An incident then occurred which spurred me on even more to have myself circumcised. Whilst on holiday, my parents bought for me a new pair of swimming trunks with a zip fly. One afternoon, in my haste to get changed into ordinary clothes, I tugged the zip down and literally ran my foreskin through it. The pain was unbearable and there was nothing I could do to relieve the situation. I called my Father who, with the aid of a pair of scissors, managed to extricate my now very sore and swollen foreskin, adding the comment as he went about the job, “You’d be far better off without this, you know”. How true I thought, and how near I came to needing to have it done anyway at that point in time. I was quite disappointed that Dad did not take me to Colchester General Hospital to check that everything was still in proper working order – secretly hoping that it wasn't and that I'd have to be circumcised.

The Forum magazine was just coming to my notice by now, and whenever I was at home in the family business transport yard, I would go through the cabs of the vans in search of the magazine, which was being regularly bought by one of the drivers. It was in the magazine that I discovered that it was possible to be circumcised at any age provided that you had the money. I couldn't do what some of the members do, ie a self-circumcision.

By the age of 18 things were getting quite frustrating! I did have a girlfriend – only because my younger brother had one, and I thought it would be the done thing if I had one too – though the thought of having sex with her was not an appealing one. Whereas having sex with a circumcised guy, just the thought of it did, and still does, appeal very much. Meanwhile my foreskin had developed to an incredible size, and it was quite possible, whilst in the bath, to slip a complete tablet of bath soap into it. When in a flaccid state my foreskin would dangle a good inch and a half beyond the glans, and when erect the skin remained completely covering it. To me my foreskin was the most inconvenient and unnecessary part of me, though I do suspect that many Acorn readers will be appalled at my sentiments, so I do apologize. My cock had developed to a bigger than average size too, which now caused embarrassment, and was therefore kept firmly tucked inside my trousers. As a result of this reservation etc. I probably missed a great many sexual adventures; but there we are!

By the time I was 19 years old I had gathered enough conviction to set about finding out how to get a circumcision. I wrote to Forum, who replied very swiftly enclosing the name of Dr. R. Newell, a name familiar to many of you.

So in the May of 1974 I found myself taking the afternoon off work to visit Dr. Newell in Wimpole St., London. I wasn't too sure whether the doctor was going to circumcise me that day or not, but it turned out to be for consultation only. We had a pleasant chat and discussed the advantages of the circumcised state, though not once did he ask to see my cock, or even why I wanted the operation anyway. I can only assume that he felt such questions were irrelevant.

He gave me a prescription for anti-erection tablets, and sent me home saying he would see me in 14 days time.

I went back to him on the prescribed day and he expressed surprise that I had in fact turned up. It seemed that many people had requested him to circumcise them and then on the actual day not turned up, usually proffering some lame excuse or other.

He asked me if I had had any erections in the past week, which I hadn't, and then told me to strip from the waist down. Well, this was it, I was to become a roundhead for once and for all. I won't go into the details of the circumcision, as similar reports have been written by other people who underwent the same procedure as myself.

The operation was all over and done with in about 45 minutes, including the instructions on how to dress the wound etc.

The train journey back to Milton Keynes was one of great intrigue. For some strange reason I felt like telling everyone on the train that I'd just been circumcised; and I also found myself wondering who else on the train was like me – a roundhead.

The excitement was so great that the first stirrings of an erection began despite the pills that I'd been on for a week. The panic of burst stitches soon settled things down however, and I vowed not to think about circumcision and such thoughts until the stitches were dissolved and gone. However, one has no control over dreams, and the following few nights were disturbed by raging erections which refused to go down. I didn't dare wank through fear of ruptured blood vessels etc., so just had to divert my thoughts away. When everything had finally settled down – about 10 days in all – I had my first wank with my newly circumcised cock. The result was the most powerful, fulfilling and memorable wank that I have ever had, and was one that has never been repeated to quite the same ecstatic extent since. It was absolutely shattering and incredibly forceful too.

The sense of elation that my circumcision caused was beyond words, and still is. Why this should be so I have no idea. Can any of the readers answer it? In my opinion, my circumcision is an expert job, though I'd like verification of this. The glans is completely exposed with the shaft skin perfectly tensioned, not too tight but not too loose either. There is no bunching of redundant skin or raw patches of stretched skin sometimes referred to by readers with unsatisfactory circumcisions, and aesthetically the end result is very pleasing.

For years I have felt guilty that I should be so aroused by the subject of circumcision, and you can imagine what a relief it is to know that I am by no means the only one to have such a fetish.

Being gay, and there really is no doubt (the bisexual bit came and went years ago), has at least allowed me to indulge in my yearning for a relationship with a circumcised guy. This has happened only on a handful of occasions though, as cut guys don't seem to live in the Bucks/Beds area. Heaven knows where they all are.

With the above comments in mind could I please place the following contact ad.

Tall, slim, good-looking, professional, 36 years old, VWE, cut, gay guy seeks contact with others interested in circumcision and related topics. Beds/Bucks/Herts/Northants areas preferred.

P.H. – Milton Keynes

[P.H.'s entry, both fore and after (if you'll pardon the pun), in the penis survey appears at the end of the magazine. — D.A.]

Thoughts

I am glad that the Forum Society mentioned the Acorn group, as I feel it fulfills a worthwhile function for people like myself, where we can communicate with like-minded members and, in doing so, exchange points of view and experiences etc.

I have a very strong fetish about foreskins, they are very erotic and sexually stimulating. From a purely artistic point of view I have always found the circumcised state to be very attractive to look at and admire very much.

At both primary and secondary schools, I remember that the majority (90%) of boys had no bother in pulling back their foreskins long before sexual maturity and the start of puberty. I always indulge in cock-spotting in male changing rooms etc.; it has always been one of my favourite pastimes. I used to take a note of the number of circumcised and uncircumcised cocks, but I cannot recall ever coming across uncircumcised men with their foreskins pulled back and kept that way.

Anon – Dundee

Technique And Tradition

I would like to render a tripartite contribution on this occasion, hoping that it is not a too heavy-handed introduction. Before I start, may I wish that your editorial reign be one of measured satisfaction rather than penile servitude.

1. The Gomco Clamp

In a recent issue of Acorn, the Gomco clamp was most effectively described, but I would like to correct one detail. It was not invented by Dr. Hiram S. Yellen, but by Aaron Goldstein in 1934. The pioneering Yellen trials of the instrument on over 500 newborns, and his report, led to the clamp being wrongly ascribed to him, even in medical literature. His article from The American Journal of Obstetrics and Gynaecology in July 1935, 'Bloodless Circumcision of the Newborn,' was paired with Dr. Ernest L. Brodie's 'Office Technic of Adult Circumcision,' as promotional material by the manufacturer, Gomco.

The Gomco Catalogue places the circumcision clamp as the final item after a formidable array of pumps and aspiration units for medical, dental, surgical and maternity use. The chrome plated clamp comes in 9 sizes to accommodate glans sizes from small newborn babies to large adult, ( $\frac{7}{16}$ " to  $1\frac{3}{8}$ " )

Though the clamp prevents accidental damage to the infant glans during cutting, over-zealous use by an inexperienced operator could lead to excessive removal of skin, and shaft denudation. Even when correctly used on the newborn, one complication observed by Dr. John Graves of Iowa, was the tendency toward pinpoint urinary meatus. Circumcision using traditional techniques left the slit-shaped opening in the glans.

2. Non-ritual Circumcision – From Wholesale to Continuing Decline.

My graphs comparing the incidence of circumcision in the U.S.A. and U.K. up to 1980 (in the very early issues of Acorn), showed a U.S.A. maximum of 92% falling to 78%, and a U.K. decline from 35% to 5% over 30 years. Wherever the roundhead status has been of social significance, the non-ritual circumcising of babies has been falling off. Even in Canada, where circumcision was never a majority condition, the rate was reduced from 40% to a current 25%, well above the Mother Country's figure of less than 1% of babies non-ritually circumcised.

Against this background of general attenuation, it came as a surprise to come across figures from Australia. In that land where junior doctors had long emulated the Jewish technique by substituting the split-shield with bone-cutting forceps, the majority of newborn Australian males were clipped into conformity. Over the last decade however, the change 'down under' proved quite startling, with the circumcision rate plummeting from over 70% to a minority of 30%. Whether this rate is uniform to both the air-conditioned city environment and the outback is uncertain; I doubt if the Royal Flying Doctor Service extends to that of an airborne Mohel! Nevertheless, among the reducing number of Aboriginal people, circumcision still continues, but with the use of the white man's safety razor blade.

3. Tradition & Reform

Thank you for printing Steve Levy's sympathetic account of the dedication of Joel Shoulson, the American full-time mohel and veteran of over 2000 circumcisions. His use of the mogen clamp and cetacaine anaesthetic is enlightening when compared to the practice of the orthodox mohel in Britain, and his more humane approach akin to that of the Reform Movement. There are several differences between the approach to ritual circumcision of Orthodox and Reform Judaism, of which I propose to highlight three.

(i) In Orthodox Judaism a circumcision is 'invalid' if performed before the 8th day, or by a non-Jewish doctor, necessitating the operation of 'Drawing drops of blood of the Covenant' to correct the situation. Even where the time and operator are suitable, should the 'end' result deviate from strict criteria, offending remnants of foreskin are excised to ensure compliance, even on the Sabbath. Further pain is inflicted should the glans be covered for more than half its height, even at one point, or the ridge of the corona is more than half covered. Where a child is properly circumcised, any fleshy overhang occurring later is subject to scrutiny of the penis during an erection. If a third of the glans is not visible the overhang is vigorously clipped back until the glans is entirely exposed. In the least favourable instance the baby would be subjected to three cutting sessions without anaesthesia.

The Reform Movement have no concept of an invalid circumcision, so the baby is spared any additional pain or ceremony. His Jewish status remains unaffected.

(ii) Most Orthodox Mohalim in Britain are not medically qualified, to the extent that only 9% were doctors in year 5737. Only qualified medical practitioners, further trained in religious and ceremonial aspects, and practising members of an appropriate synagogue are used by the Reform Movement. This qualified attention ensures greater safety, proficiency that reduces pain, and ensures parental confidence without any loss of religiosity or sense of occasion.

(iii) Up to the 17th century, all Jewish circumcisions were performed free-handed, but the split shield introduced at that time gave a degree of glans protection, but no control of bleeding. This split metal plate is still used by the Orthodox mohel today, and recently developed circumcision clamps that ensure haemostasis are strictly taboo.

Because of a more reasoned approach to changes in technique, the Reform mohel can use instruments such as the mogen clamp, thus refining a time-honoured operation in terms of speed, safety, and final appearance. (The makers of the mogen clamp claim it is possible to perform circumcision in under a minute.)

In Britain the number of Reform Mohalim is small, comprising 10 practising doctor mohalim, with 5 in training, including one lady 'mohelet', the very first to be accepted for that office. A female approach, though controversial, will be unique, innovative, and possibly lead to subtle changes in the performance or the physical result of circumcision.

All mohelim are encouraged to make video recordings of their performing the Brit Milah for the purposes of comparing techniques and training. Together with consultations with each other, and mohalim in other countries, notably U.S.A. and France, the Reform procedure will become swifter, neater, and certainly less painful than the unchanged Orthodox technique.

Anthony – Devon

Short Foreskin

I was surprised to learn in Issue 4/91 that you'd had a disappointing response to your request for members to take part in your penis survey. I sent my details in some time ago and I can only think that my letter has gone missing. Anyway, I've just measured myself again and I list my details below.

A couple of points that might be of interest: firstly, I'm one of the small minority who has a foreskin but as a teenager decided to keep it retracted; secondly, I've got an appointment to be circumcised in the Autumn.

At the age of 14 I discovered that if I pulled back my foreskin it would tend to stay back of its own accord for several hours at a time. I enjoyed the look of my uncovered glans, considering it to be very attractive, with its 'always ready for action' look. I suppose that I thought it looked rather 'rude' and it excited me and gave me great pleasure to know that inside my trousers my skin was back and my glans bare – I was always envious of men who are circumcised. Initially, the rubbing of my sensitive glans against my underwear was a great turn-on, and I had an almost permanent semi-erection. Over the years my glans has dried and toughened, and has the appearance of that of a circumcised man. I find the reduced sensitivity no problem at all. I have increased 'staying powers' and can tolerate (and indeed enjoy) direct stimulation to my glans which I would have found uncomfortable had I kept my glans soft and sensitive.

My foreskin never fully covered my glans anyway. The tip protruded even as a child. After a few months of trying to keep my foreskin retracted it would tend to stay where I put it. Mostly, though, I preferred to keep it back, and over the years it seems to have shrunk in length while the opening has become very loose, with no tendency to contract at the tip. Its normal resting place nowadays when my penis is flaccid, is wrinkled up in the sulcus behind my glans corona. It appears to prefer it there, and if I grasp it and pull it forward it seems to resist. The inner layer doesn't slip naturally over my glans any more, and to get it to fit I have to tug it by hand. This done, it covers the glans rim and little more, about  $\frac{3}{10}$  in all. Very soon after letting go my foreskin slips back of its own accord – it's quite interesting to watch – until once again my glans is fully bared and the foreskin nestling in folds behind the rim. If I'm cold or anxious, and my penis is particularly shrunk, I find that it does retreat under the folds of skin to some extent. That's not to say that the foreskin comes forward in the normal sense, but it tends to cover the glans inside out. By that I mean tht the inner layer of foreskin stays wrinkled up behind the corona, while the outer skin sags down and partially covers the glans.

Because I still have all my inner foreskin, and because it spends most of the time wrinkled up, it hasn't dried up like my glans. It therefore continues to produce moisture which I dislike and wash away several times a day. The narrow band of skin at the point where the inner and outer layers meet is, in my case, very thin, and prone to becoming sore, and even bleeding if I handle it roughly. With these things to consider, I've decided that I would like to be circumcised, and I've made an appointment with a clinic in London for a day in the Autumn.

I've enjoyed my retracted state for a number of years, and I consider it a vast improvement on keeping the foreskin forward. If any cavalier out there hasn't tried it, I heartily recommend it. It looks good and the sensations are pleasant. The time is fast approaching for me to say goodbye to my foreskin. I don't think I'll miss it. I'll write again after my operation and describe my new look, and my feelings and experience on the operating table. If anyone wants to contact me, they can do so via the normal Acorn channel, and any letters will be carefully read and promptly answered.

J.M. – Middx.

Penis Survey

1	2	3	4	5	6	7	8	9	10	11
6.0	7.5	6.0	7.7	U	20/10	10/10	V/L	5	6'1"	35	(P.H.
6.0	7.5	6.0	7.7	0.6	-	-	-	5	6'1"	36	(Milton
4.2	6.1	4.3	5.0	U	0	0	V/L	6	6'4"	31	(Keynes
											J.M.Middx

[More contributions gratefully received. — D.A.]

Hawaiian Habits

Firstly, let me say how much I enjoyed No 4/91. Samantha's letter was very good, getting her husband's penis back into shape. It reminded me of an American magazine I read about 30 years ago.

On a Hawaiian island the boys, when they reached puberty, were told by their elders to pinch the tip of their foreskins when urinating causing ballooning. This resulted in 4 things:-

- 1. Flushing of the inside of the foreskin.
- 2. Getting rid of adhesions.
- 3. Making the pocket of the foreskin larger.
- 4. Making the tip of the foreskin loose.

This, they said, prepared the boys for sex in a few years time. It was noted by visitors that all the males, even the elderly, had foreskins which covered their glans completely. When asked about this, they were told it gave them the 'virgin look'.

Hope this has been of some interest to members.

H.J.M. – Glamorgan

ACORN

1991 Issue No 6

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Afterwards	R.H.	Page 3
Amah	C.D.	Page 5
Women's Points of View	J.R.	Page 7
Rites	C.L.	Page 8
We Know What You Mean, Harry	H.M.	Page 9
What's Wrong With My Willy?	T.A.	Page 9
American Women's Views	Warren	Page 10
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

The editorial of Forum magazine Vol. 24, No 10 goes as follows:-

“Just what is all the fuss about circumcision? Ever since I started work on Forum I have been constantly baffled by the amount of fuss made over a couple of square inches of skin. Some men are sensible enough to have joined the Forum Society’s Acorn group, which caters to those who want to discuss foreskins in any depth. But each morning my mailbox is still full of letters from men who want it chopped off, men who want it sewn back on, and men who want a whole issue devoted to the subject.

I’m not the only one to find the whole issue tedious. When Roger Baker was editor he became so tired with the incessant wrangling over the pros and cons that he declared a moratorium on the subject, a move I’m seriously thinking of following.

This may all sound very much against the Forum ethos of free and frank discussion, but circumcision is a matter that veers dangerously close to obsession in some people. Circumcision for religious reasons is one matter. It’s when otherwise rational men spend all their time thinking up excuses for why the state of their penis is preferable to the state of another man’s penis that it all becomes a little wearing. Strong claims have been made that circumcision is more hygienic, and cuts down on the transmission of STD’s. For the former it’s a simple matter of washing – and if a man doesn’t wash, do you really want to go to bed with him? As for the latter, wearing a condom has the same effect. I can never understand why one of the supposed pluses of circumcision is that it makes the head of the penis less sensitive and thus allows intercourse to last longer, when that same effect has always been seen as one of the minuses of a condom.

The sad thing is that so many men seem to be completely screwed up by whether or not they have had it done. There are frequent tales of locker-room abuse for being ‘different’, and occasional outbursts of bitter hatred towards the parent who allowed a supposed ‘mutilation’. Like women who pin their hopes of attracting a partner, or getting a better job, on a nose job or breast enlargements, some men focus all their fears and inadequacies on their penis, and long for the operation which will cure all their ills.

Extravagant claims are made that many women will only fellate a circumcised penis and scorn a partner who has not been cut. The truth is closer to an American survey which revealed that 50% of women did not know whether their partners had been circumcised or not, presumably because most of them never saw the organ in a limp state. Some women are never going to put a cock in their mouth, whether snipped or not, and arguments about hygiene, sensitivity and the like will not sway them. Personally, I don’t give a damn whether or not a man’s circumcised: it only matters to me that he knows how to use it, and that he is aware that a penis, cut or not, isn’t the sun around which the sexual universe revolves.

I'm sure I'm letting myself in for sackfuls of mail: if anyone has anything intelligent to add to the debate, instead of the usual self-obsessed ramblings, please feel free to comment. If not, can we please call a ceasefire in this protracted, unnecessary war between the cavaliers and roundheads.

Elizabeth Caldwell

I have written to Elizabeth, asking her if she would post on to us all her unwanted circumcision mail, so that we in turn can inform the writers of our existence and aims.

At the same time I am hoping that she might give us a small write-up in the 'Forefront' section of Forum, which is a good advertising medium.

David Acorn

Afterwards

I have been fascinated to the point of obsession by the subject of circumcision ever since, as a small boy, I noticed that all 5 sons of friends of my parents looked different (I later discovered that all were born in the U.S.A.). When I was about 8 I remember at a prep school medical not being able to pull back my foreskin, and the doctor discussing it with my father who was present. What he said I don't know but it didn't lead to my being circumcised, nor was anything said or done about easing it back at bathtime or anything like that. As I became more mature I became interested in all cut cocks at school (most boys of my generation – I'm 40 – at public schools were roundheads as I recall) to the point of jealousy and a sense of inadequacy on my part. Whilst at university I entertained the idea of being done but never had the courage. But after years of fantasising about the operation and trying to keep my rather long foreskin permanently back, I decided about 6 months ago, as it was becoming tight and hurting just at the moment when it should have felt best, to have it removed. I was very nervous and had to force myself through the door of the Surgical Advisory Service Clinic. C.P. of Wiltshire, in issue 4, was lucky if he didn't feel the needle at all – for me it was the most painful part – though obviously bearable. I wanted to, but didn't dare watch as I am rather squeamish – read a book instead – and it was all very quick and painless really. The greatest discomfort afterwards was the stitches catching on my underpants, and being woken with the pain of nightly erections. About the third night, presumably I was dreaming about the op. and my new look cock, I had a wet dream more intense than I've had before or since. I was terrified that this would tear the stitches but they were quite unmoved.

I noticed during the first tentative wank after 2 to 3 weeks, that just before orgasm, there was an incredible feeling of pins and needles in the area where the two skin layers had been cut and joined. This has now gone I am glad to say. I would have preferred that my cock, even when flaccid, had a completely smooth shaft with the scar ring half way down, but on good advice I requested the surgeon to leave some skin. This way there is movement of the penile skin during wanking. With so many men who were circumcised as infants, when no one can know how the penis will develop, too much skin was taken and it leaves their cocks taut like a drum, especially in erection. I am left with a few small bumps and wrinkles, but these pull out and disappear when I am erect.

One thing I would recommend to those going to get themselves cut is that they have the frenulum removed. Interestingly, when I had to make a return visit to the clinic, because a small area on the underside was not healing, I asked the surgeon why he had removed the frenulum (as in the blurb given before the op. it said you had to specially request this) and he denied doing so, thinking perhaps I was going to sue him, when in fact I was very happy that he'd been so thorough. I have noticed in men obviously circumcised in adulthood a great bunch of skin around the frenulum, and this not only looks unattractive but I think must feel so, as my cock has this lovely feeling of a dip on the underside, where, before I was done, it was always tight, bulky, and painful to the touch. To my eye it had certainly been removed, for not only is there only a vestige left of what was there before, but also why was there a stitch put into my glans at the very place where the frenulum once joined it and then the gut wound round at several thicknesses back down and stitched into the shaft just where previously the bottom end of the frenulum had run into the inner skin. Maybe the surgeon had to remove my frenulum to accommodate my request to have more skin left along the shaft, or I would have been left with a sagging bulk of skin around the frenulum, which I have described above and which looks so nasty.

But what being circumcised as an adult has taught me most is that, because my cock hasn't had years of being desensitised by rubbing against clothing, as it must be in men cut as babies, the head of my dick is still soft and sensitive, and the feeling of it being stroked, sucked, rubbed or whatever, is infinitely pleasurable.

Before being done I had believed that all boys should be circumcised as babies, for, as there will always be some who have to be for medical reasons, it is better that all are done, so that none are made to feel different, deprived or whatever. But now I feel very strongly that it should be done by law when boys reach the age of 16 to 18, and certainly before marriage, so that they have greater pleasure as well as all the other benefits that the operation affords.

Another thing that I have noticed is that sometimes when I pee I have two streams – one lesser one dropping vertically – the other main stream shooting out diagonally – then before one finishes they always join. Do others cut in infancy or later experience this.

I enjoyed the piece called 'African Circumcision', but surely no adult male can be circumcised, especially if the frenulum is cut, without bleeding profusely, unless there are stitches. Pressing the wound with leaves when a major vein is cut is surely useless.

Happily a roundhead.

R.H. – London SW8

[I would imagine R.H., that due to your newish state you tend to become sexually excited more often, causing you to lubricate at odd times. It is probably this lubrication, becoming a little blob just under the opening, that causes you to pee in two streams which join up later. I'm sure that most members have experienced this at one time or another. — D.A.]

Amah

[In the Far East, the amah (sometimes pronounced 'armah') was usually a nanny. Very often, though, she was also the major-domo, the cook, the parlourmaid, the housemaid and the laundress. A definitive history of these remarkable women, Superior Servants: The Legendary Cantonese Amahs of the Far East, has been written by Kenneth Gaw (published in November 1991 by Oxford University Press; 200 pages, 56 illustrations, 2 maps, 0-19-588555-4, £15).

In addition to the duties already listed, an amah could have an important influence on the upbringing of a child in her charge, as is well illustrated by the following account by one of our members:-]

As a little boy I lived in Burma. My mother died when I was an infant. My father worked away most of the time. I was looked after by an old amah, who only saw to my basic needs as far as food and clothing were concerned. In the mornings a man would come to teach me reading, writing and so on. After lunch I was free to play as I wanted, until called in by the amah.

I remember getting ill, and a new amah came. She was younger, and I liked her. I was about 9 or 10 when she came. I remember on her first day she was cross because I had wet my bed – I did every night. That evening she ran a bath for me, but didn't just let me get on with it myself: she washed me, paying particular attention to my penis, gently pulling the foreskin back and splashing it with water. It soon got hard, and she pulled the skin, saying now she knew why I wet the bed and peed so often.

Later, when I was in bed, the amah came into the room and sat near my bed. She told me to go to sleep and not pay any attention to what she would do. She poured some oil into her hand and slid it under the sheet. Her other hand gently stroked my hair and neck, all the time telling me to sleep. With the oil she began to massage my penis. I could feel her pulling and tugging it.

It was very hard and felt nice. Every now and then I felt a slight discomfort, but I was tired and it felt nice. Suddenly I felt that I needed a pee. I told the amah; she smiled and carried on. After a second or two I felt a tremor and pleasure – my first orgasm. Amah slowed down but carried on pulling and stroking; she wouldn't let me see what she was doing. A few minutes later she stopped and left the room. I slept. Later on I woke to find her there again: this time the cover was back; she was using both hands; my penis was very stiff; she was holding the foreskin back and rubbing oil into the tip.

I awoke early in the morning and crept to the loo. My cock was very red and a bit uncomfortable. I had a pee. This time the tip didn't swell up as usual and the pee came out fast. On the way back to my room the amah met me and asked if I was OK. I said yes. I didn't have any clothes on. "Let me look." She knelt down and gently pulled the skin back and declared it was better.

Each night for a week or ten days, after my bath, she would come into my room and repeat the exercise. On some nights I had two or three orgasms. She must have spent an hour each night stretching my foreskin; for all that time I was very aware of my cock; it didn't hurt but it was sensitive. The amah never let me see what she was doing, until one night she said, "There, look." She pulled the sheet back and let me see her with two fingers slip the foreskin back behind the glans rim. When she let go, it slowly rolled back up. She then told me to pull it back every time I had a wee, and when I went to bed to gently hold the skin back until I fell asleep. When she stopped coming to my room I couldn't sleep. She said she'd come. A minute later she came into my room, started to stroke my hair and squeezed my cock. I very soon had an orgasm and slept. The amah stayed with us for several months. She told me that when I couldn't sleep I should make myself come, and that as I got older there would be more of the wet stuff that beaded at the tip, and that was the way that babies were started. I'll always be grateful to her for removing what could have been the need for adolescent circumcision, and for gentle and kind instruction into the finer art of growing up.

I soon made a good friend in Burma that I was to go to school with in Singapore, and quite often I stayed with him. One night Charles and I were engaged in some horseplay after we had been sent to bed. Charles' amah came into the room and told us to get into bed. Then she did more or less the same as my amah had done, first to Charles and then to me. I was quite surprised. Later on we talked about it. Ever since Charles could remember his amah had helped him sleep in that way. What a pity that the English are so hung up about this sort of comfort: I suppose it would be deemed 'child sexual abuse'.

C.D. – Wales

Women's Points Of View

I have just read the latest Acorn, for which many thanks. Your appeal for contributions has touched my conscience, so I am making time to write – I think for the third time.

I very much enjoyed Samantha's contribution, and it made me think about the attitudes of women I have known towards foreskins and circumcision. I grew up with a long loose foreskin, having been subjected to several painful stretching sessions by the family G.P., and, having been to boarding school where about 80% were circumcised, I had developed a keen interest in the subject.

When I met my ex-wife, she had a friend who used to insist that all her boyfriends had been circumcised. This gave us a basis for interest, and for 5 years we struggled with my foreskin, which used to stay motionless in her vagina whilst my penis slid in and out of it. Eventually I was circumcised and both of us were delighted with the improvement. When our son was born she was insistent that he be circumcised, and of course in 1966 she had quite a row in the hospital to get it done.

Since she left I have had several partners. The first was fairly keen on circumcision and used to enjoy examining my scar. She had a small nephew who had a very short foreskin which eventually rolled itself back permanently.

The second was particularly interested in foreskins because she had left her husband, and part of the reason turned out to be that he had a totally unretractable foreskin, so much so that he found it painful to attempt intercourse. Quite why he didn't go and have himself circumcised I never found out, but as I subsequently heard that he had remarried to an American lady I think that maybe he eventually did.

The third didn't really mind whether her men had foreskins or not – it eventually turned out that her husband was as keen on retaining his foreskin (which he did) as I was on getting rid of mine. She had a ten-year-old son when I met her, and it turned out that she had never been able to retract his foreskin at all. Her husband had told her to leave it alone and it would eventually sort itself out. I suggested that she really ought to take him to the doctor, so she had one more try at retracting his foreskin, but couldn't even expose the tip of his glans. The doctor took one look at him and declared that it was a clear case for circumcision, which he had at the age of 11. She used to tell me that it was quite neatly done except for a fair bunch of skin around the frenulum, but she and he were very pleased to have had it done.

The current lady in my life is a nurse, so when I met her I thought she would know more about the subject than I did. No Way! All the previous men in her life, and there had been several, all had foreskins, but I have a feeling that she never pulled their foreskins back. However, I am educating her.

Finally, I don't think you have ever mentioned the short film Dick, which was shown at last year's Edinburgh Festival, and consists of shots of hundreds of varied penises, with and without foreskins, including one with a large ring through the foreskin. It is available on video from:-

Island Visual Arts, P.O. Box 1477, London. W6 9ND.

J.R. – Diss

Rites

Firstly I must congratulate you on continuing the excellent work with the Acorn newsletter.

I am uncut, but regularly fantasize about having my foreskin removed. I intend to put these down on paper in the near future so that you can use them in the newsletter if you think fit.

I enclose a review from the Weekend Telegraph of a book called Rites: A Childhood in Guatemala, by Victor Perera, which you might find of interest.

C.L. – Penrith

'The book is an account of a family of Sephardic Jews in exile, as seen through the eyes of a child, and deals mainly with the unimaginable poverty of the people. Included in this is the author's personal problems. The first being that, back in Jerusalem, perhaps to save on rabbinical costs, he had been circumcised by a Gentile doctor. Now, six years later, a troubled family conscience demanded a repetition of the operation in proper ritual fashion, and a Rabbi newly arrived from Turkey called in with the clippers.

Anaesthetics were out of order, and the Rabbi, humpbacked, virtually a dwarf, and with a hooked nose from which "wiry hairs radiated like an insect's antennae", leaned over him whispering unintelligible comfort in 15th. century Spanish. "The rest was howls, astonishing pain, and the bitter sinking knowledge that I would never again be whole." The experience damaged Victor's sexual development, and, as a result, he was 17 before he could achieve an erection.

It was a predicament that severely harmed his prestige in a boyhood environment in which one of his Guatemalan schoolchums could be initiated into sex by his aunt by way of an 11th birthday present. Shortly afterwards, he was stripped by his playmates in search of the tail which Jews were supposed to possess, the organ so brutally ravaged by the Rabbi's clippers being loudly derided. He struggled through to social acceptance and his share in the misery of the poor. He eventually married a Hindu girl (a religiously foreskinned people).'

We Know What You Mean, Harry

Your plea for contributions goes not unheeded. Another addition to the 'What's yours called' list that you kindly published in Issue 2, 1991.

Some of my schoolfellows referred to willie as 'gonga' or 'gonger' (as in longer gonger), the g being hard. No pun intended.

As the penis survey shows, I am circumcised and now 76. Over the years the skin of the penis stem has stretched, and I can now pull it forward and push the glans into it. This forms a very short stubby prick covered by skin as though a cavalier: something I have long desired.

After reading the information on piercing in Issue 4, I'm wondering whether my slack skin could be pierced and held forward over the glans at will. The difficulty as I see it would be that the holes would be in skin lining the stem. Any ideas, anyone please?

There is enough slack on my flaccid penis to protrude some  $\frac{1}{2}$ " (doubled) over the top of the glans, and this overhang can be pinned with wooden clothes pegs or pulled through a  $\frac{3}{4}$ " diameter metal ring to hold the cavalier look against an erection. In fact, I often wear it ringed for several hours at a time both naked at home or when outdoors dressed.

Harry M. – Colchester

What's Wrong With My Willy? by Ray Hamble

The author writes the medical advice column in Him magazine, and in the past has written similar columns for a series of other gay men's magazines. Medically qualified and in his late 50's, he has spent most of his career in the administrative side of the medical profession. This book is the fruit of his long journalistic experience. He uses a selection of letters he has received to lead into his, sometimes quite full, comments and advice. He comes over as tolerant, wise, and willing to smile with his correspondents at some of the oddities of a wide range of male sexual behaviour. But he is also quick with a well explained warning where an activity is dangerous, especially if it is illegal or likely to encourage the spread of infection.

The first chapter, headed 'Wankers World', includes letters and comments on earliest orgasms, wanking ways and woes. A 'Cockerama' chapter, with several items about foreskins and circumcision is of special interest to Acorn members. While giving a sympathetic hearing to both pro-foreskin and pro-circumcision perspectives, his sympathies are with the latter. This chapter also covers size (bigger and smaller than average – again he prefers the latter) and the problems of having a bent cock (if severe, this can be cured surgically).

Another chapter deals with problems in homosexual relationships. This is one of the strongest in the book, with sensible advice to correspondents facing various dilemmas. Many of these could arise in any kind of sexual relationship, but are posed with extra acuteness for gay men because of the legal and social prejudices they face. The advice is often to opt for the lesser evil, or to meet trouble half-way. But some dilemmas cannot be resolved, or conflicting loyalties makes a choice essential: then Ray helps to clarify the options.

There is a chapter which begins "We all have our funny little ways" – some of them funny ha-ha and some of them funny-very-peculiar. This one is guaranteed to include "something old something new" to any reader. Cock piercing is covered quite fully. There is advice to avoid truly dangerous bondage situations, and to seek broadly based relationships rather than indulge introverted narcissism. Other fetishes also covered include hirsutism, depilation, cockstraps and transvestism, plus the comparative virtues of boxer shorts and briefs. Another chapter continues the fetish and fantasy theme, but points out the need for safe limits, and encourages readers not to allow a fantasy to become more important than reality. There is also a cautious, realistic and sensible chapter on AIDS and other sexually transmitted diseases, which draws on the author's experience of running the AIDS advisory service in a large British city.

The title of the book gives a narrower impression of the contents than turns out to be the case. Gay readers will find that it has much to tell them which relates directly to their condition, but the book is a mine of information both sensible and bizarre, and it holds much to interest straight readers too. The book is available from GMP Publishers Ltd., P.O. Box 247, London N17 9QR, £5.95 plus £1.50 p & p (any number of copies); or from Gay Times Book Service, 283, Camden High St., London, NW1 7BX, allowing 65p per copy for UK p & p, £1.20 overseas.

T.A.

American Women's Views

Congratulations on the fine job you are doing. Tony did such a fine job that I am sure it is no easy task to follow in his footsteps. I have a complete set starting from Issue A and enjoy going back over them. Old issues of Acorn are never out of date.

I have seen requests for the woman's viewpoint on circumcision, so I am enclosing a few clippings from American magazines expressing women's views on the subject. It would seem that in countries where circumcision is the norm, women prefer a circumcised penis. They think it looks sexier, is cleaner, safer and more stimulating in coitus. In countries where circumcision is practised more infrequently, women either don't care, or prefer the uncircumcised penis. They like playing with the foreskin.

Warren – U.S.A.

[Thanks very much Warren, for your kind remarks. I have to say here that most of these letters are forcefully written, with opinions given as facts (eg. Men with foreskins don't enjoy sex as much as circumcised men), sweeping statements (eg. It is difficult enough to persuade a male of any age to wash properly, therefore all foreskins are filthy), and an ignorance of history (eg. circumcision is the modern look).

Since the beginning of Acorn I have made a point of asking the right people, ladies in particular (see the last issue), about the incidence of dirty and smelly foreskins. Most of them wonder what I am talking about. Well, I'd never heard of them before Acorn either. I would imagine that men who don't wash, don't get sex. Also if it was the case, with almost all men under 40 being intact, there would be such an outcry in the women's and medical magazines that circumcisions would be an NHS priority, with governments falling on the issue. You can guess that I own a sweet smelling foreskin, and that this is a topic that I do get incensed about, as it gives me an undeserved bad name in our circles.

The bigotry is not by any means confined to the pro-circumcisionists. Nevertheless, read on, and make of them what you will. — D.A.]

It Looks Nicer

My husband is circumcised and I wouldn't have married him if he wasn't. My two boys are too, as I made sure of that when they were born. All of my friends had their babies circumcised. In our crowd, when we meet any new friend who's pregnant, we make sure they hear our side and have their babies circumcised, if it's a boy.

We think it looks nicer, that's all.

We know that the main reason isn't medical, but for looks, because it's sexier to be cut. I can often tell when a man or boy has been circumcised, because I can see the rim of the head through the clothing, especially if he's wearing a bathing suit. This turns me on. With tight pants in style, many men show off their manhood this way, and this gives us a lot to watch, especially around the swimming pool. Unless the man's wearing loose trunks we can always tell if he's got the modern look.

The reason that it looks nicer is that there's a fat head and thick rim, sticking out proudly, instead of hidden under a tight shroud. It's nice to see a man's most sensitive part permanently exposed.

When we take showers together, I always soap up my husband's penis, rubbing him until he comes. He likes it, and so do I, because there's not any extra skin to get in the way. I also taught my boys to wash themselves carefully, and sometimes I see them soaping themselves there when they take showers. I don't say anything because they enjoy it. I told them why I had them circumcised, and they're very happy about it, especially as they don't want to be different from other boys or their father.

I think it's best to do it when born, because it hurts, and sometimes bleeds for a while. The boy doesn't remember though, and when he grows older he only remembers the pleasure of super sex.

What Nurses Think

As nurses, we may be able to offer well-balanced views on this topic, based on our experience on the wards, and also the more intimate moments with our boyfriends.

First it must be said that the majority of smart, well-groomed men show a complete disregard for hygiene where the penis is concerned.

This is only noticeable when the man or boy is uncircumcised, and obviously many are unaware that the sticky secretions beneath the foreskin are foul-smelling and objectionable. When a man complains that his girl or wife will not take his penis into her mouth, he should perhaps take a minute to examine his penis with his foreskin drawn right back, and judge for himself whether he has the right to expect his partner to suck him.

We consider that a man with a long intact foreskin has an advantage when he is being masturbated. It is a pleasure to roll the skin back and ease it forward again and watch the shiny blue tip emerge in all its glory and disappear again, especially so if he has a slightly tight foreskin, and it has to stretch a little to allow the knob to be uncovered.

It is surprising the number of males, not all boys or teenagers by any means, who have difficulty in retracting their foreskin behind the tip without considerable pain. No girl should enter into any sex-play until she has completely uncovered the glans and satisfied herself that it is clean and healthy underneath and behind the knob.

We have found that a penis without a foreskin is more satisfying inside the vagina. This may be due to the greater friction caused when the loose skin slides back and forth over the tip. It is noticeable that when a penis is circumcised the glans grows larger, being unrestricted by a sleeve of skin.

Opinion generally is divided on whether a penis looks prettier with its tapering foreskin or without. Either looks attractive to most girls, but I believe many of us love to see the tip with the skin cut well back to show it off all the time. Two of my friends agree with me, but the other believes that it is better looking with a long tapering foreskin gathered in front of the tip.

To summarise: we cannot agree on aesthetic qualities. We consider the long foreskin superior for masturbating and fondling. We agree that only the most fastidious of uncircumcised men are a joy to suck – the circumcised cock really comes into favour where fellatio is concerned, and we know most females agree on this point.

On balance, we are convinced that a man is cleaner, healthier and sexier without a foreskin.

I Am All For Circumcision

I am all for circumcision. Some men say that before they were circumcised they were far more sensitive and reached orgasm faster; but most of them are happier after the operation. It is pretty painful for adults, and in most countries nowadays it is automatically performed right after birth. [Well, I never!! — Ed.]. Today the vogue for circumcision is based on hygienic reasons. It almost certainly prevents cancer of the penis, and cancer of the cervix is rare among wives of men who were circumcised at birth.

As for lovemaking, the taste and smell of leftover urine, sperm and perspiration behind the foreskin can be a complete turn-off for any woman who might consider going down on her husband. If a man is not circumcised he should keep as clean as possible. In particular, pull the skin back and wash the head of the penis thoroughly.

Women's Ignorance About Circumcision

I never cease to be astonished by the incredible ignorance of the American women – and men – about the subject of circumcision. Having had a liberal upbringing in Denmark, an American education, and travelled extensively during my 10 years of swinging marriage to an American Air Force officer, I have encountered no less than 300 penises during my life – about half of which were uncircumcised. I feel more than qualified to enlighten your readers on some of the most common misconceptions concerning uncircumcised males.

I first became aware of how naive American women were about circumcision during my freshman year at an American university. My roommate and I were dating the same guy, and I made the comment to her that I “dug Ron the most because he was uncircumcised like my Danish boyfriends back home.” There ensued a heated argument because my roommate insisted that Ron was circumcised. It seems that she had only seen his penis in the erect state, when the foreskin was quite naturally retracted, and assumed that, because the head of his penis was exposed, he must be circumcised.

It's not surprising, in a country where more than 90% of all males are circumcised shortly after birth, that such naiveté exists. Since the explanations usually offered by magazine editors to such questions only further mystify the inquirer, I'd like to share my observations as a way to clarify the matter once and for all.

First of all, all normal uncircumcised penises have a foreskin that is capable of being completely retracted. While length and tautness of foreskin varies widely among males, the overwhelming majority fall within a narrow mean. Since my uncircumcised husband falls well within this mean, I will use his penis to illustrate what I am talking about.

When comfortably flaccid, his foreskin covers all but the tip of his glans penis. Only during extreme cold or physical exertion does the foreskin cover his penis entirely. During various stages of semi-erection, his foreskin covers anywhere from three-quarters of the head to just the corona of the glans. During normal full erection, the head is completely exposed, with the foreskin gathered in loose folds behind the rim of the glans. During extreme erection, the foreskin is stretched back so tautly that there are no folds of skin at all. So much for the natural positioning of the foreskin. When my husband manually retracts his foreskin (in the flaccid state), it will normally remain retracted – unless he sits down, or jumps into the swimming pool (water has strange effects on the penis, I've noticed) – and look as though circumcised.

I find it a crime that so many American males are mutilated by circumcision. True, from an aesthetic point of view the completely exposed head of the penis is a work of art, but, as I have already pointed out, the uncircumcised male can achieve the same look by merely retracting his foreskin.

At the same time the uncircumcised penis has a 'cuteness' and personality of its own, and has much more potential in foreplay than the relatively inflexible circumcised penis. The head retains a smooth satiny texture and an extreme sensitivity to touch throughout one's life. Another little known fact is that the leading one inch or so of foreskin, which is the part removed in circumcision, is richly endowed with erectile tissue, which responds to oral and manual stimulation in the same way as a female nipple.

The most common argument for circumcision is cleanliness, but it doesn't take much to keep a penis clean. Ironically, the hormonal secretions that create smegma, when fresh, are the source of the deliciously musky, salty penis taste that many women adore. Circumcised penises are virtually tasteless and nowhere near as much fun to suck.

Adult circumcisions that I have seen, very seldom seem satisfactory, often leaving an ugly scar that is neither pleasing to the eye nor the tongue.

An Exposed Glans Is Pornographic

First let me say that I consider the human body beautiful. There is nothing pornographic about the male or female body shown 'au naturel', provided that the body is indeed natural, or as nature made it.

But I disagree with your reader in the last issue who finds the circumcised penis very attractive to view. I consider the exposed glans of a circumcised adult male repulsive and pornographic. It is like showing a man with an erection. Both excite feelings that are proper only in a marriage relationship.

When Michelangelo carved his famous sculpture of the Biblical David, he modestly added a foreskin to cover David's bare circumcised glans. Other artists have used the fig leaf. We would do well to follow their example.

Problem Page

My problem is that I can't have sexual relations with an uncircumcised man. I have never heard of this problem before, but my doctor seemed familiar with it.

Three years ago I got venereal warts. The doctor said I probably got them from an uncircumcised man, and, since I had been with one a month before, that seemed logical. All the men I slept with for the next two years were circumcised. It wasn't until 8 months ago that I had any trouble again, when I met the guy I'm still seeing. At first I didn't even realise he was uncircumcised as he was always very clean and his foreskin was usually retracted. After about 3 weeks however, I got a terrible itch in my genital region. It didn't feel like an infection, just irritation, and seemed to get worse the day after I was with my boyfriend.

I talked with the doctor and he said that many uncircumcised men have a virus which they carry naturally. This virus can be irritating to a woman's tissues, particularly if she is fair skinned like myself. Condoms seem to alleviate the problem, but I went on the pill simply because I don't like condoms.

If I ever saw an argument for guys being circumcised, I think this is it. It is really embarrassing for me to have to ask a guy if he is circumcised before we get intimate, but then that's better than itching to death. Obviously I could never marry someone who was uncircumcised.

I presume the viruses elude soap and water. Have you ever heard of this before?

Answer

There is no scientific evidence for your belief that uncircumcised men have more viruses than do circumcised men. Nor is there any scientific support that you contracted a wart producing virus because you had relations with a man who was uncircumcised.

It is believed that uncircumcised men have cancer of the penis more often than do the circumcised. However, not all data support this hypothesis. Cancer of the penis is certainly not limited to men with foreskins; cases are reported in circumcised men as well. It should be stated also, that this is a rare cancer anyway.

Incidentally, the possibility of a virus being removed with soap and water is remote. Viruses tend to live within cells. They pass from cell to cell and would therefore be unaffected by washing.

Millions of women marry uncircumcised men and are not adversely affected. In fact, the majority of the world population is uncircumcised, and the problems you complain of are not common. This in itself is an indication that the fact that your symptoms followed experiences with uncircumcised men may be an unusual coincidence. For this reason I don't think it very wise to determine in advance that you would not marry an uncircumcised man.

There is a possibility that you might be allergic to the secretions found under the foreskin, but the study of allergies is still in its infancy. There's also the possibility that your problem with uncircumcised men has an emotional basis. If so, it can be dealt with. If your problem is sufficiently severe in this regard, and if the man you were involved with felt it would help your relationship, he might be willing to undergo a circumcision for your sake.

Contact Corner

Circumcision Video Now Available

Have you ever wondered what happens when a Jewish baby is circumcised? Send for details with S.A.E. included to:-

Barry Griffiths 582A, Lordship Lane, Wood Green, London, N22 5BY

* * * *

Male, 33, thinning, circumcised, is very interested in making contacts with other Acorn members who are aged between 18 and 30, who are circumcised or who are seriously contemplating the operation. I can travel anywhere in the U.K. My hobbies are music, photography, and anything to do with the penis and circumcision. A frank letter with a photograph ensures a reply.

R.M. – London E17

* * * *

I would like to share with other males and females my fetish of the lack of foreskin.

I am Neil, 46, working in London. My ladyfriend, Elaine, 43, lives near Chesterfield, Derbyshire. Both of us are clean, discreet, reliable, down to earth, mixing well in any company. Both have a sense of humour, and enjoy the company of likeminded genuine sexually experienced people who also value fun and friendship.

N.L. – London NW10

[If you wish to write to any contributor of the newsletter, please send the letter, enclosed, to our box number, giving the initial and town of the contributor.
— D.A.]

ACORN

1991 Issue No 7

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Arabian Rites	I.J.	Page 2
Pornographic!!	C.P.	Page 9
Bath Times	R.L.	Page 9
Carracula Baths at Baden Baden	T.A.	Page 11
Ecstasy	H.J.M.	Page 12
Hang-ups	Ms P.H.	Page 12
Young Naturists	H.J.	Page 14
Excerpts from Books	J.H.	Page 16
Christmas Greetings	T.A. &amp; D.A.	Page 19

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1991 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

From now on the address to write to will always be at the bottom of the front page, so that you won't have to look up a back copy each time you feverishly pick up a pen and send me a letter.

In this newsletter you will find two leaflets. The first is to tell you that it's subscription time again. The subscription remains the same for the second year running, and I'm sure that next year's issues will be as interesting as in the past. The second leaflet is the final exhortation to send in your vital statistics. As I said before, this is a chance to go down in posterity, quite anonymously. The two leaflets should fit snugly in one envelope.

All the issues this year have been bigger than in previous years and we hope to keep this up. This issue is bigger still, forming two issues to make up for the gap in the summer when it was found impossible to get one out.

It doesn't seem a year since I first started my stint with you. I've really enjoyed it and hope to keep on in the same way. If you have any suggestions with regard to the format please let us know.

David Acorn

Arabian Rites

Having seen a copy of your newsletter which was sent to me from England, I thought that I would drop you a line concerning my thoughts and experiences of circumcision.

From the age of five I lived in Qatar, so consequently I grew up in close proximity to a number of Arab children. One of our neighbouring families, who spoke excellent English, had two boys with whom I was particularly friendly. Ahmed, who was my age, and Ali, who was two years older.

We used to go swimming at the beach quite regularly, and it was on one of these trips that I noticed that Ali's willy looked different to mine or Ahmed's. When I got home that evening I asked my father about it. He explained to me about circumcisions and how all little Arab boys had to have this small operation done at a special ceremony "because they believed in it."

A few months later my father came to have a talk with me as I was getting ready for bed, in the course of which he asked me if I would like to be circumcised. I said I wasn't sure. However, when he told me that Ahmed was to be 'done', and that I could be 'done' at the same time, my mind was made up. (Some years later my parents told me that they had been concerned about my tight foreskin for some time and the opportunity was too good to be missed).

The following morning I dashed round to see Ahmed to let him know that I was going to be going through the same ceremony with him. We were both wildly excited.

The following Friday evening Ahmed's parents gave a big party at their house, the circumcision itself being scheduled for the following day. Ahmed and I had on our best clothes and were the stars of the evening, being spoilt by all the guests who gave us money and sweets.

Late in the evening Ahmed and I were packed off to bed (I was to sleep in his room so that the grownups could carry on with the party). As we undressed for bed Ali came in and started to talk to us. He asked us if we were scared, to which of course we said not. "It does hurt, you know", he said, but Ahmed and I were not bothered, we were too excited. I did however ask to take a close look at Ali's willy to know exactly what I was letting myself in for. He obligingly took off his shorts and let me handle his willy. It was the first time that I had had a really close look at a circumcised penis, and I ran my finger along the smooth line which ran around the shaft about halfway down, and examined his permanently exposed knob. Ali's little penis stiffened as I tried to move the skin backwards and forwards on the shaft. Ali asked to look at my willy which I willingly let him do. He pulled back my foreskin gently but he could not expose the tip to make my penis look like his as my foreskin was too tight. He then pulled my foreskin forwards holding the tip of my long soft tassel of skin between his thumb and forefinger. He said, "They will do this to you tomorrow, and then they will make the cut, so you will be like me." I could not wait. Both Ahmed and I slept fitfully that night, our curiosity and excitement keeping us talking half the night.

We were woken early and told to take a thorough bath. We scrubbed together in the same tub of water, slightly too cold for comfort, Ahmed's mother saying that this was to make us ready. After our baths we got dressed in a pair of white dis-das gowns which had been given to us the evening before.

When we came downstairs the grownups were already gathered in the yard of the house, where a trestle table had been placed covered with a sheet. Ahmed's father made a brief speech and then called me forward – as guest it seemed that I was to be first.

I was helped onto the table and my white gown was pulled up to my waist exposing my all to the watching crowd. My arms and legs were held gently but securely by a couple of the guests. A man whom I'd never seen before bent over me and said, "Don't worry, I will do it quickly." The man then gently started to examine my willy, pulling my long thin foreskin backwards and forwards until I was stiff. By lifting my head I could watch everything. Once I had erected, the operator took a thin metal probe which he ran inside my foreskin. I felt the cold metal move around past my glans, a sensation that excited me even more, and sent tingling sensations all over my body. Surprisingly I did not feel in the slightest bit scared, or even embarrassed that my privates were on display to all. My father, standing beside me, smiled and said, "Look at me.” As he said this I felt the operator pull hard on my foreskin, followed by a crushing sensation. I looked down and saw a wooden clamp a bit like a thin wooden clothes peg being placed on my foreskin. My father said, “No, look up at me,” but I could not bring myself to take my eyes off what was being done to my body. The operator pulled hard with his left hand on the very tip of my tassel of foreskin, now stretched out a good inch and a half beyond the wooden clamp which he was pushing on with his right hand. It started to hurt a lot and I remember crying out. Suddenly I was aware of a quick movement by my privates, and I felt a warm glowing sensation in my willy. The painful pulling feeling vanished and was replaced by a sharp stinging sensation. I looked down again and saw the acorn shaped tip of my glans for the first time ever. The operator gently pushed back the remains of the thin inner skin, which did not hurt at all, and then wrapped the shaft of my penis in a gauze bandage, leaving my freshly-exposed moist, purple-coloured glans protruding for all to see. It was over. I was helped down from the table and my gown was replaced.

My place was taken by Ahmed, who received the same treatment. I could not see what was going on, however, as I was led away by my father. He took me up to Ahmed’s room and got me onto my bed of the night before. In minutes, Ahmed was brought up by his father and put onto his bed.

Well-wishers came and told us how brave we had been, and were brought drinks. After everybody had gone except our parents and Ali, our gowns were pulled up again and the bandages checked. My bandages had a little blood on them but obviously not enough to cause concern. I could see that Ahmed’s penis was bandaged just like mine with the tip free from the bandage.

Both of us were then left to rest, which we did, the lack of sleep the previous night catching up with us.

I spent the next couple of days convalescing at Ahmed’s house, as our parents thought that we would like to be together. On the third morning after the ceremony we were both taken for a bath and the bandages were removed by Ahmed’s mother as we soaked. I remember being a little frightened by the appearance of my willy, which looked bruised and battered with a scab running round it like a ring. However, Ahmed’s looked just like it so I stopped worrying.

Over the next couple of days we rapidly returned to our normal energetic little selves, running around and generally causing mayhem. I think that Ahmed’s parents were quite glad to see me go back to my house after that.

Over the next couple of weeks both our wounds healed rapidly so that all that was left was a smooth red ring around the shaft (we compared our wounds as frequently as we could). Both our knobs changed from being shiny purple acorns, very sensitive to the touch, to being pinker and less sensitive.

Neither of us had any loose skin at all, the scar being halfway down the shaft with the glans rim being completely free from overhanging tissue. During our comparisons we would both often get erections, which made us even more proud of our new status. I am still proud of my circumcision, which I consider to be very neatly done. I also remember the day of my circumcision with pleasure, and not as having been an ordeal; evidence that circumcision in childhood does not necessarily damage the psyche.

When I was ten years old I was sent back to England to go to boarding school. The school was an all-boys school in an old country house in Yorkshire, pupils being accommodated five to a bedroom rather than in large dormitories. I quickly made friends with the other four boys in my room, who all knew each other from prep school. David, who had the next bed to mine was particularly friendly and welcoming, and I sensed that we would become good chums.

The first evening at bedtime we all undressed very shy of the fact that we were exposing our bodies in front of others, but at the same time sneaking little glances at everyone else. Up to that time all of my friends had been circumcised like myself, but my rapid inspection of my room-mates that evening revealed that all of them were in possession of foreskins. The fact that I was different from them did not escape their attentions either, although nobody passed comment; we were all too shy. Whilst in Qatar I was proud of my circumcision because I was one of the gang, but all of a sudden I felt different.

The following evening we were told that we all had to take a bath before bed, and to my surprise and horror it turned out that we had to share tubs in one large room fitted with several large baths. This was to be the moment of reckoning. We all undressed and climbed into the tubs and I felt that everyone's eyes were on me. I tried to ignore the stares but my embarrassment was plain for all to see. No-one said anything until we were back in our room and preparing ourselves for bed; then Richard, the most outspoken of my room-mates said, "I hope you don't mind me asking, but what happened to your dick?" I coloured bright red, and then mustering my courage to overcome my embarrassment, told my friends about circumcision. They all eagerly asked questions and seemed shocked when I told them how the operation had been done. "Didn't it hurt," asked John. "No," I replied, "not at the time, and only a little bit afterwards." My friends seemed impressed which made me feel much better about being different.

Richard asked to look at my willy, to which I replied, "Yes, if I can look at yours." I sat on my bed and pulled my pyjama trousers down, exposing what had become the centre of attention. Richard looked closely and then felt my penis with his fingers, running his fingertips around the smooth scar which encircled my shaft. The others I could see were no less interested than Richard. Being the centre made my penis stiffen to erection, making my permanently exposed little knob stand proudly out from my groin.

"Let's have a look at yours then", and pulled Richard's pyjamas down for him. Richard's penis was already firmly erect as I uncovered it, and his short foreskin had withdrawn just enough to expose the tip of his glans. I examined his penis and, to my surprise, discovered that his foreskin could be pulled back to expose his purple knob. I expressed surprise, and said, "I didn't know you could do that", which made all the others laugh. Richard said, "Come on you lot, let Ian have a look at yours as well, then." John and Paul enthusiastically exposed their willies for examination, as did David, who had been rather quiet throughout. John and Paul both had penises like Richard's, with short thin, easily retractable foreskins, which both of them pulled back exposing their moist shiny little knobs. David's penis by comparison was completely different, much smaller than any of the others, and endowed with a long tapering tassel of foreskin, which even in his erect state protruded a good quarter of an inch beyond the end of his knob, the outline of which could be clearly seen underneath his thin pale foreskin.

David, obviously embarrassed, said, "Mine won't pull back, and I have got to be circumcised like Ian. I went to the hospital last week and they are going to do it for me." As he said this we heard the steps of the duty master coming up the stairs to turn off the lights, so we all quickly jumped under the covers and made like nothing had happened.

After the lights went out and the master had gone, I leant across to David and said, "Don't worry about it, you'll be ever so pleased after it's done." I had forgotten completely about being different.

That evening was the start of a process which saw the five of us become very close friends. David and I became particularly close, and he frequently quizzed me about circumcision, obviously very nervous about what lay ahead for him.

On the first day after the Xmas holiday, David came up to me, and in a half whisper, said "I have had it done. It isn't too bad, is it." That evening at bedtime, with obvious pride, he exposed his restyled willy as he was getting undressed for bed. I said, "Now there's two of us then", which got everyone else's attention. We all gathered round David who happily let us examine the surgeon's handiwork.

David's circumcision was quite different to mine, his scar being right behind his small acorn shaped knob, with very little of the pink inner skin remaining. As the others looked at his willy he grinned happily at me, obviously happy to be circumcised.

P.S. Out of my class of twenty boys aged 11 in 1970, eight were circumcised. One boy had what I now know to be a Jewish type of circumcision, with a very tight result on top, and a small bunch of inner foreskin remaining by the frenulum. Three boys had loosely trimmed foreskins, which covered the glans rim, and three boys (including David) had tight results with no loose skin, and with the scar close to the glans rim. I was the only possessor of an Arab type circumcision.

Having told you about my circumcision and of my school experiences, I thought that I would complete the tale by writing about the circumcision of my children.

After I left university, I obtained a job in Dubai. Whilst there I met and married an American lady, and a year later became the father of twin boys. There was no doubt in either of our minds that they should be circumcised, my being happy with my own, and Jackie, being American, had only ever seen circumcised boys. What we were not keen on, however, was the prospect of our boys being circumcised just after birth in the maternity hospital, the results that we had seen on some of our friends' children being far from neat, with ragged collars of inner foreskin remaining around the glans (out here most little boys are circumcised within the first couple of days of life, Muslim and non-Muslim alike).

I asked the advice of one of my Muslim colleagues at work, who recommended me to a traditional Arab barber surgeon in the next Emirate. So when the boys were about 6 months old we arranged an appointment to see Ekrem the barber to have the boys 'done'.

Ekrem turned out to be a delightful chap, Turkish in origin. He agreed to operate on the boys there and then, delighted that an English father should wish his boys to have a Muslim circumcision.

I undressed the boys and lifted them onto the padded couch which was in the room. Ekrem said that he wished me to hold Paul for the operation, whilst Jackie looked after Thomas. We laid Paul flat on the couch with me at the foot end, holding my son's legs apart at an angle of about 33 degrees.

Ekrem prepared his instruments and then washed Paul's groin with a disinfectant solution. He then took Paul's little willy gently between the finger and thumb of one hand and massaged it until it became erect. He then took a thin metal probe and inserted it under the foreskin, sweeping it from side to side to separate the skin from the underlying glans. Having done this he made a little scratch with his thumbnail at the point where the edge of the glans could be seen through the thin underlying foreskin. Next he gripped the tip of the foreskin with the finger and thumb of his left hand and pulled upwards, stretching the mobile skin to its full extent. Paul let out a whimper at this stage, which turned to a cry as Ekrem placed a clamp on the foreskin. The clamp was a thin metal disc with a V-shaped notch cut into it, into which the foreskin was slid. Using his right hand to slide the clamp down the foreskin so that the glans remained protected, he pulled as firmly as possible on the protruding tassel of skin with his left hand. Having placed the clamp in position, he took a razor in his right hand, and with a quick movement cut the foreskin along the upper face of the metal disc. The clamp fell away and the cut outer shaft skin flicked back to a point about halfway down Paul's still erect penis. Ekrem pushed back the delicate layer of inner skin from the shiny plum-coloured glans so that it met the cut edge of the shaft skin, and then applied a paraffin gauze dressing which he covered with a lint bandage. There was only the smallest amount of blood spilt which was quickly soaked up by the lint. Paul's cries were quickly comforted by a cuddle before Thomas was dealt with in exactly the same way.

After a cup of tea we paid Ekrem the princely sum of 20 dirhams (two pounds) for his services and took the boys home. Both boys slept for most of the ride home, following which they acted as if nothing out of the ordinary had occurred. Following Ekrem's instructions we left the bandages for two days before soaking them off in the bath. When they came off, healing was already starting to take place, although they both had slightly bruised shafts. After about two weeks the final scabs fell away leaving a clean smooth result. Both boys had an identical result with no loose skin remaining. The red coloured scar which lay almost exactly halfway down the shaft of their penises rapidly turned into a thin white line, separating the slightly darker skin of the shaft from the paler remains of the inner foreskin.

They are now six years of age and we have had discussions with them about circumcision. They are both happy that they have been done as most (about 75% by their account) of their friends at school are circumcised too.

Since our experience we have referred several other parents to Ekrem, all of whom have been equally happy with his handiwork. I am firmly convinced that the Arab circumcision is by far the neatest. Done expertly in childhood, it leaves a smooth scar with no loose skin, even when flaccid. The glans is permanently bare and is clean and dry. On erection the glans becomes well defined, with its rim standing proud from the tight skin of the shaft, a situation which leads to delightful sensations on intercourse. The only disadvantage of the tight Muslim circumcision is that there is no loose skin on the shaft for masturbation. However, I get around this by stimulating my glans rim with my index finger and thumb in a ring. Ideally I think that the operation should be done in the first year of life, although if delayed until later in childhood it is quite tolerable even without an anaesthetic.

Have any of your readers had experience of traditional Muslim style circumcisions in Britain?

I.J. – Dubai

[Thanks, Ian, for a very educational lucid account. It's nice to know that we are read around the world. — D.A.]

Pornographic!!

I was quite interested to read in Acorn 6/91 the small article entitled 'An Exposed Glans is Pornographic'.

I must say that the writer obviously doesn't know the true definition of the word 'pornographic', which is, 'Explicit presentation of sexual activity in literature and films'. I can only assume that she must have been watching a circumcised penis being waved around in a provocative manner for someone to film.

Well, whatever turns you on, so be it. I'm sure that most of us who are circumcised do not find that looking at our glans is in any way sexually stimulating. Also an erection is surely a healthy normal occurrence.

I have been a naturist now for many years and have never yet seen any male in public with an erection. At the various clubs there are many circumcised men and boys around with many naked women, and the effect is quite normal.

I personally am very proud of the fact that I am circumcised, and it has improved my penis to quite an extent. In my case circumcision was necessary and to know that my ladyfriend is not so likely to get cervical cancer is quite satisfying. I had trouble for many years with my foreskin and therefore had to have it removed, exactly the same as an appendix or any other part of the body if it is causing discomfort. Keeping the body natural doesn't mean letting it run wild, but keeping it in trim; clean and tidy. If this means circumcision in some cases, then I can hardly see that this can be called pornography. In my book it is just healthy good sense.

C.P. – Wiltshire

[Well, I did say at the time that there were some very odd views in those letters. — D.A.]

Bath Times

I was brought up in the historical city of Bath, and in the fifties, at the age of 15, I and my school chum Terry joined an archaeological working party to sort out the famous hot Roman Baths which had been neglected since before the war. One glorious summer's afternoon, Terry and I were working clearing rubble under the supervision of a lady archaeologist, a thinnish scholarly lady in her thirties, called Rosemary. We continued working at our task until long after everyone else had gone, until eventually Rosemary called a halt. We were all hot, sweaty and dusty, and Rosemary suggested we all take a dip in the warm bath to clean up. It seemed a fabulous idea, but as I pointed out, neither of us had a swimsuit. "So what?" said Rosemary, and told us that lots of them had previously gone skinny-dipping. "Anyway," she said, "I'm going in even if you're not", and before our delighted gaze she stripped off and jumped straight in the pool whilst Terry and I sat there aghast. "For heaven's sake," she said, "what are you afraid of? Come on in and stop being silly." Terry and I looked at each other, quickly undressed, and sheepishly dived in, modestly covering our genitals with our hands.

The sensation of the hot water was so delightful that we instantly forgot our embarrassment and revelled in this new experience. After twenty minutes or so of hilarity, Rosemary got out of the pool and stood at the edge watching us, nonchalantly combing her hair, and incidentally giving us our first clear view of her wiry but shapely body. I had never before seen an adult woman naked, and was excited beyond description to see in the clear light her prominent mons with a sort of pubic crewcut, so that the deep incision of her sexual slot was clearly visible. She laughed. "Come on," she said, "you've had your treat. Now let's see what you've got to offer." By this time I had jacked up a fabulous hard-on, but, realising there was no escape, brazened it out, and, emerging, stood there in front of her drying myself furiously with my erection wobbling about, to Rosemary's enormous amusement. Terry in the meantime also got out, quickly dried himself, and we all got dressed and went.

Next weekend we went to continue our rubble clearing, once again staying late, but this time Terry had to go early, which left only Rosemary and I. This time when Rosemary suggested a swim I didn't hesitate, and once more we enjoyed a romp in the hot steaming water, before emerging to stand on the smooth stones at the pool's edge. Once again I got a hard-on I could have cracked a safe with, at the unrestricted view of Rosemary's fleshy, tightly compressed vulva. She looked at my prong curiously and then, to my embarrassment, asked me how I'd managed to avoid the rite of circumcision. A majority of the males of our peer group were circumcised in those days, including Terry, and she had noticed the difference immediately. There then occurred an event which was the most exciting I had till then experienced; or for that matter, till now if I'm honest. She reached out and grabbing the sprig of excess foreskin quivering about on the end of my erection, started rolling it between her thumb and forefinger. "As a classicist I approve," she said, "you would have gone down well with the Romans. They admired a good long foreskin, and the Roman matrons used to have their slaves' foreskins stretched to a considerable length. Look at this." She then produced from her bag a small statuette of a placentarius or tray-bearing slave she had unearthed. It was a beautifully sculpted naked man with a beard and a large phallus which terminated in a narrow foreskin extending nearly a third of its total length, and belling out to a blunderbuss-like opening at the end. Then, continuing her fondling of the loose tip of my skin, she told me how the Greeks and Romans, besides venerating a long foreskin, had no time for circumcision, which they associated with the Jews, who were a despised nation even in those days. "Your friend Terry would not have been well received", she said, and told me about the rude epigram written by a Roman poet, in which a lady was pilloried when her slave, who was attending her in a bath, probably very similar to the one we were beside, lost his penile sheath and was seen by all her friends to be circumcised.

It was considered a terrible disgrace for a Roman woman of breeding to consort with a circumcised man, and the unfortunate woman could look forward to universal condemnation.

Rosemary continued, "The boot's on the other foot these days. Most educated men are circumcised, and a lot of girls are worried about hygiene and therefore prefer the men that way." This was not good news as far as I was concerned, and Rosemary must have noticed it in my face. She laughed. "Don't worry," she said, "as long as you keep this clean the girls will find you irresistible. Let's check." With that she stretched my foreskin back over my shaft so as to expose the dark shiny plum. She examined it closely, expressed herself satisfied, and rehooded my willy. She giggled. "Have you started wanking yet?" she asked. "No", I lied. Whereupon she told me I could console myself with the knowledge that a willy with a foreskin was much nicer to wank than one without, and, swearing me to secrecy, proceeded to rub my skin to and fro fast over the underlying knob until, with a moan, my knees sagged, and a stream of sperm shot into the steaming bath.

There were many future occasions when Rosemary, Terry and I went skinny-dipping in the baths thereafter, but unfortunately there was no repetition of Rosemary's handling of my prick, since she refused to do any such thing whilst Terry was there.

I didn't forget Rosemary's little lecture, and for a time was a bit concerned about my uncircumcised state. But as she predicted, I had no trouble at all. I'm curious to know if I have missed anything by not being circumcised, but on balance I think I am better off as I am. I've nothing against circumcision though, but I reckon it's best to let people make their own decision on such a personal matter.

R.L. – Barnett

The Carracula Therme At Baden Baden

Baden Baden at the northern end of the Black Forest in West Germany has been a spa town since Roman times, and a highly fashionable resort for a century or more. The Carracula baths are a modern construction which provides for people to 'take the waters' in luxurious surroundings. The feature of these waters is their temperature, a naturally occurring 28 degrees C. There are some children among the clientele, but, because of their therapeutic emphasis, the baths mainly attract older bathers.

Changing arrangements are in beautifully clean individual cubicles, so the main opportunities for cock-spotting are in the showers and, best of all, the sauna; in both, a nudity rule applies. Visiting there in August 1991, the most interesting observation was that, instead of the expectation that almost all users would be cavaliers, the contrary was the case; most of the men seen were bare-glansed. Indeed, of about twenty, only two had foreskins in evidence, and both these were loose ones reaching just as far as the glans tip.

Most of the men seen were aged 40-60, and most of their cocks were shortish and flaccid. One micro-short cock raised some smiles behind the owner's back. It was impossible, in the circumstances, to tell whether the men with bare glans were circumcised, or simply kept their foreskins retracted: the latter presumably.

There were two men there with their sons aged 10 or 11. A bearded Frenchman in his 40's was well-hung and well-circumcised. His son's cock was short and circumcised, with the small glans nestling in a thick collar of shaft skin which still left most of the glans exposed. The other pair were German-speaking. The father's average endowment showed little hint of foreskin. The son's cock was above average for a pre-pubertal lad, and had been clearly and neatly circumcised in Islamic style, with a clear band of old inner foreskin covering about one-third the length of the shaft.

Tony Acorn

Ecstasy

I would like to congratulate you as you come up to your first year as editor. You have given us a fair and balanced view of the letters you get. I enjoyed the letter from C.D. – Wales on the 'Amah'. The many advantages of having a foreskin are too numerous to mention in this letter, but one of importance I find are the nerve endings in the lips. When these are mashed together over the tip, they give the owner complete ecstasy. Foreskins are fun.

H.J.M. – Glamorgan

[Thank you for your kind words. — D.A.]

Hang-Ups

As a working class girl brought up in South London, the word circumcision meant nothing to me. My brothers and father were uncircumcised and so were all my male schoolfriends. To me a foreskin was a favourite plaything for little boys and big girls, but otherwise had no significance.

How wrong I was! In later life I was to discover that the foreskin is the seat for untold fears for so many men, and the source of much superstition concerning class and religion.

After training as a nurse and learning that circumcision was a rare treatment for penile malfunctions, but once had been quite widely practised in this country, I then joined the medical staff of an oil company, and during my many postings, mostly overseas, I was in heavy demand socially as one of the few presentable girls around. As a result I had the pick of all the handsomest men, and discovered in myself a talent for the enjoyment of sex which was much greater than was perhaps good for me. I must have had well over 20 sexual partners during my fabulous 10 years with the oil company. The trouble is, the handsomest are not often the best, and I found myself knocking on thirty without having met anyone I'd want to marry.

I then met Mike, an engineer with a large neighbouring company, who was different from my normal run of boyfriends, being only average in height, appearance and conversation. But I soon found out that I'd far more in common with him on a deeper plane, and I fell in love – this guy was definitely wedding fodder. He was also different in another way from my previous boyfriends inasmuch as he was circumcised. I'd only had one previous circumcised boyfriend, who was Jewish, and totally unselfconscious about the odd (to me) appearance of his cock. Poor Mike on the other hand had the most ferocious hang-up about it, and used to really curse his father for having him 'done' against his mother's wishes. I did my best to tell him not to worry, since I was more than happy with him as he was, but this only made it worse. Sexually he was a considerate and highly competent lover: he would bring me slowly to a peak of excitement with his fingers and penis, and when I was absolutely frantic he would take me over the top, usually with his tongue, and used to marvel at the power of my response. But I usually had to finish him off manually since he could not, or would not, come inside me. Then, when the contentment had worn off, he would start. He'd insist on quizzing me about my attitude to his 'mutilated cock', not believing me when I assured him that it meant nothing to me at all. He hit rock bottom in despair and depression when, in questioning me about my sex life, I revealed that all my previous boyfriends except one had been intact, being certain that I'd make detrimental comparisons, and not being mollified in the least when I reassured him that he more than made up for his altered penis with his imaginative and inspired lovemaking.

Occasionally we would have a chap in for relief of phimosis or balanitis, and Mike would want to know all about the treatment, including all the gory detail of circumcision when it was necessary, since I would have to nurse the guy afterwards. Trying to make a joke of it, I told him about the time I'd once asked the doctor if a fellow with a long foreskin needed circumcising. The doctor had replied that there was no such thing as a too long foreskin; the longer it was the better. I suppose it was a bit tactless but it really put him down. He wanted to know if any of my previous boyfriends had had tight foreskins (they hadn't), and wasn't I put off by lack of personal hygiene (never encountered any).

I got so concerned about Mike's hang-up that I asked my boss, the camp M.O. about circumcision and its effects. He said that Mike was suffering from a neurosis which was fairly common among men who were circumcised in infancy, although usually less severe. It was one reason why the op was ceased in this country. He suggested that Mike needed psychiatric help, but doubted whether he would ever be completely free of his neurosis.

So with deepest regrets on both sides I gave him up, kissed him farewell, and returned to U.K. to start a new life. The last thing that he said to me through his tears was, "When you have kids, Pat, don't even think about having them circumcised, will you." He was preaching to the converted.

However, that is not all of the story. Firstly, I don't think that all circumcised men feel as bad about it as Mike did – my Jewish friend for example couldn't have cared less and was quite proud of his circumcised cock. Likewise I've since met men who had had it done as adults and most claimed that their love life had gained as a result. But this is to be expected if the foreskin was removed to relieve a malfunction.

As far as appearance is concerned, I marginally prefer the more familiar smooth look of a longish foreskin, but it would be entirely wrong to give this slight preference too much significance: a man's character and general looks are far more important than the shape of his cock.

Ms. P.H. – Herts

Young Naturists

Any of your readers who reads Health and Efficiency will know that circumcision is a subject of abiding interest for those who go in for communal nudity; in nearly every edition there is an article or a letter on the subject.

The thing about nudists is that, amongst the older generation, there is a defensive attitude which gives rise to a lot of hypocrisy. Because of previous condemnation and derision, they find it necessary to link nudism with puritanical concepts such as no smoking, vegetarianism, compulsory 'miniten' and laughably, a denial that there is any correlation between nudism and sex. The truth of the matter is that most nudists are driven by voyeurism and exhibitionism in equal measure, both of which are sexual in origin.

This puritanism and self-denial amongst the older generation also manifests itself in their attitude to circumcision; most of those who espouse the roundhead cause are now senior citizens, whilst younger nudists who nowadays have virtually no experience of the operation look upon it merely as an interesting oddity.

My parents were self-described 'bohemians', and were keen naturists, so I was brought up in the tradition. They too subscribed to the fads of vegetarianism etc., but when it came to circumcision they differed sharply. My father was circumcised and a keen supporter whilst my mother was fanatically pro-foreskin. Why, I can only guess. But she used to pull his leg unmercifully about his 'sawn-off cock', and I know they had an unhappy sexual relationship. Their views were purely hypothetical as far as I was concerned since I and most of my companions were not eligible for the operation unless there was a medical need. Anyway, my mother viewed my foreskin with satisfaction, whereas my father was disappointed in his wish to have me circumcised.

Although my parents subscribed to the denial of sexuality in nudism, I and all my young friends found that whenever holiday time came around, and we changed from a clothed environment to a nude one, the initial impact was one of extreme sexual excitement. It still is. I certainly don't take the puritanical view, and readily admit that I get a terrific buzz to go on holiday, and to see attractive females with their tits and fannies on show. As a kid, I and my friends of both sexes found ourselves in a sexually charged atmosphere and took full advantage of it. The opportunities for kids to indulge in sexual games in a nudist environment are boundless, and all inhibitions disappear when you have no clothes on. The girls, if anything, were worse than the boys in taking sexual initiatives. Demure young ladies would try to get you sexually aroused by sitting in front of you with their legs splayed to display their crack, or by surreptitiously handling someone's penis. One girl used to stir us up by challenging us to a pissing contest which she always won. I and my friends were taught the noble art of wanking by an older girl who had an obsession for the male genital, and organised half a dozen of us into a wanking circle.

As far as circumcision was concerned, our interest was initially restricted to 'knob-spotting'. We would set off down the beach in different directions, making a note each time we spotted a roundhead. One of the funniest sights I remember seeing was a group of Americans on holiday in Yugoslavia. The three men were grotesquely obese and, of course, circumcised. But what caused the hilarity was the fact that they avoided sunburn by liberally daubing, not only their noses and lips with white zinc ointment, but also their bare knobs. For this reason if for no other, circumcision is not a good idea for naturists. My dad used to get very painful sunburn on his denuded glans, and precious little sympathy from my mother.

Once a circumcised boy was invited into our wanking circle and was temporarily the centre of attention. But it soon became clear that the young lady who did the honours preferred the more varied repertoire in handling uncircumcised cocks.

I've never had any urge to dispose of my foreskin, but I think I can understand the feelings of those who do. As far as I am concerned my foreskin has given me nothing but pleasure, and I thank my lucky stars that I wasn't born into the previous generation.

H.J. – London

Excerpts From Books

The following excerpts are taken from Allen Edwardes: The Cradle of Erotica and The Jewel in the Lotus – and Bruno Bettelheim: Symbolic Wounds. I hope they are of interest.

J.H. – Helsinki

In Arabia, masturbation 'has been almost the custom of the land'. Indeed, the first sexual trauma of the male infant, or small boy, occurs when his little penis is rubbed to erection, his foreskin forcibly retracted, drawn tightly forwards again, clamped and cut off. Parents who do not have their sons circumcised soon after birth, but who wait to possibly three to six years, make a custom of repeatedly pulling down the long prepuce, thereby denuding the glans, which the boys then do when they are old enough. Both the act of circumcision and that of preputial retraction seem to cause an intense concentration of erotic sensitivity in the penis, resulting in repeated erections and arousing the child to genital handling. Almost without exception, all Muslim and Jewish boys masturbate in one form or another from earliest infancy. During erections occurring spontaneously (without external or imagistic erotic stimulus), or due to chance of rubbing, the delicate and sensitive glans of the circumcised infant or boy is wholly denuded, and fondling produces such sensations of titillation that frequent masturbatory activity is almost inevitable.

During the circumcision ceremonies, little Arab boys awaiting their turn will allay their fear of the operation by pulling down their pants and each playing with the other's penis. Before circumcising a boy, the surgeon systematically examines his penis by retracting, manipulating or stretching the prepuce, looking for adhesions and cleaning away any smegma. To facilitate this procedure an erection is induced. Thus, since tumescence is necessary for pre-circumcisional examination, striplings do not hesitate to stimulate themselves, and one another, just before the operation.

The Muslim and Jewish methods of circumcision are essentially the same throughout North Africa and the Middle East; age is the only difference worthy of note. All Jewish males are circumcised in early infancy, within a week after birth. Many Muslim males are, also, especially if they are born in hospitals and their parents are westernized.

Among the Jews, the Mohel, or circumciser, takes the infant's penis by his thumb and forefinger, and gently rubs it several times to produce an erection; then he proceeds with the examination and operation. The Muslim Khettan, or circumciser, fingers the little child's penis until it is erect. Then he pulls the prepuce all the way down, completely exposing the glans, which he examines, and removes any sebaceous matter. There are several ways of clamping, tying or compressing the foreskin, after it is drawn tightly forward; then it is removed with an expert flick of the blade. Now comes the delicate procedure. When the clamp is removed, the integumental skin, or outer layer of the prepuce, retracts often well far beyond the rim of the glans. The sheath of the penis is thus shortened by the removal of its forward fold, which is now a mere remnant, the so-called preputial root. The thin inner layer of foreskin, which still is partly covering the glans, is then lacerated and split on the upper side and turned back over the corona to join the thick outer skin, and form a kind of cicatricial ring, or narrow band of scar tissue, around the glans. The wound is now anointed and bandaged, healing in a week's time.

The little Muslim boy looks forward to circumcision with great anticipation, because it means that masturbation will then be more pleasurable to him. The foreskin is an interference, frequently too long and too tight, and the orgasm is hastened by its friction against the glans. This rubbing irritates, and often inflames, the delicate and sensitive corona, especially if the opening of the prepuce is very narrow, or if there are adhesions. Within two or three weeks after the operation the little fellow is masturbating regularly again, this time with his 'new' penis. The skin is now tense during erection, resisting friction of the glans, and making the manipulation more pleasantly vigorous and prolonged. All previous discomfort is replaced by continuous titillation.

Jacobus observed that in Arab circumcision 'the skin of the sheath of the penis and the mucous membrane are cut at the same level, and after the operation is completed there is absolutely no prepuce'. This is the desired result. The penis is literally strained to stiffness when erect, for the skin is stretched tight; and the entire glans, including the corona and the 'neck' of the corona, are fully exposed by the retraction. The ring of cicatrice, which is formed at the junction of the inner and outer flesh, now forming the preputial root, is the principal target of stimulation in the circumcised, necessarily taking place of the glans in the uncircumcised.

El-hhemameh (the dove) is the nickname bestowed on the penis of the Semitic Arab or Jew, which measures from three to four inches in quiescence, and from five to six inches in erection. This clever comparison becomes apparent when we note that in the circumcised penis the root of the prepuce encircles the neck of the glans like a fleshy collar, thus giving the male organ, when it retracts to the level of the scrotum, the appearance of a ring-necked dove resting upon two eggs. Baydz (eggs) or baydzetan (two eggs) are colloquial for testicles.

* * * *

Not as essential nor practical in northern climates, and amongst civilized people, the virtues of prepubescent circumcision were many in the squalid East. Accurate circumcision facilitated cleanliness, the supreme prophylactic, and in many cases stayed the individual from intemperate excesses.

But the original design of circumcision, that of blood covenant, was soon forgotten, and the motive of cleanliness was replaced by apathy or sensual gratification. "Inshallah-Te'auleh, yah Khwaudjeh," exclaimed an 18th. century Egyptian to a young French convert in Napoleon's army, "how does it feel to have the precious hood removed? Wehhyah-en-Nebee! One cannot fully appreciate The Cut, adore the glories of El-Islam, unless he has been initiated at a later moment in life. How can an innocent boy, circumcised ere pubescence, know the full value of natural prolongation of pleasure if he has not at first endured the frustrating hypersensitivity that plagues the uncircumcised?"

Prior to circumcision, the young motahir (one who is without stain) was dressed as a girl and, in great honour, mounted upon a richly trapped donkey. Were he to be circumcised on the same day as a prince or the son of an official, his esteem would be even greater and his gifts more lavish. So disposed, he was paraded through the narrow streets, accompanied by a raucous procession of family, friends, and musicians. All the while, for protection against the evil eye, and so that harmful jinn might not enter his body and defile the consecrated ritual, he scrupulously covered his mouth, nose, ears, and all other bodily orifices with heavy shawls. The omnipresent Eye also accounted for his feminine attire.

Arriving at the establishment of the barber (mezeyyin) or physician (hhekeem), he was taken down from the donkey and borne upstairs by his male relatives. All females were barred from the hallowed ceremony. Stripped naked, he – sweating profusely – was laid upon a divan spread with white sheets; and, when ready, the surgeon came forward to amputate.

A bit of stick is used as a probe, and carried round and round between the glans and prepuce to ascertain the exact extent of the frenulum, and that no unnatural adhesions exist. The foreskin is then drawn forwards, and a pair of forceps – consisting of a couple of pieces of split bamboo, five or six inches long and a quarter of an inch thick, tied firmly at one end with string – applied from above in an oblique direction, so as to exclude about an inch and a half of the prepuce above, and three-quarters of an inch below. The forceps severely grasping it causes a good deal of pain; but this state of suffering does not continue long, since the next thing to be done is the removal, which is done by one stroke of the razor drawn directly forwards. The haemorrhage which follows is inconsiderable, and easily stopped by the application of burnt rags and ashes.

* * * *

Male reactions to circumcision

The wish to possess a circumcised penis is very different from these boys' obsessive interest in female sex characteristics and functions.

At the Orthogenic school, a ten-year-old uncircumcised boy, living with a group of boys who had been circumcised in infancy, wanted the operation very badly.

Eventually we had to arrange for circumcision due to adhesions. When told about it he was happy but anxious, as was to be expected. He spoke at great length about his fear of the pain of the operation.

But powerful as were his fears, still more impressive were, his wish for, and, after the operation, his pride in what he called his 'new penis'. As soon as the wound was healed he proudly displayed his penis to everybody, whereas before he had always tried to hide it. As soon as the bandage was taken off he declared, "I think my penis is now very handsome and elegant." With great pride he told how much better his penis functioned. Now he could fully enjoy masturbation, which previously, because of adhesions, had been partly painful. He summed up his feeling by saying, "Boy, I can do anything now." Circumcision demonstrated to him the organ's importance. The freed glans represented a newly won masculinity. Circumcision had indeed provided him with a better penis, and with sexual pleasure previously not available.

Similar observations were made by Nunberg during the analysis of an adult. The patient had experienced circumcision as a reassertion in general, and of the importance of the penis in particular. "The painful sensation around the glans after the operation drew narcissistic libido to the penis. As a consequence, the patient became more aware of his genital than before. The experience of circumcision increased penis consciousness as if it were a demonstration of the organ's importance."

If not inhibited, boys liked to show off their penises with what might be called 'phallic pride'. Competition to determine who has the biggest or best penis becomes a matter of great importance. They demonstrate a desire to know who is further ahead in development; who is more manly and less childish. Exhibiting the glans freed of the foreskin is part of such efforts to assert manliness, and in this the circumcised boy is at a definite advantage; his glans always shows, and this is often taken as a sign of greater masculinity. In this respect, too, Nunberg's observations corroborate those made on our children. He says, "By the circumcision the glans penis is freed... a new penis is born which looks like a phallus in erection with retracted foreskin."

Christmas Greetings

Finally, we, Tony Acorn and David Acorn, wish all our members a Merry Christmas and a Prosperous New Year, with all your penises feeling just as you like them.

ACORN

1992 Issue No 1

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Circumcision in Islamic Society	Tony	Page 3
Docking	H.J.M.	Page 4
Argentine Treatment of Phimosis	B.H.	Page 5
Mary	J.S.	Page 7
German Excerpt	J.H.	Page 9
Another Woman's View	Ms. A.C.	Page 10
Saga		Page 11
Advertisement		Page 15
Contact Corner	Ryan	Page 15

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

First of all, I feel that I must apologise for the quality of the last issue, several members having sent their copy back. I obtained a new ribbon for the master, but it had gaps of no ink on it. I obtained another one which was O.K. Unfortunately, the master I sent to Tony, who does the copying and distributing, was the bad copy. Hence, that is what you received. A good copy has been sent to Tony and I am sure he will try to make amends for me. I will make sure that it never happens again.

Also, due to his rushing around, Tony omitted the statistical form in the last issue. It will be with this one, and I hope everyone will fill it in. Many thanks in advance.

If any member is contemplating being circumcised in the future by the Surgical Advisory Service, or by anyone else for that matter, and would give, and get from the circumciser, permission to have the operation made into a video, I would be much obliged. The camera is a semi-professional one and would be edited into a proper film for the edification of members.

Not so much of a mixed bag this time. I try not to include more than one contribution on the actual circumcision operation, but with a lack of general contributions I have had to succumb this issue. I know that most people feel that what they have to say, or have experienced, would be of no interest to others, but as you know from what you read, this isn't really true. Everyone must have something to say about the following mostly negative statements:-

1. Masturbation can only be achieved with a fantasy.
2. Masturbation fantasies lose their potency after a time.
3. How can one keep erection retention as one ages.
4. It is common during penetration for the penis to go flaccid. Removing it and masturbating for a short time restores the erection. Masturbation is therefore more sexually potent than intercourse.
5. There is a fine line between using a cockring tight enough to sustain an erection and doing yourself damage.
6. Rings through foreskins and frenulums are not erotic.
7. Everyone should shave their genitals.
8. Prostatitis finishes your sex life.
9. It is always the right testicle which hangs lowest.
10. Women always prefer the very well endowed.
11. It is impossible to have an orgasm in sex with a foreskin that cannot be retracted.
12. It is impossible to masturbate properly when circumcised.

I have heard nearly all these statements in my time. How about some replies to them?

I have a copy of the film Dick, which is obtainable by order from any video retailer (Smith's, etc) for, I believe, about £6. It is only about a quarter of an hour long and shows nothing except fast, still shots of penises (about a thousand in all). The soundtrack is of a lot of women making comments and answering questions about their opinions on penises. I think all of the penises are American, only a minority having foreskins, although there looks to be quite a few more with foreskins pulled back. What is amazing are the number of different types of circumcisions, some of which appear to have mutilated the poor owners. There are also, of course, a huge variety of different natural shapes and sizes.

David Acorn

Circumcision In Islamic Society

The edition of Schofield's Europe on November 14th 1991 took this travelogue programme to Turkey. Its disc-jockey presenter visited a 'hamam' or Turkish bath-house, and we saw him (decently wrapped in a bath-cloth) having an extensive and vigorous massage. He also took viewers to the 'Sunnet Serai', the circumcision palace in Istanbul. Boys were brought along by their families, dressed in their best: suit, white shirt, and many of them with paper hats or other decorations symbolic of the future career which their parents hoped they would follow. The Sunnetci (circumciser) had taken great trouble to create a party atmosphere. A very well-known and revered individual, he has a large statue erected to him at the entrance. Inside, tables were laden with food and drink for the accompanying families. There was a specially designed circular revolving settee with places for about eight boys. The operator had his own chair, and turned the settee until the next boy was in front of him. The boy's trousers were pulled down to his knees, he pulled up his shirt, and watched while he was circumcised. There were clowns to chant songs and blessing, and to distract the boys' attention. In the old days their job was to make sure that the volume was loud enough to cover any cry that a boy might make. A local anaesthetic was used, and the operation was done by laser. Mostly it was the mothers who showed the greatest anxiety. The first boy shown was quite looking forward to it, and only grimaced slightly as the cut was made. The second was quite tearful, and an assistant held his arms to stop him wriggling – he looked only about four. A third, awaiting his turn, was about seven or eight, looking apprehensive. As each boy was done he stood up and put his arms around the circumciser's neck and received a great big cuddle. The Sunnetci was a burly man, probably in his fifties, and had performed some 68,000 circumcisions – obviously an expert and a serious rival to hospital circumcisers. Young though the boys were, they could consider themselves men after their circumcision.

The previous week the late night film was Halfaouine, a Tunisian classic banned in its country of origin because of its relatively liberal attitude to relationships between the sexes. In Arabic, with subtitles in English, it centred on the life of a lad of about eleven – young enough to still spend much of his time in the women's quarters and to go with them to the hamam, but old enough to run messages between his aunt and the men trying to catch her attention. His younger brother of about five was to be circumcised, and a long passage in the film centred on the preparations, the family party of the male relations in the courtyard, while the women met inside, the parade through the streets with the band, and the young candidate carried at the front of the procession. He was carried inside, and we saw him lying at the end of the bed, while the circumciser held up and then used a large pair of scissors. His older brother, meanwhile, lay curled up on his bed wincing at the memory of his own circumcision. Then the newly circumcised boy, calm and quiet, was laid on the bed beside his mother, while relatives filed past with congratulations and gifts of money. The whole passage was impressive for the inevitability and centrality of circumcision to the family and social structure, and for the way it marked out the difference between the men and the women.

Tony Acorn

[This is the first ever mention in our group of a circumcision being carried out with a laser. If anyone has any further information on this method we will be only too pleased to hear about it. — D. A.]

Docking

I wonder if any members have any experience of 'Docking'. If they have, would they tell us? I have only read about this subject twice and would like to hear more.

The first article was about two men talking in a pub, and one said that he lamented the fact that he was circumcised as an infant and often wondered what it would be like to masturbate with a foreskin. His friend said that he had enough foreskin for two. The outcome was that the man with the long foreskin covered the glans of the other quite easily, and he was able to wank with a foreskin to fulfil a dream.

The second article was about the Ancient Egyptians, who admired long foreskins. They would stretch, powder, and oil each other's foreskins and then perform 'Docking Exercises' which meant two foreskins covering each other's glans (their own and their partner's). Perhaps you, David, could find more data or articles on this very interesting subject.

H.J.M. – Glamorgan

[I have never heard of the expression before or read about the subject, but I have seen it in an American film. — D.A.]

Argentine Treatment Of Phimosis

Central Military Hospital Dept. Of Surgery, Argentina.

'At the Children's Surgical Unit of this hospital, a surgical technique has been developed to improve circumcision in children who suffer from phimosis.

Operation Technique

The genitals should be washed with soap and water prior to the operation. With the child lying on the operating table, asepsis of the area is carried out with methylated iodine. The area is then prepared with compresses. Anaesthesia may be general or local with Novocaine or Xylocaine at 0.5% without epinephrine. The procedure is continued as follows:-

With a piece of cotton around the penis, mark the position of the corona of the glans by making the cotton taut. If the glans is not visible locate it by touch. Mark the glans crown with bright green visible ink. With a set of Koch clamps, pinch the mid-point of the dorsal semicircle of the prepuce. With another pair of Koch clamps, hold the prepuce near the frenulum and pull the two forceps apart to show the small orifice amongst the foreskin folds. Put a pair of closed forceps through this opening with care as far as they will go, then open them to stretch and release the constriction. This achieved, retract the foreskin down the shaft, remove the balanopreputial adhesions, and clean up the wound. The foreskin must retract completely to show a complete glans. Return the foreskin over the glans, and using forceps, draw the prepuce forward over the glans until the line of excision is past the tip of the glans. This must be confirmed by touch. Put a pair of Koch forceps across this line to act as a haemostat. With a scalpel, cut off the foreskin, following the line of the forceps. Retract the foreskin down the shaft, leaving the mucous membrane covering part of the glans. This should be removed, the frenulum being excised at the same time, having previously used 00 catgut to put a stitch in the base of the frenulum nearest the meatus and at the opposite end nearest the shaft. This will ensure that there is no bleeding from the small artery. You are now left with the bloody triangle, as it has been named, underneath the glans, where the frenulum has been removed, and the whole area is not stitched. If any continuous bleeding does occur from the foreskin or remnant mucosa, electro-coagulation can be carried out, but this is best left for about ten minutes before being used, as natural coagulation will occur in the majority of cases. The healing process will occur, and a soft epidermal tissue will grow over the bloody triangle, and all tissues will join up to leave a smooth cosmetically good circumcision.

Post-operative care is straightforward and simple, no bandage or dressing being applied to the wound. If some protection is needed for the wound, to prevent the patient touching his penis, then you can use vaseline gauze. A small strip put on the dorsal side of the penis is covered by a larger strip held in place with surgical tape. However, in most cases, we leave the wound completely uncovered and allow it to breathe, which occasions rapid healing. To prevent the bedding touching or disturbing the wound a cage is used to keep the area clear. It is necessary to prevent or tell the child not to scratch the wound. Urinating can continue with no trouble. The patient can leave the hospital after 24 hours. The parents must be told not to attempt to bandage the wound, wash it, or use disinfectant on it. It must be allowed to heal in the air with no interference.

The end result. No part of the frenulum, prepuce, or folds of skin in the ventral area are left. The glans remains totally free. It is a complete circumcision. The results of 250 children circumcised between 1963 and 1965 were successful without exception. This method is continued to be used in this hospital.'

I enclose this translation of the method of circumcision in the Argentina Central Military Hospital. It was translated and sent to me by a pen-friend who lives in the U.S.A. It certainly is a different style, and is very closely aligned to that method used by the Mohel in the Jewish Rite of Brit Milah, except that it encourages the excising of the frenulum which doesn't occur in the Jewish Circumcision. Having had my frenulum excised because of excessive tightness, I can recommend anyone having a circumcision to have their frenulum removed at the same time.

I know that a number of people have written in to Acorn and mentioned that they know of doctors who will do circumcisions, but we don't get the details published. How are we to encourage those who wish to be circumcised, or wish to have a revision to correct a bad circumcision, if we hide the lights under a bushel. [Sorry, we do publish all knowledge. See Issue No 4 1991, page 7. – Ed.] Let all readers of Acorn keep the information coming in, especially with various surgeries now opting out, and plugging their wares.

I have an addition to the addresses where a circumciser may be found. However, anyone contacting the address, be advised that not all are doctors, and will only do babies, and also the fee varies.

The Reform and Liberal Association Mohalim,
Sternberg Centre for Judaism,
The Manor House,
80, East End Road,
London, N3.

I hope that this is of some use to someone.

B.H. – Leeds

Mary

As a nation I do sometimes question our values compared to mainland Europe, being quite prepared to put up with drunken, loutish behaviour, but any hint of sexuality is swiftly suppressed. Perhaps it's this that causes us alone in Europe to hanker after circumcision: a way of atoning for sin by mortification of the flesh, or a way of preventing (or punishing) the old bogey of masturbation, perhaps. But let me tell you about Mary.

Mary was an old friend of my Mum from repertory days, exuberant in mind and body, always ready with a salty ribald wit, and prepared to shock others than suppress her personality. When I was sent to stay with her for a couple of months I had a feeling that it would be a memorable event; and so it turned out. In retrospect I'm sure that Mum realised it too, and sent me to stay with Mary to remedy my painful shyness and lack of self-confidence. I was small for my age, delicate looking with a pale complexion. At the age of 16 I was worried that my girlish appearance might make me unattractive to women, despite possessing a rampant sexuality backed up by a large and unruly member, which was only kept in check by assiduous wanking.

The first thing you noticed about Mary was her lack of concern for convention. Although she'd dress up to the nines to go out, she usually flopped around the house in a shorty nighty with a housecoat thrown loosely over it. She was totally unselfconscious, and my sensibilities were constantly shocked by momentary glimpses of her large rose-tipped breasts swinging into view through a carelessly buttoned nighty; or a large expanse of creamy white thigh, with the occasional tantalising flash of her red-gold pubic hair when she hoisted herself onto a high stool. This resulted in a rising tide of lust which manifested itself in a continuous and monstrous erection which I desperately tried to hide, and a severe attack of balls-ache which only a rapid and violent wank would relieve. I wasn't the only one. Mary had a huge floppy alsatian barely out of puppyhood, which would frequently thrust its snout under her clothes and into her crotch, whilst a huge length of glistening red cock would pop out. The dog was so strong and so persistent, and she was so convulsed with laughter, that she had a terrible job to shift its nose from her genitals. She'd shout and swear at it, "Get off you bugger. Get away from my fanny and put that rude thing away! That dog, I'm going to have to have his balls cut off before he rapes me." My sympathies were all with the dog.

She used to get a visit from time to time from another lady friend with whom she'd chat for hours about the stage, men, and sex, completely ignoring my presence. I found this boring or enthralling, depending on the subject, and often embarrassing, since both ladies were totally uninhibited in what they said. I remember my interest when they started talking about circumcision, listing which of their numerous male acquaintances had been done, and relating a hilarious story about a guy who'd had himself circumcised to please his Jewish girlfriend. Mary had thrown a 'coming out' party for him. Then, to my abiding mortification, she turned her attention to me, and, describing me as her newest boyfriend, said she was glad that I hadn't been circumcised. I was both embarrassed and furious, because I couldn't imagine how she could claim to know. She then told her friend that when I was born my Mum had been under heavy pressure from her parents to have me circumcised, but had decided against it after Mary had talked her out of it, citing her strong convictions based on personal experience, and reinforced by the advice of a doctor friend. Consequently, Mum had disregarded her parents and left me intact, although a lot of boys were done in those days. So, Mary said, I'd got her to thank for my foreskin. I wasn't so sure she had done me a favour at that stage, though.

It was inevitable in that uninhibited atmosphere that some sort of sexual behaviour should eventually take place. I was having a lie-in one Sunday morning and listening to the radio, when I heard Mary calling me from the bathroom. I was dumbfounded to find her lying back in a hot bath with her large shapely tits showing above the surface. She watched me with a lewd grin on her face. "Don't look so shocked, Jim, you've seen a pair of tits before, haven't you?" I hadn't. "Come over here and wash my back for me, there's a good lad." My face was burning and I trembled with excitement as I did her bidding. Then she asked me to pass her the towel, and got out of the bath to dry herself. She stood in front of me with a sly smile on her face. 'Flaunted' is the right word to describe it, as she vigorously towelled her back, with her tits bouncing about, and the whole of her lush figure in view. I felt thrill upon thrill race through my loins as my gaze concentrated on the join of her thighs, seeing for the first time in close-up the big meaty cunt of a woman in her prime; marvelling at the simple beauty of the long bulging cleft disappearing between her thighs. She saw where my gaze was directed. "You're looking shocked again, Jim," she said, "surely you've seen a lady's fanny before." I hadn't. My tribute to her essential femininity suddenly thrust its way through the slit in my pyjama trousers in a rigid salute such as would inspire any woman.

Mary stopped drying herself and paid me the compliment of looking impressed. "That's a lovely big willy for a young man – your girlfriend is a lucky thing", she said. She slipped off my pyjamas and, sitting on the stool, put me on her knee, with one arm round my waist, whilst with the other she handled and examined my erect penis. She squeezed it gently before drawing the skin right back to look at my knob. She then rehooded it and, clasping my tool loosely between thumb and forefinger just below the bulge of the knob, commenced a slow sexy wank, working the skin to and fro over my sensitive knob, and occasionally passing the tight ring of my foreskin back over it to make me gasp at the sensation. In no time my crisis arrived, and she found herself milking long thick spurts of sperm into her hand.

Afterwards she taught me how to do a similar service for her, and I learned just how much enjoyment you can give a woman if you caress her with skill. The admiration I experienced at the beauty and symmetry of Mary's big gorgeous twat was transformed into wonder at the breathtaking intensity of the orgasm of a mature, sexually aware woman – a lesson I’ve never forgotten. Sadly, some obscure scruple kept her from completing the lesson: probably the realisation that a fuck can all too easily lead to a hopeless love, especially for an impressionable teenager, and she wanted to avoid that for both our sakes. Instead she earned my gratitude and admiration because, until I met Mary, I too had feelings of inferiority in the presence of my circumcised chums. But she taught me to prize my foreskin as an erotic asset of inestimable value. I owe her a debt I cannot repay.

J.S. – Bucks

German Excerpt

The following excerpt is translated from the German book Die Beschneidung bei Mann und Weib, (Male and Female Circumcision) by Felix Bryk. The original book was printed in 1931, and an English translation was published in the sixties in America. It was then called Sex & Circumcision.

‘After the necessary preparations have been completed, the Mohel (the circumciser, even now not usually a medical practitioner), the godfather, and, whenever possible, altogether 8 males who are at least 13 years old, assemble in the operation room. The godfather receives the child, which the godmother brings as far as the door, and carries him to the Mohel, while the others call out, “Blessed be the newborn.” The firmly held child is so positioned that his penis is easily accessible, and after a little bowl of sand has been placed nearby, the Mohel says a Hebrew prayer, and performs then the incision (Chituch). He grasps the penis with the thumb and forefinger of the left hand and rubs it gently in order to invoke an erection. Then he takes hold of the outer and inner layers of the foreskin at the same time, on both sides, (not from top and below), and pulls them forward pressed flat over the glans while lifting his arm high, and thereby placing the penis in a vertical position. The Mohel then takes a slotted shield with the thumb and forefinger of his right hand, and inserts the foreskin into its slit from top downwards in such a way that the glans will be behind the shield, while the foreskin which is about to be removed will stay in the front of it, firmly clamped by the shield. Now the Mohel takes hold of the knife with the first three fingers of his right hand in such a manner that it is resting on the middle finger, the index finger being behind the blade and the handle held by the thumb. With one vertical stroke downward he excises away close to the shield all of the prepuce that was in the front of the shield and held by the left hand. If this procedure has been carried out properly, then after the incision is completed the outer layer retracts behind the corona of the glans, while the glans itself is still covered by the inner layer that has been cut at its tip producing an opening the size of a pea. Then follows the uncovering of the glans (P’riah). Immediately after completing the incision the Mohel puts the tip of his thumbnail (which is usually long and cut in a form of a lancet), or, as is common now, the blade of a lancet-shaped scissors, into the orifice of the inner layer of the foreskin. He then grasps it with both his forefingers, and splits it on the upper side of the glans, tearing it back to the neck of the glans, and pushes the split foreskin back over the rim of the glans. Finally the Mohel grasps, with the thumbs and forefingers of both hands, the skin flaps formed by the splitting, and tears the entire prepuce away completely immediately behind the corona of the glans. I myself have seen this happen. Now follows the sucking of the wound (M'ziza). The Mohel takes the circumcised penis into his mouth and sucks away the blood from the wound with two or three draughts. After that he takes a mouthful of wine from a cup (called the goblet for M'ziza), and expels it on the wound in two or three spurts. Then the Mohel puts the removed prepuce on the sand that is held ready, pronounces a blessing with another glass of wine, and says a short prayer for the child. Bleeding is usually slight, and is stopped by sprinkling powder of Lycopodium Bovista on it. After this, a simple dressing is applied.'

J.H. – Finland

Another Woman's View

What turned me off the whole circumcision scene was to read a report recently about a bunch of men nursing erections as they watched a shrieking baby have its foreskin cut away. When I contemplate the perfection and symmetry of my little boy's body, including his penis, I feel a sense of pride at having produced such beauty, and I shudder at the thought that there are perverts, like I describe, out there, who would actually take pleasure in marring his perfection.

Having said that, I hasten to add that I've nothing against those who elect to be circumcised, or who have a genuine medical need for it. In fact, one of my favourite menfriends had to have his foreskin circumcised off as a result of it getting caught in his zip. I never thought any the worse of him for it, neither did it affect his performance one way or the other, but, although we all treated it as a joke, he certainly didn't enjoy the trauma, and privately lamented his loss afterwards.

My present partner is blessed with a cock like a policeman's truncheon, with a foreskin like an oiled sock, and there's no way I'd want to see him altered. What I say is that people should be allowed to make their own decisions on such an important and personal matter.

I know that my views won't be popular with some of your readers, especially coming from a woman who might be thought to have no axe to grind, but it's a view that is genuine and I hope you will print it.

Ms. A.C. – Herts

[The next contribution is so long that I had to consider the options of either paring it to the bone or running it in instalments over a number of issues. I chose the latter as it is not my policy to cut personal contributions because I know that a lot of time and energy goes into the writing of them and sometimes not a little heartache too. — D.A.]

Saga

As far as I can tell, my interest in circumcision goes back, subconsciously of course, to my first sight of a bare knob, and so I attribute it to my early youth being spent in Australia where the operation was, and still is I believe, as routine as in America. By the end of the war I had only seen one foreskin apart from my own, a tally which had been doubled before January 1947, when I became a boarder at an English prep-school where 10-15% were uncircumcised. In other words, I began to be at least partly reassured that I was not almost unique.

As I approached my 6th birthday, or thereabouts, I became increasingly fascinated and questioning about the strange sights exhibited by friends and school colleagues, wondering why on earth I was different, and with, of course, a strong desire to conform. I must have been 6 when I had my first purely sexual encounter, which was through nurses and patient games with a girl of like age who lived nearby, which entailed my lying under a blanket. I have an abiding memory of discomfort, which must have been the result of her pressing down on my erect penis under the blanket.

Around that time, three of us (with another boy) were playing in my bedroom, when she suddenly started talking about “the thing like a sausage”, and how she wanted to see ours. We both demurred, but my friend surrendered first, opening his flies to show a minute (remember our ages) erect penis – with one of those strange knobs on the end. Soon after, mine burst into view accidentally (the buttons flew apart as I had been teasing her by letting my erection make a satisfying tentpole effect), fully covered of course. There was no comment except an exultant, “I saw it!”

A little later I had two experiences which could be said to have provided a foretaste of the sterner life to come. I vaguely remember some discomfort and itching, and a white fluid appearing and drying to a crust, in and around the preputial orifice. When I mentioned it to my mother all I remember by way of action or reaction was her saying with a worried expression, “I wonder if you ought to be circumcised?” The first time I remember hearing a word, the sound of which gives me a thrill of excitement to this day. At the time, though, I was terrified, as I still had recent memories of a very uncomfortable tonsillectomy. Anyway, nature provided the cure and nothing was ever done about it. The other, more frightening experience, gave me an insight into child molestation. The boy concerned must have been around 12 or 13, but to me seemed like a man. We happened to be alone in the toilet building at school, and he walked ahead of me to the exit. After a pleasant greeting his expression suddenly hardened as he barred my way. I was ordered to expose myself for an inspection; apparently I had become the subject of speculation, and the general opinion had it that I had had an operation on my balls (an early introduction, also, of the confusion in English slang between testicles and penis). My tiny shrivelled member appeared, but I have forgotten his reaction to it. The next thing I remember was the appearance of an enormous knob and shaft seemingly right in front of my face, all lily white, and the command to put my hand around it. At this stage of life, some levity is, I hope, excusable, and, to quote the poem, I had never felt anything before, 'so hard, so hot, so long' – absolutely literally. Seriously, though, it was very frightening, especially when I was permitted to release it, but was then ordered to masturbate myself while he did likewise: without any effect on him that I remember, and certainly with no effect on me at all.

My distress on returning home called for action, although I just could not bring myself to describe the events (a reflection on parent/child relationships in the forties – or could it be the same today?) Whatever was done was done without my knowledge, and I never suffered further, so there must have been some light in the darkness of those far-off years.

By now I was really confused (remember the universality of circumcision where I was living), and sought constantly in my mind to solve the mystery of 'la difference', with little success beyond observing that I did possess a coronal ridge, albeit a pretty unimpressive one. Speculation as to whether everyone else had simply been born without my bunched red skin at the end was not very helpful, as it failed to explain the marvellously smooth, round contours of the ends of the knobs. Then, while in hospital, I saw my first foreskin: just like mine it seemed, and pretty unattractive to boot. The boy was older than I, so there the research stopped for about four years or so. All there was to be for some time was a terrifying whopper of a foreskin on a fellow hotel guest in the bathroom of the hotel where we awaited a ship to return us to England, and my first view of graffiti, on the side of a boat secured to a nearby pier; a (bare, of course) penis with a face on the knob, and a caption, "Who will suck my cock?"

I digress for a moment to ask whether graffiti of covered penises are ever drawn. I have never seen one, drawn erect or slack. How do women draw them, if they ever bother to?

For the next two years or so I lived quietly enough with the knowledge that, although there were others like me, we were in a small minority, only explainable by the hypothesis that we had, respectively, 'been born like it'. Modesty was pretty minimal in that 'muscular, jocular, Christian'-type world where, later, total nudity of pupils and staff at school pools we would find to be de rigeur, and we must all have had stored in our minds the size and appearance of each other's organs. The only discovery I made pre-puberty was the incredible power and range of my colleagues' (circumcised only, of course) urine streams; easily reaching the cistern, and even the ceiling, of the old-fashioned toilet outhouse during the inevitable competitions.

So came puberty with its maelstrom of confused emotions and disorientation, soon followed by wet dreams, all seemingly developing at such a rate that memories are confused. What I clearly remember is the almost overnight development of my penis, and a demonstration, by another, of foreskin retraction. What a revelation! All was now clear! Within a few moments, my fear of causing damage – of course, I had been able to see the meatus through the opening, but feared that pushing it out and through would cause whatever lay inside to drop out – was overcome, and lo! and behold! one knob, dark pink, a bit greasy looking with a few white flecks around the sulcus. At one or two points around the latter, the skin appeared to be not fully attached, and I observed the same, what appeared to be gaps, in one or two others, but cannot remember any developments.

During the following holidays, with some time to myself, I experimented, with the result that I tried going about with my foreskin retracted. Thanks to the way I am made, this attempt was as easy as anything, and it stayed back, neatly, unobtrusively (and deceptively), and cleanly for some four decades. There was sensitivity for the first few days, and worry for a few weeks, telling myself that it was only an experiment: one day before long I would be a good boy and cover up again, as no-one in the world could possibly have done such an incredible thing, and I was surely gradually doing myself damage, quite apart from the ridicule awaiting me on discovery.

Came the summer term with long light warm evenings: a time for love, not mutual masturbation, but we were young and very, very immature. Every evening after lights out we would lie on the tops of our beds, often with head at the foot for easier conversation. Cocks were waved around for owner's or friends' enjoyment or inspection, with varying degrees of abandon – I nearly said 'gay abandon' but that would be mixing them a little. I think we all sported the standard 6" or thereabouts. I know I did, as I remember owning a steel rule of that length which came into frequent use. I was happy with my state, now knowing about circumcision as an operation done on the very young if there was something wrong with the organ, and so actually feeling a bit superior that it had been unnecessary for me. The circumcision quoted in the Bible I was a bit hazy about.

I joined in the mutual inspections after some initial reservation, and became as enthusiastic as the rest, and handled, and was handled by the same sex for the first and last time in my life. Perhaps I might say at this juncture that I consider myself entirely hetero – as far as anyone can be. At this time normal sex and procreation were starting to occupy seriously my thoughts. Sex lectures started for me at public school four or five months later. Masturbation for me entailed pulling my foreskin fully forward and then back, in the normal way. Thus was produced what I now knew to be 'pukka spunk'. To beget a child, therefore, the mother-to-be had to wait patiently, while the father-to-be masturbated nearly to orgasm, then, with superb timing, ejaculate into her anus. Fine, but what if one couldn't pull any skin forward: surely this was an essential part of the process. I coincided with one of the roundheads in the loo one day, and asked for a demonstration. This consisted of his squeezing his knob and stretching the member as far as he could, which I also was invited to try – as meaningless an exercise as I can imagine: what I wanted to know was, “Can you pull the skin right forward to cover it?” The answer was an uncomprehending look, and “No”, an answer which, on later reflection, I found incredibly thrilling, and which spawned numerous fantasies. It did not, however, contribute anything to my human biology theories.

Anyway, one of my goals in the mutual inspections was to discover, in essence, the differences between my own and the circumcised state. After two, I must have felt satisfied enough, for that was the extent of my ‘random sampling’. The first was of interest because he was the only boy modest enough always to keep his penis hidden away between his legs in the bath, which was always taken while the rest washed at the basins. Somehow he could keep it there even after climbing out. It was average enough, with not very much removed, but cleanly done and neat looking. He did not erect at my attentions, but remained at full-length ready to do so. I pulled forward and released a couple of times while he chuckled with delight. Each time, the remaining skin would come forward far enough to cover the knob entirely, then roll at moderate speed back to its ‘post-operative position’. Actually, the speed of self retraction, I think, was considerably less than that of my entire skin when fully erect. The next had spent some years in India, and had presumably been circumcised there in what I now realise was the ‘Islamic way’, not, perhaps, surprisingly. At any rate, his was very different, with the scar about  $\frac{3}{8}$ ths of the way back down the shaft, whereas I never remember actually catching sight of the other one's scar. He was still well short of puberty, and still very small, but fully erect when I pulled forward. Now, the skin would just meet over the end, with a wide slit so different from my puckered red tip, and, on release, snapped straight back.

None of this helped very much, interesting though it was. At least anyway, on one occasion, I had proof that my ‘deception plan’ was working – for in truth, part of my aim must have been to delude others. At the urinal I found myself next to an older boy who I knew to be a cavalier, and who, as some did, looked across and down, saying, “Oh! I see you've got one of those parliamentarian ones!” I could not resist saying, “No”, to which he said, “Of course you have.” In what in other societies could have been my party trick, I snapped everything forward, and his blank look of astonishment made up for a lot.

Two last sightings around this period abide strongly with me yet. We were all gathered around one boy's bed inspecting his erect and very complete circumcision, and I learnt that the frenulum (something that I had wondered idly about) also could come in for attention: nothing at all remained of his but a longish red mark where once it had been. At the glans anchorage, instead of a slightly untidy collection of folds of thin skin, there was a beautifully scalloped out hollow which impressed me greatly. The next time, I was on top of my bedclothes on a warm evening, with my head at the foot, in a position which brought my eyes very close to the little cupboard where the night potty was kept. My reverie was suddenly interrupted by a sight which made me catch my breath: someone was relieving himself (a very normal and unremarkable event) and I had a close up view of the most incredible knob I had ever seen so far. I had, in fact, often seen it before, everywhere we normally saw 'each other', but what now shook me was a fully side view in partial silhouette, and I could see how a radical circumcision completely exposed the corona all round, especially the underside. It was all clean lines without a wrinkle to see, and cleanly exposed every change of shape as if carved from the solid with the sharpest of tools (which, in a way, I suppose it was, if I think about it). But the most impressive and exciting thing was the depth of the ledge on the underside, so unlike my underside with the frenulum pulling forward so much to occupy this space.

(to be continued)

Advertisement

John from Yorkshire has sent in the following advertisement from Private Eye, to which he has replied. He'll let us know the result.

CIRCUMCISED? A cut above the rest? Take this opportunity to join the world's most exclusive club. Your very own membership diploma. Also an ideal birthday or Christmas gift for the man without skin. £5 to S.N.I.P., Box 9481, (Private Eye).

Contact Corner

My name is Ryan. I'm 25, presently single, and live in a shared house in Nottingham.

I've been interested in foreskins, or rather the lack of them, for some years. I've been finding out as much information as I can over the last few years from books and people who are circumcised. Learning that some, if not all, ladies prefer a circumcised penis, I have made arrangements to have a circumcision early in January 1992, as I'm presently uncircumcised.

I believe a circumcised penis is also easier to keep clean, looks better, and feels better, especially in more intimate moments with a partner, as well as preventing cancer etc.

I would like to contact others with similar views.

Ryan

ACORN

1992 Issue No 2

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Female Circumcision		Page 2
Balanitis Problem Cured	Bill	Page 5
Saddam	D.A.	Page 7
Incidence by Age	Anon	Page 8
Revenge	R.B.W.	Page 9
Introduction	Mrs. J.M.	Page 11
Books	T.A.	Page 13
Saga (continued)		Page 14

Anonymity in the newsletter will always be maintained, using only initials, with town or county, and not even that if desired.

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Another mixed bag of news and views. I hope the balance is retained to satisfy the interest of all camps.

We have received quite a few questionnaires back, and when we have the bulk we'll correlate them and publish the statistics. Plus, of course, take notice of your favourite subjects.

David Acorn

[The following is an article, sent in by A.W. of Sussex, published in the magazine VIVA, in the U.S.A.]

Female Circumcision: Operation Orgasm

By Terri Schultz

The woman grabbed the headboard of the bed and tried to relax. As her husband's breathing grew quicker and his movements faster, she moaned convincingly. But inside she felt cold and numb, as if, with his coming, emotional gates had closed in her mind. Afterwards she felt empty as always, and began to cry, as usual. "What's the matter?" he asked gently. "Nothing", she answered.

Doris, as we'll call her, loved her husband, enjoyed sex, and was terrified by this recurrent last-minute retreat from orgasm. The rare orgasm she did have (at least she thought it was orgasm) was insipid and flat. During her next gynaecological exam she mentioned this 'frigidity' to her doctor, who suggested that circumcision might solve her problem. Doris agreed to try it, and allowed the doctor to remove a tiny snip of skin from the prepuce, which covers the tip of the clitoris just as the male foreskin covers the tip of the penis. With the sensitive clitoris thus exposed to direct contact and stimulation, Doris found that within three weeks she was having deep, sensual, overwhelming orgasms.

Female circumcision is neither new nor unique to our society. It has long been practised in other countries, although usually with the intention of deadening rather than enhancing a woman's sexual desires. But today it is being re-evaluated and increasingly performed in this country by doctors whose women patients swear that circumcision improves sex.

I have asked a number of women their views on the pros and cons of female circumcision. Some theorise that this is yet another sexual right hidden from women all these years along with the right to know about, and enjoy, orgasms. Others doubt whether circumcision changes anything except a woman's state of mind. Some, especially those involved in counselling people on sex and marriage, insist that the surgery is at worst a mutilation, at best a physical balm for psychological sexual problems. Is it a new male myth, a frivolous cosmetic surgery created to exploit women's growing interest in their own sexual responses, or is it an advance for female sexuality?

We are only now finding out about the role of the clitoris in sexual enjoyment. Until very recently, clitoral arousal and orgasm was considered inferior to vaginal orgasm, a theory originated by Freud. In the 1960's, the clitoris received new attention from the laboratories of Masters & Johnson. They observed 7,500 orgasms in women and found no physiological difference between clitoral and vaginal orgasms. Instead, they only found one type of orgasm – sexual orgasm. In fact, the walls of the vagina have few nerve endings and are quite insensitive to touch, whereas the tiny clitoris is the most nerve-packed organ in any human body – male or female – and the only organ in either sex that exists solely for pleasure. With clitoral foreplay and stimulation, women are physiologically capable of having several orgasms within a few minutes.

This news is a great relief to those women who once felt they were 'immature' if they reached orgasm through masturbation of the clitoris. And to 'non-orgasmic' women, that some simple clitoral malfunction might actually be the cause of their seeming frigidity.

Doris was 30 years old at the time she was circumcised. "I was desperate," she said, "orgasm was nothing but a slow ascent to disappointment. My husband would turn me on, we would both want each other, we both enjoyed foreplay – everything was fine up to the end. I guess I never was really aware of my clitoris – I never could really feel it or tell if it was becoming enlarged when I was aroused.

At first I wasn't too concerned about not climaxing; I just figured if I relaxed and let things take their time, everything would work out. But after a year I began to worry about it more. I started to dream about having orgasms, and would wake up to find I had had one in my sleep. But never with my husband. I would be with him to the very end, and then – it was like I hit a plateau – he would keep going higher and I just sat back and watched him. It was frustrating and created a lot of tension between us."

When the doctor examined her, he found what is called a 'hooded clitoris', which occurs in an estimated 5 – 15% of women. The normal clitoris is always covered with skin (the foreskin) that is attached to the inner lips of the vagina. When the foreskin is larger than normal, doctors refer to the clitoris as 'hooded'. When Doris returned to the doctor 8 weeks afterwards he asked her if she had noticed any difference in her sexual response. She said that she had so much sensation the first time she reached orgasm that she started to scream and cry. Her husband thought he was hurting her and tried to pull out, but she grabbed his buttocks and kept him in, and had a fantastic orgasm.

Not all doctors in America agree with circumcision. Most agree with the argument that, during sex, direct contact with the clitoris is not necessary, or always desirable, since the clitoral tip is so sensitive that direct pressure can irritate or even hurt. Instead, indirect rubbing of the clitoral shaft or the surrounding vaginal lips, either with masturbation or the thrusting motion of the penis, can bring more pleasurable and prolonged orgasms.

Surgeons, as well, have found that in many cases the amount of tissue surrounding the clitoris has little or no effect on orgasms. The nerves of the clitoris are so deeply rooted in the pelvic region that even a woman who has lost her entire clitoris through surgery, can still experience clitoral arousal and orgasm just through stimulation of the mons. This in itself is enough to send the message up the spinal cord to the brain.

Much of the controversy around circumcision stems from its cruel history. For 3,500 years, women were traditionally circumcised in parts of Egypt, Mexico, Asia, Africa and South America. The definition has varied widely to mean the removal of various parts – anything from a portion of the foreskin, to the inner vaginal lips, the entire clitoris, plus all or part of the outer vaginal lips, or even sewing together the whole vulva (infibulation).

Occasionally, these circumcisions are backed by religious tradition, sometimes as more civilized substitutes for human sacrifice. But more often they were used as a way to introduce a girl to womanhood, or to reduce her sexual desire so she would remain a virgin until marriage, and a faithful wife afterwards. Whatever their method or purpose, all these circumcisions have only one aim; not to fulfil the sexual needs of women, but to make them more desirable to men.

In Ethiopia, for instance, circumcision is a folk custom practised by Christian Amharas, Jewish Falashas, Mohammedans, and other groups to prevent their women from becoming too sensual. The clitoris, inner vaginal lips, and sometimes outer vaginal lips of all female children are amputated with a razor or knife by an older woman. The vulva is then sewn together with horsehair and bark, and a plant stalk is inserted into the vagina to allow a drainage tube for urine and menstrual flow. On the circumcised girl's wedding day, another elderly woman cuts an incision in the vulva so that the bridegroom can have intercourse with the girl. The singing and dancing of the wedding guests around the matrimonial hut are supposed to drown out the bride's cries of pain as her husband breaches the raw wound. The removal of the stitches, followed by energetic intercourse, does sometimes cause fatal haemorrhaging.

Circumcision was popularised in Ancient Egypt by a pharaoh who, according to rumour, had such a small penis that he ordered the vaginas of his women to be made smaller so that he could enjoy intercourse with them. It is no longer practised there, but other societies still consider uncircumcised women impure. Some Islam countries regard it as an embellishment, like a piece of fine jewellery, and the women encourage the practice.

In Upper Guinea, teenage girls of the Sambele people have the clitoris and the outer lips removed to aid in childbirth, supposedly getting rid of 'obstructions' around the vaginal opening. The operation is performed in an open clearing by an old woman, and the girl is then taken to sit in the river mud to stop the bleeding. Her wound is then washed with boiled leaves. After ten days of recuperating, she is taken to the home of a village boy to become his wife. The women view circumcision as one of the social events of their lives.

In America, circumcision has had its own dubious history. It was recommended at the turn of the century as a cure for masturbation, which was claimed to cause hysteria, insanity and epilepsy. In 1936 an American doctor seriously suggested that women more passionate than their husbands be circumcised to reduce their sex drive.

Female circumcision takes only a few minutes, and performed in the doctors office. After injecting a painkiller, the doctor uses a four-inch forceps to pull back the foreskin, makes about a half-inch slit in it, and removes the elliptical piece of skin. There is little or no bleeding and usually no stitches are required, but the woman is told not to have intercourse or masturbate for a week. Some women are extremely sensitive after being circumcised, and one woman reported that she was stimulated just by walking about. A stewardess stated that at first she was very aware of her clitoris, and her orgasms came thick and fast. But soon they settled down. They were still more intense than before her circumcision, but depended more on the mood she was in and the person she was with, than on the fact that her clitoris was a little more exposed.

Balanitis Problem Cured

I was particularly interested in the contribution from M.J. of Dubai; I too spent my early childhood years, during the war, in the middle east, in what is now Israel.

For some time I was troubled with recurring balanitis; pus would discharge from the end of my foreskin, staining my underpants and pyjamas. This necessitated bathing the glans and inner foreskin with mild antiseptic. After two or three days it would clear up only to recommence some weeks later; it was becoming a nuisance. The main infected area was the sulcus, which became inflamed and on occasions acutely irritable; if rubbed, the area would become further aggravated and sore.

One day, at lunch, my father, quite 'out of the blue', asked if my willy was O.K., and went on to say that later on that afternoon a man was coming to see my willy to see if he could help my problem. I gave the matter little further thought, as my willy had been the repeated scene of attention for some many months previously. Little did I realise what was in store.

After the routine siesta, the man turned up. I noticed that he brought a small leather case with him, but to this day I have no idea who he was or where he came from. I was told to remove my shorts and lie on the bed. He began by examining and feeling my balls. He told my father that they were normal, and that my inflammation problem was very common in children of my age and often reluctant to clear up, but that it did appear that my foreskin was rather long.

He then took from his case a bottle containing a solution and poured a small amount on his hand; I remember it smelling vaguely of herbs. He then began to apply this substance to the whole skin of my willy. He pulled the foreskin back and forth several times, while he continued to work this solution into my skin. Not only did I become erect but I soon noticed that the skin was becoming very elastic and pliable in his hands, and that my foreskin, in particular, was becoming appreciably stretched and loose. He worked quickly and was clearly experienced at his task. I did not climax, but I do remember that it was an odd sensation. While continuing this treatment he proceeded to pull my foreskin forward as far as possible, while with his other hand he felt for the outline of the glans and the thickness of the foreskin. He then turned to my father and said, "Shall I trim him?" Father's reply was to the effect that it would be better. I still did not know what this meant or what would happen. I was then told to look up at the ceiling. The next thing I remember was my foreskin being pulled forward and held very tightly, which was very uncomfortable; then a sudden sharp pain similar to a wasp's sting. I immediately looked round apprehensively, to see my foreskin and a small razor lying on the bedside table. The operator was aligning the two cut edges on the shaft of my willy. There was not a great deal of bleeding, quickly stopped by the application of some yellow ointment. I was told not to worry as there was nothing more to be done. My willy was soon tightly bandaged which was left in place for the next three days, then left for the scab to harden. This was done and the healing progressed uneventfully. There was no further discomfort, and no more balanitis.

Before he left, the operator produced another small bottle containing a clear fluid, and proceeded to place my severed foreskin into it, then told me this was for me to keep if I wished. I did keep it for some time until we started to pack to return to the U.K., but it must have got thrown out when clearing up. I now very much regret not ensuring that it returned with me to remind me of an eventful, not to say, unexpected afternoon.

Bill – Kingston

[From all the stories we have had sent us, it has struck me that nearly all the foreskin troubles have occurred abroad, especially in the Arab countries.

A Jewish friend once told me that some things that are now Jewish Law originated because of the conditions and climate in which the early tribes lived. Two of these, he told me, were burial one day after death, and of course, circumcision. With scarcity of water with which to wash frequently, the sand, mostly much finer than you find at the seaside, plays havoc with the body's moving parts. I have spent a short time in the Yemen desert myself, and as well as always having sand under my foreskin, it mixed with the sweat in my groin and under my armpits to form a sort of carborundum paste to make these areas raw. — D.A.]

Saddam

Everyone will remember the two RAF fliers who were shot down during the Gulf War and captured, Adrian Nichol and John Peters. I've been sent a newspaper account of their torture. After some account of their torture the article states, 'Nichol's head was beaten so badly that his clothes were soaked in blood. Tissue paper was stuffed down his neck and set alight. At one stage, as he lined up with other prisoners to have his genitals marked with a felt tip, he feared torture with electrodes. There was a moment of relief: in fact, the Iraqis were checking who was Jewish'.

This reminded me of a true story of two young Jewish brothers in the south of France during the war. The gestapo were continually rounding up the male population to check their penises for circumcision. All those found circumcised were investigated further to find out if they were Jewish. The two boys were hauled in and told to drop their trousers. When the Germans saw their bare glans they were interrogated, but a Jewish doctor had told them to say that they had had bad adhesions, which ran in their family. After sticking to their story through a lot of intimidation they were freed. They were only eleven and twelve but they were active in the Resistance.

The torture above reminds me of another story, fictitious this time. A James Bond one, which some of you might have read, where the baddie (I can't remember which one, there were so many) captured James and tied him naked to a chair with a hole in the seat so that his testicles hung through. These were then subjected to continual smacks with a type of carpet beater until he bled. After he got away and convalesced he was supposed to have been none the worse. I wonder! Anyway, better him than me. I always wonder why torturers go any further than the genitals, as there can't be anything worse, either physically or psychologically.

D.A.

Incidence By Age

After reading my last letter (A Naturalist's View, 3/91) I realised that my opinions and experiences were totally subjective. Hence for the last few months I have been engaged on a statistical survey of the evidence for circumcision.

On my frequent visits to my local swimming pool (in a very middle class area of a large industrial city) I have 'spotted' 200 penises. This was an easy task as every man showers naked after swimming. I kept a record, not only of whether or not circumcised, but also of the relationship between age and circumcision. The figures are given in the following table. The data can be plotted as a graph in which it was assumed that all men were born at the midpoint in the relevant age-group. Hence for men in their forties, i.e. born between 1943 and 1952 the mid-point would be 1947.

The graph shows that circumcision was common (with over a third of all men circumcised) from the 1920's through until the 1950's. Virtually half the men in their thirties are circumcised, compared with under a quarter of men in their twenties. It appears from the graph that 1963 was the 'breakpoint' in which the rate of circumcision dropped below a third.

Despite this quantitative revolution in my work I have added a few observations to my past ideas. One man (twenties and circumcised) was proudly displaying a large ring presumably held by a piercing where his frenulum had once been. Most uncut men wash their penises quite unselfconsciously – retracting the foreskin carefully and cleaning underneath it, often whilst facing away from the wall. I also observed that all East-Asian men show a bare glans, although, as most seem to have plenty of spare skin on the shaft, they most probably have foreskins retracted. These were not counted in my survey.

Incidentally, this is not a city with a large Jewish or Islamic population, so few, if any ritual circumcisions can be assumed. As for naturists, quite disappointing really; only one other overall tan.

I remain uncircumcised – the list that Tony kindly provided did not prove useful. So yesterday I completed and posted the Surgical Advisory Services form. No doubt this will be the subject of my next letter...

	Uncircumcised	Circumcised
Pre-puberty	90	10
Teenage	37	18
20's	76	24
30's	52	48
40's	62	38
50's	62	38
60's +	67	33

All figures percentage within age group

Anon

Revenge

Its all very well for you guys with a missionary anti-foreskin zeal to start your career off by circumcising your offspring, but you'd be wise to think carefully before you do. If he's like me he'll bitterly resent growing up and finding his penis has been subjected to a barbaric mutilation, saddling him with the repercussions of a misguided or unthinking parent's neurotic views. If he's the quiet type he may write his foreskin off and go through life silently bemoaning his disfigurement. But if on the other hand he has a bit of spark in him, and is not prepared to let it go by default, you could be in trouble.

I must say, I roared my support when I read of men in the States who, sick at being shamefully mutilated to suit someone else's whim, had decided that those responsible shouldn't be allowed to get away with it, and set about suing parents and surgeons alike.

Now I'm not very proud of what I am about to tell you. But when I totted up the schedule of misery, the gnawing ache of dissatisfaction, the fear of ridicule, and lifelong sexual unfulfilment, which have been visited on me by an uncaring parent, I decided that I owed it to myself to punish those responsible.

My mother has always been a silly, vain woman, and she decided to have me 'done' purely for snobbish reasons, since circumcision was associated with the upper classes. (Her official 'excuse' was hygiene and the prevention of V.D.) My dad strongly disapproved, as did the family doctor, but she wouldn't listen. My dad came home from work one day to find my mother looking guilty and me in a distressed condition, bleeding heavily from an appallingly mutilated penis, the sight of which made him – and me – sick ever after.

Mother is getting on a bit now, but I thought to myself, she's got no idea of the misery she's condemned me to by her mindless and wicked act, and it's time she realised what she had done. So I plucked up my courage and quietly told her how she had succeeded in poisoning my life, and destroying any hope of a reasonable sexual relationship because of the psychological effect of that operation all those years ago. She was shocked and horrified, firstly that I should mention a 'taboo' subject, and secondly at the fact that I was resentful of something she hadn't given a moment's thought to since the event. But she did have the grace to burst into tears when I told her sadly but firmly that my resentment had now developed into a cold hatred, and that she would never see or hear of me again.

I was then lucky enough to track down the surgeon who mutilated me, and am now consulting a solicitor (like me, circumcised at birth and silently resentful of it) to see what grounds I have for suing. Even if there are none, I'm inclined to go ahead just to make the bastard's declining years a misery. After all, he made my whole life one and it's time the biter got bit.

R.B.W. – Bedford

[I'm extremely sorry for your plight, R.B., but I'm left wondering why you have waited so long to track down the surgeon, since making a mess of an operation has been suable for many years now, as the following items from newspapers make clear. They were sent to me by A.W. of Sussex. — D.A.]

Daily Mirror — 23.2.85

A man's lusty sex life was ruined when he was circumcised, a court heard yesterday. Sean Hickey, 35, had been proud of his masculinity and thought the operation would improve his sexual satisfaction. Instead, it left him unable to make love properly and in unbearable pain, the High Court in London was told. Even after corrective surgery he was able to have sex with his wife only four times last year.

Mr. Hickey, a driving instructor, is suing Croydon Health Authority over the operation carried out 5 years ago. The Authority admits partial negligence, but is contesting the claim. Mr. Hickey said he had decided to have the operation for several reasons. The woman he was living with then preferred circumcised men. He had also had trouble with erections and, as a young man "had a nasty experience with a zip" putting his jeans on. But that was nothing compared to his distress after the operation. He told the judge, "I felt terrible. I really can't find words to explain it. Sex was impossible."

Daily Mirror — 1.3.85

A woman revealed her sad diary of sexual frustration to the High Court yesterday. Her husband, Sean Hickey, is claiming damages over a bungled circumcision operation which left him in pain. Mrs. Hickey told the court that whenever she and Sean attempted to make love she wrote "tried" in her diary. She said that between April 1981 and the birth of their son in October 1982 they attempted sex only 12 times. Last year there were only four entries in the diary as they tried for another child. With some entries she wrote, “Not trying – very depressed.” She said that was probably a day when she was feeling particularly broody and feeling bitter. She added, “When we try we have to stop because Sean is sore. Sometimes we cannot continue.”

The lack of a full sex life led to arguments, she said, and Sean became depressed.

The Sun — 6.3.85

Macho Sean Hickey was awarded £5700 damages yesterday for the surgeon’s snip that ruined his love life.

Last night he was planning to spend the money on operations to restore his manhood. He said after the High Court decision: “It is a hollow victory. They mutilated me – they did it wrong.” The surgery left his penis with a cork-screw look, and his lovemaking a disaster. Sean had a ‘straightening’ operation carried out privately, but again the pain was so bad that he managed to make love only four times last year. The judge awarded costs of £30,000 against Croydon Health Authority who admitted partial negligence.

Introduction

Any girl determined to get the full benefit of her most valuable asset can do a lot worse than join the services. Just think, provided you don’t mind the military type, you’ve got a choice of men you wouldn’t find anywhere else: smart men, fit men, clean men, with all the grots and creeps weeded out by the Selection Board. It’s the ideal field for a personable girl, whether she wants to treat it as a marriage market, or a heaven sent opportunity to play the field with some of the best male talent the country has to offer.

I chose the second option, and my seven years in the WRAF turned out to be one long uninhibited frolic. If ever I write my memoirs, I reckon I’ll make a fortune with an unvarnished account of my adventures, providing I can find the nerve and a broad-minded publisher!

In the WRAF I proved to be as successful in my job as I was socially, and finished up with a commission. This meant that, instead of going out with the lads, I had to be a bit more picky and go for the officers. Most were fine, but the airs and graces affected by some were a right pain in the bum, and eventually I married the best man of the lot, a senior NCO.

Now circumcision is not a subject to which I normally devote a lot of thought, but it occurred to me that your readers would be intrigued to know that of all the many dozens of men who contributed to my love life, not a single non-commissioned rank (including my husband) was circumcised, whereas a fair number of the officers were.

Having said that and left you to wonder at the vagaries of class and custom, that should be the end of the matter. However, sometime after I left the service and settled down to married bliss with my husband in a garrison town in Germany, I had a visit from my old childhood friend, Mary, who had gone to live in the States, and who came to stay for a couple of days. We had a good old chinwag and she was a bit jealous when I told her about my string of boyfriends over the years.

She helped me put my little boy to bed, and when she saw him undressed she was interested to see that he had not been circumcised, and mentioned that it was virtually universal where she lived in the States. I told her that here it tended to be a fashion adopted by the 'rupert' class (officers), and it had more to do with 'one-upmanship' on the part of the parents than anything else. (Would your readers not agree?) I laughed and explained that my husband had a foreskin like a length of rubber hose and it had never given him any trouble. I said I'd hate him to lose it since it kept his knob nice and tender, and besides, it was much easier to give a man a wank if he had a foreskin.

This caught her imagination: she declared herself hooked on hand-jobs, not merely from the safe sex angle, but she dearly loved to see the spunk fly as a result of rubbing a guy's prick. She said she'd always found it irksome having to have lubricant jelly handy to do the job properly, and she was dying to know what it was like to handle a cock with a long mobile foreskin. She went on to ply me with questions about it, asking if you needed to pull it back to take a leak (What on earth for? – Jim and my little boy didn't, nor did any other male of my acquaintance.) Did it need to be pulled back to fuck and didn't it get in the way? (No. It usually slipped back of its own accord and was hardly noticeable during the act.) Wasn't there a cleanliness problem? (I suppose there are peasants about who don't bother to wash, but I don't know any.) And so on. I was quite tickled about her curiosity and said she'd have to try one for herself. And then without thinking I said she could have a go with Jim's if he agreed and providing she left it at that.

So when Jim came home and junior had been put to bed I introduced the subject. I told him that Mary had never seen an uncircumcised man, and would like to have a look at his foreskin. Jim's used to me making outrageous remarks, but this shook him a bit. But he took only a second or two to agree. "My pleasure", he said, and came and stood in front of the two of us on the sofa. Mary watched with interest as I undid his flies and extracted his long beautiful penis. I told Mary she had my permission to go ahead and touch it. She cradled it in the palm of her hand, gave a couple of inquisitive tugs to the long rosette of foreskin on the end, and then traced the outline of his knob where it stretched the elastic skin as the whole thing swelled and lengthened. When it was at full stretch she squeezed it in her palm and said she was dying to pull the skin back. "Go ahead", said Jim, looking down at her small hand clasping his big swollen prick. She slipped the elastic foreskin back along the shaft, completely revealing his moist blue cherry. Jim shivered with pleasure.

“Go on,” I said, “you’ll have to keep going now you’ve started.”

Mary needed no further encouragement, and started giving him a slow sexy wank, stretching the skin back and forward from balls to tip. She remarked on how much easier it was to service a cock with a foreskin, and demonstrated the versatility of action available to her by varying her grasp so as to have his wet purple plum sticking nakedly from her fist whilst she worked on the shaft, and then reverting to the fully covered grip where she massaged the sensitive knob through its taut skin overcoat.

By now Jim was sweating! His eyes were popping out of his head and his hips were jerking as the jolts of pleasure registered on his sensitive glans. “Come on,” I said, “don’t torment the poor buggler any longer. Give him the works.” She speeded up her action until her fist was a blur, and then Jim’s hips started bucking uncontrollably. At this point I had visions of him spraying spunk all over the wallpaper, because he spurts further than most; so I pushed her hand away and took over, making sure I closed off the tip of his skin with the other hand, so that when he came his spunk was all trapped under his foreskin which swelled right up. As his ardour and penis subsided, I milked it all out of his skin into an ashtray under the approving gaze of our guest, who remarked how much cleaner it was to be able to deposit it where you wanted.

Mary left us the next day, thanking us for our hospitality and entertainment: she’d had a thoroughly enjoyable and instructive time!

What needs to be understood is that this little episode was a one-off. Neither Jim nor I believe in threesomes normally, and quite sincerely, my aim in letting Mary handle my husband’s penis in such a way was purely for educational purposes. Besides which, no matter how lecherously it’s performed or described, a hand job’s only a bit of fun. I first treated a boy to one when I was only thirteen, but I have to admit that I found the whole exercise terrifically stimulating, and Jim even more so.

Mrs J.M. – Hillingdon

Books

Nigel Pavitt, Samburu

(London: Kyle Cathie Ltd. ISBN 1 85626 043 7. £35)

Wilfred Thesinger, the travel writer and author of Arabian Sands, The Marsh Arab and other books, has a liking for nomadic people and harsh environments. He has retired to the near-desert of Northern Kenya, where he has settled among the Samburu. He contributes a foreword to Nigel Pavitt’s book about them. The book is in large ‘coffee-table’ format, and lavishly illustrated with colour photographs of Samburu people, young and old, going about their traditional pastoral and social activities.

The young children spend much of their time herding and tending to the livestock. The young men used to lead a life of cattle-raiding. Although this is discouraged in modern circumstances, they are still expected to defend their stock and families from animal predators. But between these duties they have plenty of time for a very full love life.

The chapter which will be of special interest to Acorn readers deals with the initiation of lads to the status of warrior, marking their transition from boyhood to manhood. Afterwards they no longer live as children, but have a much freer life. The transitional ceremonies involve important changes of dress and lifestyle; and of course, circumcision. The chapter discusses and illustrates these aspects very fully: the lads approaching initiation go around together in a group, dancing and singing, taunting and joking with one another in ways which reinforce the bonds between them, and help each other to keep up morale in face of their approaching ordeal. They are marked out by new styles of hair and clothing, with different ones again after they have successfully been through the ordeal. A cowhide has to be prepared for them to sit on while being circumcised. There is a picture of a lad of about 14, visibly uncircumcised, being led by his father in the early morning to the appointed place. He sits down and fixes his gaze so that he doesn't blink or flinch during the operation, and is supported by an elder brother while the cutting is done. Unfortunately the pictures at this point show us little more than the positions of the lad and the operator. But the chapter gives us a usefully good idea of the centrality to Samburu society of these initiation ceremonies, and we gain a good idea of Samburu life: very different to our sophisticated post-industrial society. But their life has its own pleasures and its significant turning points, which mark off the transition from boy to man very much more clearly than is the case in western society.

Tony Acorn

T.Blackburn, A Clip of Steel.

(London: MacGibbon, 1969)

A member would like to know if anyone can provide information on this novel, written about infibulation.

Saga (continued)

For years after this, I was terrified that a chance sighting, by someone, of my frenulum would betray my shameful state, as I believed its presence, untampered with, to be one of the sure indicators of it. I now knew almost exactly how I wanted to be, should some event make the operation necessary.

It was even longer before I ever heard of elective surgery, which, when I started to think seriously about it, I hoped would provide me with the cut well back, absence of the frenulum, and the shaft skin as tight as practicable, with the utmost exposure of the glans. One thing haunted me all this time; I had discovered the exquisitely sensitive area inside the foreskin, between the end of the frenulum and the rim of the opening, and was loath to lose it. To digress again, it seems possible that complaints in Forum correspondence about 'feeling completely dead' from those circumcised at their own wish, with later regrets, could refer to the removal of this important area.

Most of the boys had been circumcised in infancy presumably, as only two had anything to say of the experience. One, how he had suffered quite a lot of pain before being whisked off to hospital for treatment, and how he had come round to more pain. I wonder if he had suffered premature or over-enthusiastic attempts at retraction by his mother, with resultant tearing or other damage? The other just alluded to waking up and finding it 'like it is now, with a bit of cotton wool around it'. This was the unwitting exhibitionist while peeing, and at the time was just experiencing his first erections, which was interesting to observe, as he would suddenly drop his pyjamas to reveal his tiny organ standing vertically – the fact that it pointed up at his face seemed to fascinate him.

Self and mutual inspections continued unabated. The boy who had been in India was next to me, and almost every night he would open his pyjamas, and I would watch him inspecting and manipulating his tiny erect organ, which, by now, looked virtually the same as mine (at least across the gap between us), to my gratification. Once or twice he came over and gave mine a thorough going-over without ever mentioning the foreskin; not even when he masturbated me (not as far as orgasm) in the normal foreskin fully forward and fully back way, which presumably was his first experience of it. That was the only time I was ever masturbated by another male. Once, I watched him masturbating himself, sitting opposite on the end of someone's bed, by pulling the shaft skin to and fro without any attempt to pull right forward, which I already knew would be too much like hard work! At any rate his knob remained in full view the whole time, and, once, he giggled and said, "It tickles!" thus answering one of the questions in my mind.

Putting a brave face on things, I still maintained to myself that the lack of need for circumcision when younger, plus my convincing mimicry, made mine somewhat superior, but deep down I knew I envied the roundheads their guiltless display of their knobs, and the inability of so many to cover at all what, in me, had been hidden away so confusingly for so long. Was the latter, perhaps, a mutated bondage fetish?

(to be continued)

ACORN

1992 Issue No 3

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
A String of Beads	Dr. Ray	Page 2
About Penile Veins	Dr. Ray	Page 3
Children Circumcised by Barbers		Page 4
Nirvana	T.A.	Page 5
Ladies to the Fore	Anthony	Page 5
The Prince of Wales	Anthony	Page 6
Book Excerpt	J.H.	Page 7
Nearly Jewish	Mrs A.G.	Page 8
More Copies	H.J.M.	Page 10
Questionnaire Replies		Page 11
Maceheads	A.D.	Page 13
Docking	V.	Page 13
Saga		Page 14
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

I asked one of our members, Ray Hamble, who is a doctor and 'Agony Uncle' of HIM magazine, if he would agree to be the Acorn adviser on genitalia, mainly physiologically, and he has kindly consented.

To start the ball rolling I posed a couple of questions which have been kicking around for a long time. There is no need to write them here as Ray has incorporated them in his answers.

D.A.

A String Of Beads

In Victorian times 'ladies' were not supposed to enjoy sexual intercourse. It was unbecoming to show personal physical pleasure in an activity designed for the procreation of children and the gratification of one's husband. What's more, many a woman will say that to lie back in bed and simply make oneself available as nothing more than a receptacle for the penetrating male penis is not particularly enjoyable. The female orgasm is often much more elusive than its male counterpart and frequently used to be consciously avoided rather than encouraged.

With the gradual emancipation of women, sexual pleasure moved higher up the agenda. The traditional 'Missionary Position' for intercourse was superseded by a number of more sophisticated entry techniques designed to enhance the enjoyment of both parties. What's more, when the intensity of feeling induced by stimulating the female clitoris was fully appreciated, it wasn't long before ways and means of doing precisely this were increasingly explored.

But it wasn't until the late '60s and '70s, during the great sexual revolution, that a whole range of gadgets were developed, designed specifically as clitoral stimulators – ribbed condoms, rubber 'ticklers' worn as a ring around the penis, etc. One such ploy, taken up particularly by North American Casanovas, was the permanent surgical implantation of a string of small beads under the loose skin of the shaft of the penis towards its tip – a sort of sub-cutaneous necklace just behind the rim of the glans. During the thrusting of sexual intercourse, as the loose shaft skin slid too and fro, the beads would excite the clitoris and elevate 'my lady's fancy' to cloud 9.

But I've been asked a question about these beads which, at first sight, may seem a bit odd. "What stopped the beads from dropping down into the scrotum, as there doesn't appear to be a membrane between the penis and the scrotum; and when the penis is flaccid – especially in the smaller man – it can be pushed right back into the scrotum?"

It's true that the loose outer skin, which forms a sort of sheath around the solid shaft of the penis within it, seems to be very mobile. I suppose that one could imagine that the beads were floating in the space between skin and shaft, free to move, like ball bearings, anywhere they liked. However, it isn't as simple as that. In spite of all its superficial mobility, the skin of the shaft is intimately and continuously joined to the flesh beneath it by webs of connective tissue, which firmly hold in one place any 'foreign body' introduced into the gap. Even when the penis is in its softest state, and is apparently turned inside out on itself when pushed back into the scrotum, it still maintains its integrity as a complete organ. Nothing is free to fall anywhere, and as soon as the shaft reappears, like a snail from its shell, its structure remains intact – beads and all.

Ray Hamble

About Penile Veins

The more penises you study, the more you will become aware of the vast network of veins which stand out on the surface of the skin along the shaft. The most prominent is known as the Dorsal Vein of the Penis, and is one of the main blood vessels carrying blood back towards the heart after it has spent its oxygen, having originally been pumped into the penis through the arteries.

Some of these veins seem to emerge from the underside of the penis and the glans through the frenulum (often incorrectly referred to as the frenum), which is that rather quaint and exquisitely sexually sensitive fold or tag of skin which forms an attachment of the foreskin to the shaft, just behind and beneath the glans. I've been asked what happens during circumcision, especially adult circumcision, when these veins are cauterised to prevent bleeding. Where, then, does the blood go? If the veins become dead ends, how do they fill up or empty? Good point...

Think of the veins as rivers, collecting tributaries throughout their whole length. They start in the sort of 'marshland' of the glans where, if one mini-stream becomes blocked, there is ample opportunity for the blood to find an alternative course and join the main flow lower down. Gradually, as the veins get nearer and nearer to the base, more and more tributaries join in, and the main vessels become as full as ever.

It's the same with the arteries. They lie deeper in the penile flesh and aren't so easily seen, though you can certainly feel the blood pumping through them when you've got a 'throbbing' hard-on. Here, though, it's a bit more like the delta at the end of a river when it reaches the sea. If you block off one of the tiny channels as the artery branches into a network of arterioles, it doesn't matter much because there are plenty of other arterioles to carry the flow of blood onward to its destination.

So, though several veins and arterioles are closed during circumcision, it isn't really important. There are hoards of other channels through which the blood continues to flow. Anatomists sum it all up in one jargon term which is called “Collateral Circulation”.

(Incidentally – I thought you’d never ask – If the ‘frenulum’ is often incorrectly called the ‘frenum’, then what is correctly called the ‘frenum’? The ‘frenum’ is the fold of tissue which seems to attach your tongue to the floor of your mouth. Both the frenulum and the frenum are similar in their roles as tissue attachments, so don’t worry too much if you confuse the two. Many far more erudite individuals than any of us in Acorn have been making the same mistake for years. The words are derived from the Latin for ‘bridle’)

Ray Hamble

[If any member has a question to ask Ray, just send it in the normal way. I will then print it and Ray will answer in the next edition. — D.A.]

Muslim Children In Norway Circumcised By Barber

An article in a Norwegian newspaper in February, contributed by Acorn’s Oslo correspondent, translated by Tony Acorn.

“I know of several cases of parents going to the barber to have their small boys circumcised without anaesthetic”, says Aslam Ahsan. The leader of the Pakistani Workers Union in Norway is now raising the issue after a Norwegian hospital refused to perform a circumcision, despite a ruling from the Health Directorate that the cost is covered by Social Security.

Circumcision of boys is a very widespread custom among Jews and Muslims. The tradition is over two thousand years old. The Muslim tradition is an operation which usually removes the whole of the foreskin of the penis. The operation is done without anaesthetic. In the religious context, boys who have not been circumcised are considered ‘unclean’. So both Muslim and Jewish believers consider it essential to have the circumcision done.

In Norway it is strictly forbidden to circumcise according to the old religious custom. Any such operation must be done by a doctor under full anaesthetic and in full hygienic conditions. Most hospitals in Norway circumcise newborn boys at the parents request. But not all are equally disposed to this custom. For example, Aslam Ahsan has received several representations from parents who have had their children at the Central Hospital in Akershus.

“I have repeatedly asked for an explanation for why they are unwilling to do the circumcisions there. One explanation I got, from a consultant, was that ‘all the Jews pay for it themselves, and as these are Muslims, they should take on the consequence of this’. The official explanation is lack of funds”, Ahsan told Norpress.

“Now I have found a circular from the Health Directorate in 1976. It says that ‘the cost of circumcision required for religious reasons shall be paid by Social Security’. But the problem is that ‘nobody’ knew about this.” He says that a supplement requires that the hospital arranges an appointment with the doctor, and then Social Security covers the cost.

Meanwhile, are circumcisions being done without anaesthetic in Norway? “It follows that they must be, despite this being illegal in Norwegian law”, says Ahsan.

Nirvana

Passing a record shop recently, I noticed the sleeve of a record by the punk rock group, Nirvana. The album is entitled ‘Never Mind’ (issued in 1991), and the sleeve is illustrated with the picture, taken from well below the water surface, of a toddler (probably several months old) swimming under water towards a fish-hook baited with a dollar bill. What caught my eye was that he was very clearly circumcised, although in a way that left a small roll of skin just behind the corona. Later, in a newsagent, I noticed that the group, and the cover of their album, features on the cover of the magazine Metal Hammer volume 7, No 3, of March 1992.

Tony Acorn

Ladies To The Fore

I am encouraged that women are becoming as caring towards the male genitalia as they are to their own; accepting each part as a feature enhancing the whole. The prepuce is less often considered a loathsome appendage to be sliced away in the interests of hygiene, confidence, and women’s well-being. It is becoming more accepted as an integral part of the penis, a highly responsive membrane, an adornment of pleasure, and a joy to handle. This caring, or sexual empathy, has featured in recent contributions, viz–

Mary taught the youth to prize his foreskin “as an asset of inestimable worth”. Mrs J.M. would “have hated her husband to lose his foreskin”. Ms A.C. knew that her circumcised previous lover “privately lamented his loss”, and rejoiced in her partner’s foreskin.

With the caring comes sharpened comment on the practice of ritual circumcision on religious grounds. I found a sense of revulsion in Ms A.C.’s vivid phrase, “Men nursing erections as they watched a shrieking baby having its foreskin cut away”. Here the (presumably) Jewish ritual is portrayed as kinkily erotic and sadistic, with sexuality sandwiched between prayers, recitations and responses.

In the procedure prior to the actual cutting (Milah), the baby is held securely with its legs bent and flexed outwards, often inducing crying at the restraint. Also, those men participating in the ceremony would all have been circumcised too, the sight of the infant's foreskin being manipulated to erection and stretched, being very stimulating indeed. The excitement of the impending dramatic amputation would also provoke an erection in those present, despite their being circumcised. Later, bleeding, membrane splitting, and glans exposure would be a shared experience, immediately painful to the baby, yet a reminder of what the others had been through at the dawn of life.

There is no doubt that excitement, whether of anticipation, trauma, or violence, is capable of inducing an involuntary erection! At birth for instance, a violent process for the new arrival, most males arrive complete with erections. Similarly at school, those boys ordered forward for the attention of the cane, were prominent at the front. Remember, Ms A.C., sexual excitement may be the most productive reason for an erection, but certainly not the sole cause. Such arousal at a religious ceremony would be tantamount to blasphemy! (How about a response by the necrophiliac at Holy Communion?)

Apart from religious circumcision, the reluctance of the medical profession, and now the caring influence of women, has meant that less than 1% of males are electively circumcised in their early days. (At the Portland Clinic in London, circumcision is offered as an additional service to the parents of all boys born there.) The increasing use of the Plastibell – even in the N.H.S. – has meant that those few circumcised look incredibly neater and less radically shorn. They, I suspect, will be less resentful, as the flaccid state will not indicate an obvious circumcision. When the Plastibell was introduced here, one surgeon lamented that some would appear not to be circumcised, and that the device should be sent back to America.

Anthony – Devon

The Prince Of Wales

The broadcast news of Royal birth,
Rejoicing through the land.
An old tradition has its worth,
Though hard to understand;
Despite changed practices and gory tales,
There'll be no foreskin on the Prince of Wales.

'Tis said that Bertie was the first
To have the scalpel down,
To rid the cause of Onan's curse
And bare a princely crown;
This well-kept secret behind palace rails,
Was circumcising of the Prince of Wales.

The Palace protocol was set.
Then on from infant days,
The newborn Prince would always get
The mohel's measured gaze;
Thus Charles' howling merged with autumn gales,
More circumcising of the Prince of Wales.

A with-it generation here,
New blood of Royal birth.
But nevertheless they've shed a tear,
With skin loss, extra girth;
With one, or two, or three of Royal males,
In blood they all become a prince of wails.

The nursery protocol is clear
For Royalty's new kin.
There'll be no taint of smegma here,
Or ever fore of skin;
For health, and wealth, and hygiene it entails,
The circumcising of the Prince of Wales.

No matter how the fashion slips,
A foreskin's thought obscene.
With only dainty, scar-ringed tips,
To set before the Queen;
Rejoice, for old tradition never fails,
Like circumcising of the Prince of Wales.

Anthony – Devon

[I thought, Anthony, that Princess Diana had brought this tradition to an end. — D.A.]

Book Excerpt

From Roger V. Pavey's The Kindest Cut of All.

It has been advanced that circumcision originates from the discovery among early men that it enhances and increases sexual pleasure.

The argument runs, that the removal of the foreskin results in the hardening of the surface of the glans. This means that the glans, which is the most sensitive part of the penis, is less sensitive overall during intercourse, enabling it to be prolonged. This will result, so the claim goes, in an increase of pleasure of both partners. The male because his orgasm is delayed, and therefore builds up to a higher peak, and the female because her orgasm requires a longer preparation anyway. Both can prolong sexual foreplay, increasing both the tumescence and the intensity of the orgasmic release. The operation of circumcision removes not only the actual foreskin and exposes the glans, but also removes the underlying membrane that adheres to the glans and the surface of the penis. Not only is the glans benefited this way, but even more so the corona and the immediate area behind the glans, and the frenulum. These are the especially significant parts in the male orgasm. The uncircumcised penis has a glans and region surrounding it that is warmer, moister and softer, more membranous, than the situation in the circumcised organ.

The net result of the physiological changes that follow circumcision, therefore, it is argued, is to increase, not only the 'staying power' of the circumcised man in intercourse, but also, as a concomitant of this, the quality of enjoyment. The uncircumcised reaches orgasm faster because of the greater sensitivity of his penis, but actually has a lower level of intensity of pleasure because of the fact, often, his foreskin is not totally retracted, so reducing the contact between vagina and his corona, and the region behind. As the foreskin adheres to the frenulum of the penis, the capacity of that particularly sensitive part of the penis to increase the pleasure of sex is also thereby reduced.

J.H. – Helsinki

[I could pick so many holes in that hypothesis that there would be very little left. But it's a point of view (I hope) so I'll just be like Julius Caesar and say, "Methinks he doth protest too much."

At the same time I must compliment J.H. for his eagle eye in picking out all his snippets of information. — D.A.]

Nearly Jewish

Cock-up is now quite a respectable phrase, and a favourite with well-bred young ladies throughout the land. I prefer the old-fashioned 'balls-up' as being more honest, so you'll forgive me if I say you men do talk a lot of old balls about women's attitude to circumcision – although a lot of old cock would be more appropriate. Men do seem to pontificate about what we think, but those who say the subject never enters our heads are way off beam.

I went to a well-known girls' boarding school in the Midlands. Like me, most of the girls had parents overseas. We used to have long and serious discussions, and if you've ever wondered what teenage girls talk about in the dormitories, I'll tell you: it was sex, and yet more sex. You might be surprised to learn that one of our favourite topics was circumcision.

Some of the girls had fathers or brothers who were circumcised, but not many. Most, like myself, had uncircumcised males in their family, so there was a lot of curiosity shown about the operation. A doctor's daughter set the general opinion by saying that she had heard her father discussing it with her mother and, although he had been done, it had only been for fashionable reasons, and medical opinion was against it. Consequently her brother had been left intact. Some of the girls with circumcised brothers however, stoutly defended the operation, thereby showing that it's not just in boys' schools where the cavalier versus roundhead conflict arises.

Some of the younger teachers were quite happy to discuss sex with the girls, and I remember one bible discussion, where a girl put her hand up and asked what circumcision was, amid giggles from the rest of us. Teacher chose to take the question seriously, and gave us a complete rundown on the Jewish practice. She explained what the operation consisted of, and even drew a 'before' and 'after' sketch of a penis on the board, with a cross-section to show how the foreskin fitted over the glans, and indicating where the cut was made. She explained that the practice had been widespread in this country, but was no longer practised since it was considered to serve no useful purpose.

One episode which sticks in my mind was a trip the classics group made to Italy, led by the same teacher. We were visiting the Naples museum, and in one room came across a remarkable sculpture. It was a beautifully carved life-sized statue of a reclining youth in black marble, so perfect that every tiny detail was totally life-like, and it was amazing to think that it had been carved some two thousand years ago. What made it so remarkable for me was the sly, lecherous grin on his face as he contemplated a plump, real-looking penis draped over his thigh. A particularly noteworthy feature was his extremely well-developed foreskin, which took up a good third of the total penis length, and which folded at an angle over the thigh. It looked so real that the temptation to give it a crafty squeeze was overwhelming.

Teacher saw us staring in admiration at this masterpiece of Roman sculpture, and said with a laugh that she thought she'd find us here. One of the girls remarked that the youth could not have been a Jew. Teacher agreed, and gave us a little lecture on the Roman attitude to Jews, their obsession with bodily perfection and beauty, and their deep distaste for circumcision, with a consequent emphasis on the foreskin. Their eventual adoption of the more sophisticated religion, which had emerged from the hitherto despised Judaism, was therefore all the more surprising. They might not have been so keen if the Jewish covenant had been required of them, though.

At the time, the impression on me of the youth's saucy looking penis was that, although the foreskin looked rather long, it was really cute, and I remembered it in later years when my own sons were born, because they had similarly long foreskins. It occurred to me that it was the equivalent in the male of my own well-developed inner labia, which tend to protrude slightly, and that it was perhaps hereditary.

Although my husband is half-Jewish, there was never any real question of having the boys circumcised. Firstly, the boys were not eligible under the NHS, and secondly, my husband is himself uncircumcised, and is not technically Jewish, so neither he nor my sons were eligible for the Jewish rite, even if he'd wanted it. I was certainly not keen on the idea. The thought of marring the classical perfection of their little bodies did not appeal.

Although my husband is comfortable with his Jewish heritage, he looks upon his foreskin as a sexual asset which he was lucky to retain. He also has no religious inclinations. We were surprised last year when we went to visit his father's relatives in Israel to find that the Israelis themselves tend to play down the religious side, whilst acknowledging it as the cement that binds the nation together. Consequently there was no fuss made about dietary laws and so on, and our Israeli hosts were curious about my sons' foreskins, rather than disapproving. The two girls in the family, in particular, were very attentive at bathtime, and watched with undisguised interest as I slipped each boy's foreskin back.

Finally, I must tell you a little anecdote about our trip to Israel to illustrate an unexpected and little-known spin-off in favour of retaining the foreskin. We went with our Israeli hosts to the Dead Sea for the day, and experienced the astonishing buoyancy of the salt water. I noticed at the time a slight tingle between my nether lips. But when our host's two girls and little boy went in, they immediately leapt out again, crying and clutching themselves between the legs, to the amusement of their parents who knew what to expect. Apparently the exposure of the sensitive tissues of the girls' fannies and the boy's denuded glans to the concentrated minerals in the water stung quite a lot. Meanwhile, my two sons, whose knobs were protected by their foreskins, wondered what all the fuss was about. This reaction was fairly general, since the lads in a German tourist group, who could be expected to be uncircumcised, were completely unaffected, whereas the little girls and all the Jewish boys suffered the same problem.

Although I'm obviously not pro-roundhead, I realise, after reading Forum from time to time, the overpowering urge some men have to get themselves circumcised. As long as they restrict their attentions to their own penises they have my wholehearted support in their quest.

Mrs A.G. – Hammersmith

More Copies

I wonder if other members feel that we should have at least 12 or 13 Acorn newsletters per year. It seems an awful long time to wait for each copy. I would gladly pay a higher subscription fee. Have enclosed the questionnaire, and look forward to reading the findings.

H.J.M. – Mid-Glamorgan

[Thank you H.J. – your eagerness does us proud. The one thing to remember though, is that we could do it only if we received more contributions from the members, which is really what it's all about. The gaps between issues are due severally, to other work, holidays, and, most of all, relations and friends staying for protracted periods, this being a seaside resort. — D.A.]

Questionnaire Replies

The questionnaire circulated with Acorn 2/92 has so far brought 27 replies. Its purpose was to give the Acorn newsletter editorial team a better idea of the interests and wishes of Acorn members. Some replies added more information, and this will be included where appropriate.

In the content of the Acorn newsletter, members wanted:-

More/OK/Less

22	1	1	observations of foreskins/circumcision
19	2	1	foreskin problems/advantages/pleasures
19	3	1	contact with other Acorn members
18	3	1	masturbation techniques
17	1	7	circumcision operations/descriptions/methods
15	4	2	stories beginning "I first found out about foreskins/circumcision when..."
14	3	5	discussion of reasons for/against circumcision
14	4	3	penis size etc.
13	4	3	intercourse – male and/or female aspects
11	3	6	erections/staying power/premature ejaculation
10	4	4	sexual identity (hetero/bi/homosexual)
7	4	7	sexual fantasies

Replies are arranged with the most popular topics at the top.

Other topics mentioned for inclusion were:- photos (but problems of production probably rule this out), technical and slang terms in still more languages, more details of others performing circumcision, genital piercing, pissing techniques, quantities of ejaculate, more female contributions, swapping photos, videos, etc., religious aspects of circumcision.

Whether pleased or sorry about their state, the answers were as follows:-

	Pleased	Sorry	Indifferent
Circumcised	15	5	2
Uncircumcised	2	3

As would be expected, all the sorry and indifferent of the circumcised, were done as babies. All those done by their own choice are pleased.

Age	Size	C/U	At Age	Since	Identification
29	<av	U			JK – Wales
71	6.5"	U			JTD – London
25	6.5"	U			SDG – Stafford
72	7.0"	U			HJM – Mid Glamorgan
45	6.5"	U			AGT – London
	4.8"	C	22		JH – Finland
31	6.1"	C	31	0	JM – Middx
32	5.8"	C	31	1	JA – York
42	7.0"	C	41	1	JBT – Westcliff
42	6.5"	C	41	1	RH – London
69	7.5"	C	58	1	CP – Devizes
58	6.3"	C	44 & 55	3	SW – Gwent
41	6.0"	C	32	9	J – Shropshire
28	7.7"	C	18	10	BH – Suffolk
41	Av	C	26	15	Brian – W. Country
46	7.0"	C	31	15	RJL – Whittlesey
37	7.5"	C	19	18	PH – M. Keynes
54	5.9"	C	33	21	WM – Kingston
53	5.8"	C	26	27	JR – Norfolk
49	6.2"	C	2	47	Anthony – Devon
40	5.3"	C	0		IW – Dorset
52	6.5"	C	0		GP – Perth
58	6.3"	C	0		RH – London
59	7.5"	C	0		RW – Sussex
77	7.0"	C	0		HM – Colchester
81	6.3"	C	0		V – Shropshire
61	6.5"	C	0		Anon – London

Amalgamating these replies with information supplied earlier, details of the 78 members who have renewed or joined this year are as follows:-

36 (47%) are circumcised

12 (14%) are uncircumcised

30 (39%) are not known

Sexual status was asked for, but I haven't included it in the individual columns as I know that at least one member doesn't want this advertised. They are as follows:-

6 are heterosexual

9 are bi-sexual

11 are homo-sexual

Religions were mixed, although there were no Jewish or Muslim members.

The replies to one question was very illuminating. Even though, as can be seen, the variation in erect sizes was as much as 3 inches (from 4.8" to 7.7") almost everyone considered themselves as average. This must go to show that men are not as concerned with their size as has been made out.

For all those who wrote on the backs of their forms information that is worth publishing, this will be done in the next issue. It would be great to hear from all the members who have not returned their questionnaire yet.

D.A.

Maceheads

Thanks for making a stand about "owning a sweet smelling foreskin". It's so reassuring to know that Acorn projects a balanced view.

The claims voiced in two articles, "It Looks Nicer" and "What Nurses Think", lie, that circumcised men develop bigger, bulbous glans – with "a fat head and a thick rim", its large size due to its "being unrestricted by a sleeve of skin" – calls for analysis.

If the claims are true, then all circumcised men will sport this 'macehead' type of penis. I know this to be untrue from observations: several friends, cut as infants, sport small or ordinary glans! The reverse is also true. I've seen and know uncut men who possess 'maceheads' despite being fully hooded. In these cases the heavy fat heads, and thick prominent rims, bulge against the covering foreskin. Perhaps this question could be worked into the penis survey, providing useful information for such an issue.

A.D. – Oxford

[I left this statistic until after this letter. Although the poll is very small it points to there being very little difference between circumcised or not in the glans circumference, both weighing in at around 5.4". — D.A.]

Docking

I was most interested in the letter from H.J.M. of Glamorgan in newsletter issue 1/92.

Like you, I have never seen this subject mentioned before; nor have I had any experience of it. Nevertheless, I have often wondered whether it is possible for a chap with a long loose foreskin to accommodate the bare glans of a circumcised penis.

As one who was unfortunate to be cut soon after birth, I soon realised that any attempt to stimulate the glans itself during masturbation was doomed to failure because it is far too sensitive, and such action only results in either discomfort, or, at orgasm, intense pain, instead of great pleasure.

After my experience of intercourse it became obvious that, with the glans being directly involved, the intensity of orgasm was greatly enhanced without any of the discomfort in masturbation. From then on I started to fantasise, when wanking, that my knob was covered by someone's foreskin, and that we were both going to come together. This is still one of my favourite fantasies.

Unfortunately, I have never had the chance to try out the method, and very much hoped that someone who has will relate his experiences for us.

I am now 'getting on' a bit and erections do not come as readily or as hard as they once did, but the spirit is still very willing!! In recent years I have found that I can obtain a most gratifying orgasm if, when still flaccid, I push my knob right back so that the loose skin of the shaft forms a 'foreskin' over it. If I then 'work' the knob between finger and thumb I come very quickly before any degree of erection has set in, with an orgasm as satisfying and prolonged as is normal in intercourse. I use this method frequently, and should be interested to hear whether others have tried it and, if so, with what results.

With thanks for all the effort that goes into the production of the 'News'.

V. – Shropshire

Saga (Continued)

At public school, the emphasis was now very much on normal sex, a subject big enough to take my attention away from myself, and which also gave me a cleaner feel; this latter being assisted by a very wise series of sex lectures, with their objectivity. One or two boys still retained the kind of mentality which I had virtually now relinquished. In particular, one who pressed me hard one night to agree that I was circumcised. This was the only time my deception backfired on me, and was aided by my honesty. I couldn't agree, and foolishly explained. This seemed to astound him, and excite him also I think, as he said in a dangerously loud, strained voice, "Do you mean to say you keep your foreskin in an unnatural position?" Luckily, this seemed to terminate things, except that sometime the following day he made a threat, partly in jest, to tell his best friend about my foreskin. The percentage of uncircumcised in the public school was somewhat higher, perhaps around 20%

The only other event which interested me was observing a boy who reached puberty very late, about a year after I had gone there. He was one of those who erected uncontrollably in the shower. I was always fascinated to see his tiny member pointing out horizontally. A couple of years later we were drying ourselves alone together and the same happened, but what a difference! Again it went out horizontally, but now it was at least four times as long as before. I just couldn't take my eyes off it. I do not know how much he realised of what was racing through my fevered mind.

For years after this there was nothing to report on, a situation assisted by returning to live permanently with my parents during studies until National Service. Apart, that is, from intense masturbation, normally morning and evening.

Unstimulated, and with the feeling that it was unworthy, my interest in circumcision lay dormant.

My first proper girlfriend, whom I met in Germany, was very warm and passionate, and we loved each other very much, but it was some months before she handled my penis. She had an eight-year-old son, was unmarried, and naturally very cautious about going the whole way. First, I felt a forefinger and thumb squeezing the base, then they travelled up the shaft, and I felt my frenulum being squeezed. In a moment she was masturbating me – I could not believe it! In fact, for some time I continued to believe that we were unique in our discovery!!! Her technique was simply to move the shaft skin back and forward as if I was circumcised, and some time later she answered a question indicating that she believed me to be so, which I found most gratifying. From then on I never wished any female to pull my foreskin forward, and only two ever did, probably, with their intuition, realising my hang-up.

She told me that her doctor had advised her to have her little chap done, describing all the advantages that advocates do, and now she believed it to be the normal thing. Only fifteen years after the fall of Nazism, I found this very interesting. Idly, I wondered what her brother's colleagues (he had been in the Waffen SS) might have thought, but here I am trespassing on a strongly-felt love.

In a way, though, it does seem to help to prove how difficult an average opinion is to evaluate, and how the strongest emotions are evoked, with a loss of objective thought, by reference to circumcision. Mild or neutral reactions to it seem pretty rare.

Gradually, I became something of a 'circumcision bore' (vide a recent Forum article), and over the next few years desired increasing titillation from women's reactions to it – which, more often than not, were not forthcoming. I came almost straight out with this desire the first time I was 'handled' by my next girlfriend. I was foolish enough to say, simply, "Do you reckon I'm circumcised?", to which she laughed, and said. "No." As she was a nurse, I had played my cards rather badly. However, she was a lovely girl, full of fun, and very soon she was masturbating me. Penis out, no fumbling down my trouser front, or shame, and a light gliding with the fingertips, fingers and thumb stretched, along my full length. My favourite method, with the fingers sliding lightly over the loose folds of skin.

(to be continued.)

Contact Corner

A circumcision fetishist and admirer invites correspondence.
Confidentiality guaranteed and expected. All letters answered.

Johannes Holmsten,
Laivurinkatu 39 A 2,
00150 Helsinki 15,
Finland.

ACORN

1992 Issue No 4

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Questionnaire		Page 2
Middle Class Incidence	Anon	Page 7
Wanker Watching	M.W.	Page 8
A Manual of Sexual Plumbing	Dr. Ray	Page 10
Questions for Dr. Ray	Bill	Page 12
Widening Membership	Brian	Page 13
Saga (continued)		Page 15

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Here we are with another newsletter for which everyone is eagerly awaiting, by the remarks in your letters. There's a lot of food for thought in this issue, and I would be grateful to have your thoughts and feelings about the ideas of Brian.

Pride of place this time must go to the questionnaire. — It's us!

D.A.

The Questionnaire

I have 13 more filled-in questionnaires, which now make 38, just over half the members.

The subject preferences now look like this:-

More/OK/Less

30	3	2	observations of foreskins/circumcision
27	4	1	foreskin problems/advantages/pleasures
27	3	1	contact with other Acorn members
25	3	3	masturbation techniques
24	3	7	circumcision operations/descriptions/methods
21	5	4	stories beginning "I first found out about foreskins/circumcision when..."
20	4	7	discussion of reasons for/against circumcision
20	6	5	penis size etc.
16	5	7	intercourse – male and/or female aspects
15	4	9	erections/staying power/premature ejaculation
12	4	10	sexual identity (hetero/bi/homosexual)
9	4	12	sexual fantasies

Replies are arranged with the most popular topics at the top. Other topics of interest were so numerous that it would be best to say that any subject regarding the genitals is of interest to someone. Maybe if I nominate a subject for the next issue each time I might be deluged with thoughts, opinions and experiences for the ensuing issue. Right – it's Cockrings for the first one.

What has surprised me is the number who would like more contacts. There has always been space available, and those who have advertised have been very pleased and surprised with the response.

The total of pleased and sorry about their current status is as follows:-

	Pleased	Sorry	Indifferent
Circumcised	21	5	2
Uncircumcised	7	4	1

Age	Size	C/U	At Age	Since	Identification
26	6.8"	U			GL – Leeds
45	6.3"	U			AD – Oxford
62	7.0"	U			RGB – Leeds
45	4.0"	U			HC – London
48	5.0"	U			Anon
35	6 0"	U			Anon – Norwich
54	7.0"	U			DA – WsM
66	7.5"	C	43	23	AW – Sussex
32	7.0"	C	0	32	NA – London
53	6.0"	C	39	14	GL – Germany
48	6.0"	C	31	17	PD – Dublin
49	4.8"	C	20	29	JW – France
34	6.0"	C	24	10	JGC – Lancs

I'll leave all the other statistics until I get some more (I hope) replies, but, as promised, we'll now look at the extra bits and comments which came with the completed sheets. I'm sure most members will find them of most interest.

John – Wales.

I am actively looking for a surgeon, mohel, etc. who is prepared to circumcise me. This is for several reasons. Both my partner and I think foreskins are ugly and unhygienic; we are naturists and hence this appendage is frequently 'on view' and should therefore look its best. My partner prefers a naked glans for intercourse (when I have managed to keep mine back I find it's nicer too). My partner's two sons are circumcised (at birth, like their father), and she wants a 'set'. My two closest friends from school were circumcised, and I always admired the 'cut' penis.

[When you find your surgeon, John, don't forget my request to be able to film a circumcision. — D.A.]

J.M. – Middx.

Mr. Hasan (S.A.S.) circumcised me last October. I had a very short, very loose foreskin which I had kept retracted for about 16 years, before electing to be cut. The scar line is uneven and is about  $\frac{1}{4}$ " to  $\frac{1}{2}$ " from the glans rim. I am very pleased about this because I at last have achieved my aim.

J.A. – York.

I was circumcised last year at the S.A.S. My foreskin was extremely tight, and impossible to retract. The scar line is uneven and is right at the glans rim. I am sorry about being circumcised as I think I would get greater pleasure from sex and masturbation if I had a retractable foreskin.

J.B.T. – Westcliff

I was circumcised last year from personal choice. The scar line is uneven and is about 2" from the glans rim on top, and about 3" at the frenulum. I am pleased about being circumcised because it's cleaner, looks better, and enhances my sexual enjoyment. I am also 'different' from the average British male, with the scar to prove it. I enjoy the continual titillation the bare exposed glans receives from clothing etc.

S.W. – Gwent

Before being circumcised my foreskin was easy to retract, slack at the end and as long as my glans. I had trained it to remain retracted at all times for 12 years. I was circumcised at 44 (see Acorn B) and had a revision at 55 (see Acorn U). The scar line is  $\frac{3}{8}$ " on the top and right hand side and  $\frac{5}{8}$ " on the left hand side, from the glans rim. I am pleased about being circumcised since being introduced to the difference at the age of 9 on going to prep. school, where in 1942 80% were roundheads but by 1947 it had dropped to 60%. My father was uncircumcised but kept his foreskin retracted, so I always thought he was a roundhead. But just before he died I saw it forward for the first time, and it covered about 60% of his glans.

J. – Shropshire

I was circumcised by Dr. Newell from personal choice. The scar line is uneven and about  $\frac{1}{2}$ " from the glans rim. To me it looks and feels better, but would have preferred a tighter result and removal of frenulum.

B.H. – Suffolk

I was circumcised at the S.A.S., from choice, and I am pleased because I've wanted it done since I was 12.

[I think you're the most modest one, B.H. Look at the sizes in all the charts and proudly put yourself from 'average' to 'well-endowed'. — D.A.]

W.M. – Kingston

I was circumcised by a hospital surgeon because of a long foreskin coupled with some phimosis and balanitis. I am pleased because the troubles I had have now vanished, I now have considerably longer staying powers, and improved oral sex. Thank you for all the very good and interesting newsletters.

J.R. – Norfolk

I was circumcised in the local cottage hospital as an in-patient for 48 hours, under general anaesthetic, to remove my excessive long and loose foreskin. I am pleased because it was a nuisance. I have subsequently had better sex, but would prefer to have had the inner skin and frenulum removed.

V. – Shropshire

I was circumcised as a baby and the scar line is undetectable. I am sorry about being circumcised because I have always assumed that masturbating with a foreskin over the glans should give a far superior orgasm.

In general I consider the newsletter is very well balanced. I have answered the questions, as you would expect, from my personal viewpoint, perhaps stressing some subjects rather more than the coverage they are given at the moment. I realise of course that you are limited by the amount of contributions coming in.

I have classified myself as bi-sexual – I would rather call myself just 'sexual', in that all my life I have been intensely curious about all aspects of sex, but have had very few homosexual contacts. Most of these have been of a purely exploratory nature and, unfortunately, have not included anyone who was not circumcised, so that my practical knowledge of foreskins and 'how they work' has been by what I've read.

Anthony – Devon

I was circumcised as a baby by a surgeon, assisted by my grandmother, when paraphimosis was discovered whilst my parents were at the cinema. I am sorry about being circumcised because it was poorly done with too much skin being removed. I also have feelings of incompleteness and mutilation compared with the majority who are left intact.

Anon – London

I was circumcised as an infant. The scar line is about 1" from the glans rim, with the frenulum and a considerable flap of loose skin still attached underneath. I am sorry about being circumcised because it was a gross invasion of one's rights and unnatural. A foreskin is there for a purpose, and I would not have been circumcised by choice. My father and brothers were all circumcised as well, my father being born in 1896.

R.W. – Suffolk

I was circumcised at birth, by our family doctor at home. I am sorry about being circumcised because I was offered no choice. My father was uncircumcised.

G.P. – Perth

I was circumcised at birth, in Africa, where circumcision was routine. I am pleased about being circumcised because I have never had any health problems with my penis. My father was circumcised as well.

R.H. – Cardiff

I was circumcised at birth by my G.P. – but he could equally well have been the local butcher. I am indifferent about being circumcised because I've never known anything else, and it doesn't worry me personally. I prefer circumcised sex partners. My father was circumcised as well.

A.G.T. – London

My foreskin is easy to retract, slack at the end, and as long as my glans. I am sorry about not being circumcised because I think it looks sexier and is total nudity. The uncircumcised penis looks less mature. My father was uncircumcised.

J.T.D. – London

My foreskin is easy to retract, slack at the end, and longer than my glans. I am pleased about being uncircumcised because the most erogenous zone is in the foreskin, especially before first retraction in foreplay, etc. My father was circumcised.

G.L. – Leeds

My foreskin is easy to retract, slack at the end, and longer than my glans. I am pleased about being uncircumcised because my options are still open.

A.W. – Sussex

I circumcised myself when I was 43 and then had it done professionally 5 years later by Dr. Newell. I am pleased about being circumcised because I think it is hygienic, healthy, and comfortable. My father was circumcised but my brother wasn't.

N.A. – London

I was circumcised soon after birth, a routine hospital circumcision by the family doctor in South Africa. The scar is about  $1\frac{1}{2}$ " behind the glans rim. I am pleased about being circumcised because I like the look of my penis. It also makes me look different from uncircumcised men. Foreskins, in my opinion, smell, no matter how much you wash. My father is uncircumcised, my brother is circumcised, and I have cousins both cut and uncut.

G.L. – Germany

My foreskin was hard to retract, slack at the end, and much longer than my glans. After suffering from phimosis I was circumcised by Dr. Eyre of Boston, Mass. I will send a full report in the future, but cannot at present due to health problems (of another nature).

P.D. – Dublin

I circumcised myself when I was 31, tightened it when I was 34, and retightened it when I was 41. The scar line is now 0.5 cm from the rim. All my family were uncircumcised.

[Could we possibly have an account of how you achieved these? — D.A.]

J.W. – France

I was circumcised in New York at the age of 20 by a Jewish doctor. The reasons were as follows:-

1. I had always envied circumcised boys since I first discovered the difference. Nobody suggested that I be done and I was too shy to bring up the subject with an adult.
2. I had bouts of balanitis at least twice a year.
3. My foreskin was uncomfortably tight, but this was ignored by parents/family doctor/school doctor – don't ask me why.
4. I discovered that satisfactory sex was impossible due to loss of erection caused by pain, and often premature ejaculation. An older girlfriend suggested that I be done, and I plucked up the courage and did. Sex has been marvellous since, with none of the above problems. Also I feel better about myself. Getting 'done' was probably the best decision of my life. All my family were uncircumcised.

J.G.C. – Lancashire

I was circumcised at the age of 24 due to a torn frenulum. The doctor recommended that I either had my frenulum removed or be circumcised. I was in favour of circumcision. Until I was circumcised my foreskin was easy to retract when flaccid, with a 1" overhang, but never retracted on erection. I am pleased about being circumcised as I had wanted the op. for about 10 years but was not prepared to pay. Intercourse is much more satisfying. My father was circumcised as an adult. My father-in-law was circumcised at birth. My brother-in-law and his son were both circumcised at 8 due to tight foreskins preventing urination.

Middle Class Incidence

As a gloss on the article 'Incidence by Age' in Acorn 2/92, out of 60 boys in my year at school (a boys' grammar school in Norfolk), who would have been born in 1955/6, I can only remember 7 being circumcised – only one of those, as far as I know, for medical reasons, and one other with an American father. (There were ample opportunities for inspection in showers, with P.E. twice a week, and games once). This is extremely low in comparison with the 50% estimated in the article. I know that we regarded it as being more the exception than the rule, though there was no kind of 'status' attached to the one state or the other. I wonder if regional variations are of any significance? Or is it class based, as other articles seem to suggest? The intake of my school was across the complete 'middle-class' spectrum.

Anon

Wanker Watching

Until I was about thirteen I used to think that 'cunt' was just a rude word. Then the full significance was brought home to me in a moment of revelation one afternoon in the old barn behind our farmhouse. Sure, in the rude games we played as unsupervised kids in a farming community, I'd seen any amount of bald, unremarkable little creases between the de-knickered thighs of my sisters and their friends when we used to compare parts.

But this was in a different league: an impressive bulge of flesh, shaded but not concealed by a bush of dense curly hair, throwing into relief the exciting and mysterious fat-lipped vertical slot which bisected it from below, and the whole exciting thing framed between a pair of white, swelling thighs. If you think about it, this has to represent the most exciting vision a young lad can hope to see: such sights I'm sure inspired enterprising Englishmen to go out and found an empire, and I'm confident that Troy wouldn't have been sacked if Helen hadn't flashed her twatty at Paris. Then there are chaps like Drake and Raleigh for example. Can you picture the scene: Drake, on spotting the armada in the distance – "Piss off, you foreigners. I've got H.M.'s royal pussy on my mind." I have to ask myself, do women really appreciate how much power for good or evil is packed into the secret area between their thighs?

The occasion for this divine revelation was the start of an exciting episode in my life and one when I first appreciated the possibilities of wanking as a spectator sport. What happened was that two older girls of fourteen or fifteen had managed to get hold of a jar of scrumpy and reluctantly agreed to let a group of us boys share it with them in the barn. We all got pleasantly giggly and, as so many girls have found to their cost, drink tends to loosen the grip on the knickers as well as the tongue, and the subject inevitably turned to sex. This took the form of a desire on the girls' part to see how big our willies were. Firstly, they ordered a 'short-arm' inspection so they could see who was 'top gun'. As we boys were all about twelve or thirteen and had just embarked on puberty, they were pleasantly surprised to see several near-adult-sized plonkers.

Now these two young ladies had a name for being a saucy pair and, on realising that our cocks showed more promise than they had expected, decided that we should have a 'wanking competition'. In this, the girls took it in turn to give a vigorous massage to a penis until he came, while the other timed the operation. The lad to achieve the shortest time was the winner. The one who spurted furthest got a mention in dispatches.

The trouble was, despite the uproariously giggly and 'rude' feeling we all experienced, we were still a mite bashful in front of these bigger girls, who normally wouldn't have had anything to do with us, and only one of us managed a hard-on (me!) The girls realised we needed some inspiration so one of them stepped out of her drawers, wound her skirts up round her waist, and instructed us all to come forward and inspect the goods whilst the other tested our reaction with her hand. Thus came the divine revelation of a near adult fanny in all its glory, and the realisation that life had more to offer than liquorice allsorts.

As soon as we were all in a suitably responsive state the competition began. I was last in the queue and watched with fascination the different skills employed by these two young ladies in their task. One used only the tip of her forefinger and thumb to move the skin rapidly to and fro over the knob, whilst the other employed the more traditional fist to pull the prick from its base to its tip, every fourth stroke pulling hard back to reveal part or all of the knob, looking like a freshly peeled beetroot. For some reason, both girls took the precaution of pulling the foreskin right back when the crisis arrived and elevating the winkle to maximum elevation to get the best range: both evidently had plenty of experience in playing this gripping game.

I was a bit concerned when it was my turn because, although like most boys of my age I had learned the art of wanking with joyful spontaneity, I had always chickened out of making myself come for fear of swooning in the fit of trembling and faintness which overcame me as it started. This time I wasn't given the option. In no time at all it was my turn, and I watched with excited disbelief as the young lady grabbed my rigid plonk and started rapidly working the skin up and down. In no time at all the overwhelming, trembly feeling started. Then I gasped as my hips jerked forward, my knees gave way, and the girl expertly pulled my skin right back and made my offering spurt across the barn, leaving me with a sticky dicky and drained of all emotion.

The girls apparently enjoyed the competition as much as we did, and a few days later we were marched into the barn for a re-run. The trouble was, word got out, and some of the boys' sisters came along too, and despite broad hints that they should leave, insisted on watching.

So it was that wanking became a spectator sport and remained at the top of the popularity stakes until some wretch told his mum, whereupon the barn was put out of bounds. But where there's a will there's a way, and it wasn't long before we found another venue. But that's another story...

Sorry we can't oblige the roundhead fans among you – roundheads were a bit thin on the ground where I used to live!

M.W. – London

A Manual Of Sexual Plumbing

By Dr. Ray Hamble

When I get into my car I turn on the ignition and the engine bursts into life. If it doesn't I leave it to the nice man from the A.A. to sort it out. He knows far more than I do about what goes on under the bonnet.

I suspect that many of us, who have had a wank in front of a mirror, have a similar superficial understanding of what happens when we 'turn on', but aren't too sure of what's going on inside. So, at the risk of being a yawn-a-minute bore to those who are in the know, I thought a few words of explanation might be appreciated by those who are not.

First of all, the penis. It's like a sponge contained in a tight wrapping which limits the extent to which it can expand when the holes in the sponge get engorged with blood during sexual excitement. The blood forced into it under pressure makes it get really hard, but when the blood flows out again it becomes soft as the spaces empty.

The tube along the length of the shaft is called the urethra. It's the 'river' carrying the urine from the bladder to the outside, but only flows when the ring of muscles which hold back the contents of the bladder open like a sluice gate. These muscles are called 'voluntary muscles', and we have control over them when we want to have a pee. These are not the same as the 'involuntary muscles' built into the lining of the various tubules within the reproductive system, which contract more or less without any voluntary control during orgasm in order to spurt out the semen.

So where does the spunk (semen) come from? Draining into the urethral river are several tributaries. Of particular importance are the two tubes, vasa deferentia, which bring the thick gooey jelly of sperm cells from the testicles where they are manufactured. This jelly is making its sluggish progress day and night along the vasa, like molten lava from a volcano, because the testicles have a non-stop production line. They don't just work when you're having an orgasm. The jelly is stored in two small reservoir sacs, one at the end of each vas deferens, called the seminal vesicles. There it is kept in readiness to be squirted out at orgasm or, alternatively, if you never cum, the excess build-up is simply reabsorbed. This is nature's way of stock rotation to ensure a constant supply of fresh sperm jelly.

"But spunk isn't jelly," I hear you say. True enough, it's not. You may occasionally see one or two yellowish lumps which haven't quite dissolved, but usually it's that magical opalescent double cream – a joy to the eye, the nose and the palate. It acquires its liquid status as a result of a gland called the prostate gland. This structure, about the size of a walnut, straddles the urethra just below the neck of the bladder and that ring of voluntary muscles which I've mentioned. It becomes noticeably bigger during sexual arousal, when it becomes engorged with the fluid which it produces. It usually makes just over half a teaspoonful of this fluid, which mixes with the sperm jelly, thus producing spunk as we know it.

If you stop to think about it, we only produce about that much semen anyway, so where has all the jelly gone? That's the whole point. The jelly is so concentrated that it only forms about 5% of the total ejaculate. The other 95% is just prostatic fluid in which the sperm cells (spermatozoa) become active and swim about. There can be anything up to 300 million spermatozoa in a single ejaculation, and it's quite difficult to realise just how incredibly small each one is. Yet, under the microscope, it can be seen as a busy wriggling 'tadpole' with a head, a body, and a very wavy tail.

When a guy is sterilised by having a vasectomy (ie: having the vas deferens cut and tied on both sides), although the flow of sperm jelly is halted, the prostate still pours out its fluid, and the individual is totally unaware of the minute reduction of just 5% of his total ejaculate volume.

On the other hand, when someone has his prostate removed, the main source of liquid is taken away, and so the spunk volume at orgasm is virtually nil.

So why should someone need to have his prostate removed? Occasionally it's because the gland becomes cancerous, and cancers can kill. However, it is common for the prostate to get bigger as age advances beyond about 50. This so-called 'benign enlargement' is nothing more than a peculiar quirk of nature as part of the ageing process, but it has its problems. As it gets bigger it may begin to squash the urethra, causing a damming back of the urinary flow. The affected individual might have difficulty in starting to pass water so he hangs his cock out in the loo for far longer than usual (and risks getting arrested for cottaging while so doing!) Then, when the flow starts it is weak and slow. Afterwards he drips for several minutes and may wet his pants if he puts his willy away too soon. Because his bladder doesn't empty properly he may feel the urge to pass urine more frequently, especially at night. Sometimes an acute emergency arises when the urine flow stops completely. It may be necessary to pass a catheter, a long stiff-walled rubber tube, along the urethra to empty the bladder. In days gone by, when all surgical operations were much more hazardous than they are now, old men with prostate problems used to carry their own catheters, traditionally under the band around their hats.

When I was a student about 35 years ago, the common operation to remove the prostate involved a lengthy horizontal cut in the lower abdomen, followed by much groping around inside to push the bladder out of the way and to shell out the prostate gland. It was a very bloody and messy procedure. Nowadays the gland is more commonly removed through the urethra. An instrument called a cystoscope – like a hollow telescope with a light at the end – is passed along the urethra from the tip of the penis, under anaesthesia. The enlarged prostate gland can be seen inside, and miniature long-handled scissors can be eased along the cystoscope to snip away the prostate. The bits of tissue can then be flushed away along the tube to the outside. It's a much cleaner technique than the older method, but it still usually leaves the patient unable to ejaculate spunk thereafter. At the best, if some prostate tissue remains, a small amount of spunk may still be produced. Of course, it may take a few weeks for things to settle down after the op., but eventually all the enjoyment of masturbation or intercourse to orgasm is restored – with the advantage that there isn't any mess.

Ducts from a couple of other small glands also flow into the urethra. These are the so-called Cowper's Glands. They are more active in some people than others and, at times of sexual arousal, are responsible for that sticky, clear fluid we've got to know as 'pre-cum juices'. The liquid drips merrily from many a cock as it becomes progressively excited in preparation for orgasm. The liquid is designed as a lubricant to assist in moistening the vagina, thus enabling the to-ing and fro-ing of sexual thrusting to proceed to its smooth and presumably enjoyable conclusion.

"Conclusion" is a good reminder word to warn me that I've probably rambled on for far too long. On some future occasion I'd like to talk more about the mechanics of sexual arousal and orgasm, and about the nerves and hormones involved. I'd like too, to explore one or two ways of heightening the pleasures of the orgasmic experience. But that depends on whether the Editor will let me.

Ray Hamble

[He will, and thank you. — D.A.]

Questions For Doctor Ray

I have three questions for Ray.

1. Peyronie's Disease. What is the cause and the cure?
2. When the penis becomes erect, it fills with blood. Where does this blood come from, and are there blood vessels adapted to inject blood into the penis?
3. What is the origin and composition of smegma? Some men seem to generate much more than others. What is the reason for this?

Bill – Kingston

Widening Membership

Some questions I feel need answering for all members of Acorn:-

1. How many subscribers are there currently, and how many have there been in total since the inception of Acorn?
2. Do we have any idea why people come and go as subscribers?
3. What proportion of subscribers contribute?
4. Is Acorn informative enough? – Is there sufficient information about the different methods of circumcision and the differing results, and is there enough information about where one can obtain a circumcision?
5. Is Acorn known about?

I see the purpose of Acorn as two-fold. Firstly, to provide the medium for all of us interested in the penis, foreskins and circumcision, to openly discuss our views with those similarly interested. Secondly, I see Acorn as providing information for those wanting a circumcision, regarding method, result, and operator.

When I was circumcised at my request in 1976, Forum gave me the name and address of the late Dr. Ossie Gibson, but I knew little then in regard to the differing methods and possible results. I have no regrets but feel it would be better if more information was readily available.

I don't feel enough is being done by Acorn to help those wanting a circumcision for themselves or their children. An advert should be appearing every couple of issues in Forum, advising of Acorn's existence. Maybe we should have a broadsheet explaining that if people join Acorn they will get:-

1. Information on different methods and results.
2. Information on operators. viz, names and addresses.
3. The opportunity to voice their worries.
4. The opportunity to inspect the finished article. I'm sure many of us would be ready to show off.
5. The opportunity to seek comments on their views.

Secondly, I don't feel there is nearly enough information on where circumcisions are available. Yes, there is the S.A.S. and Dr. Mason, and there is Dr. Sifman, but has anyone seen any results on either adults or children? Dr. Gibson I've already mentioned is no longer with us and Dr. Newell I believe has retired. There must be others. Why not ask all members to advise who circumcised them, give details if known of method, and was it a baby, child, or adult circumcision. There must be some operators away from Leeds, but who knows of them?

Articles appear from time to time in the newspapers. Do we reply to the authors/editors, and what about starting some discussion on the matter via letters columns? What about personal ads. in The Times? We need to be much more positive about our existence – no, I'm not advocating that we should be persuading everyone to get themselves circumcised, but there is so little information readily available, and our existence could be so much more worthwhile.

What about setting a target of doubling membership by the end of 1992? We could all help here – with a broadsheet available we could all probably suggest a couple of names with addresses of those who might be interested in joining, and the broadsheet could be sent to them without any of us giving up our anonymity if it is important to us.

I'll lay odds that we all know at least two or three people who have been circumcised. What about sending out to them asking for information about when and where they were done, explaining our aim of making information regarding circumcision more readily available? We could invite them to join Acorn, but if they only give the circumciser's name and address our base will be widened for the benefit of others. We could ask for year of circumcision, name and address of operator and details of how they came to approach that particular doctor if it was not done on medical advice.

I feel very strongly that we need to widen our base. What do other members of Acorn think? Let's have some views and then some action. I'd certainly be prepared to help in widening our base, increasing membership, and assisting with the increased work load that would inevitably result. We cannot afford to sit still.

Could we all contribute a little more?

I did ask, quite a few issues ago, about frenulum removal. Not everyone's cup of tea I'll admit, but why not add to the data being collated for those circumcised, 'frenulum removed – yes or no'.

As far as I'm concerned, I've now removed my frenulum myself, using American locking forceps, with a fair amount of waspeze as anaesthetic. I'll happily answer any questions about this, and would be also more than happy to discuss the subject of circumcision with anyone (particularly those contemplating changing allegiance from 'cavalier' to 'roundhead') with or without a viewing. Anyone interested please write to:-

Brian Of The West Country
c/o Acorn

Saga (continued)

At public school, the emphasis was now very much on normal sex, a subject big enough to take my attention away from myself, and which also gave me a cleaner feel; this latter being assisted by a very wise series of sex lectures, with their objectivity. One or two boys still retained the kind of mentality which I had virtually now relinquished. In particular, one who pressed me hard one night to agree that I was circumcised. This was the only time my deception backfired on me, and was aided by my honesty. I couldn't agree, and foolishly explained. This seemed to astound him, and excite him also I think, as he said in a dangerously loud, strained voice, "Do you mean to say you keep your foreskin in an unnatural position?" Luckily, this seemed to terminate things, except that sometime the following day he made a threat, partly in jest, to tell his best friend about my foreskin. The percentage of uncircumcised in the public school was somewhat higher, perhaps around 20%.

The only other event which interested me was observing a boy who reached puberty very late, about a year after I had gone there. He was one of those who erected uncontrollably in the shower. I was always fascinated to see his tiny member pointing out horizontally. A couple of years later we were drying ourselves alone together and the same happened, but what a difference! Again it went out horizontally, but now it was at least four times as long as before. I just couldn't take my eyes off it. I do not know how much he realised of what was racing through my fevered mind.

For years after this there was nothing to report on, a situation assisted by returning to live permanently with my parents during studies until National Service. Apart, that is, from intense masturbation, normally morning and evening.

Unstimulated, and with the feeling that it was unworthy, my interest in circumcision lay dormant.

My first proper girlfriend, whom I met in Germany, was very warm and passionate, and we loved each other very much, but it was some months before she handled my penis. She had an eight-year-old son, was unmarried, and naturally very cautious about going the whole way. First, I felt a forefinger and thumb squeezing the base, then they travelled up the shaft, and I felt my frenulum being squeezed. In a moment she was masturbating me – I could not believe it! In fact, for some time I continued to believe that we were unique in our discovery!!! Her technique was simply to move the shaft skin back and forward as if I was circumcised, and some time later she answered a question indicating that she believed me to be so, which I found most gratifying. From then on I never wished any female to pull my foreskin forward, and only two ever did, probably, with their intuition, realising my hang-up.

She told me that her doctor had advised her to have her little chap done, describing all the advantages that advocates do, and now she believed it to be the normal thing. Only fifteen years after the fall of Nazism, I found this very interesting. Idly, I wondered what her brother's colleagues (he had been in the Waffen SS) might have thought, but here I am trespassing on a strongly-felt love.

In a way, though, it does seem to help to prove how difficult an average opinion is to evaluate, and how the strongest emotions are evoked, with a loss of objective thought, by reference to circumcision. Mild or neutral reactions to it seem pretty rare.

Gradually, I became something of a 'circumcision bore' (vide a recent Forum article), and over the next few years desired increasing titillation from women's reactions to it – which, more often than not, were not forthcoming. I came almost straight out with this desire the first time I was 'handled' by my next girlfriend. I was foolish enough to say, simply, "Do you reckon I'm circumcised?", to which she laughed, and said. "No." As she was a nurse, I had played my cards rather badly. However, she was a lovely girl, full of fun, and very soon she was masturbating me. Penis out, no fumbling down my trouser front, or shame, and a light gliding with the fingertips, fingers and thumb stretched, along my full length. My favourite method, with the fingers sliding lightly over the loose folds of skin and corona, just as if circumcised.

Of course, I questioned her about how circumcision was done, as I was always to be interested in this. All she would say was that a cut was made, the outer layer was peeled back, followed by the inner, the stitches then going in, "And then it stays back." I found the last sentence, especially from a female, incredibly exciting. She pretty clearly liked penises. On circumcision, I asked her about my pet fear, which was loss of the gorgeous sensitive area by the frenulum end, but she had nothing to contribute. Once only, when I was in bed with 'flu, she came in and, after chatting about something, suddenly reached over and pulled apart the front of my pyjamas. "I must see this very sensitive part," she said, "it fascinates me, honestly." I have never felt so naked, goggling down at my erection, which had burst into view so unexpectedly. I pointed out the spot, unable to say a word, and that was that.

(to be continued)

ACORN

1992 Issue No 5

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Dr. Ray's Answers	R.H.	Page 2
I Wish	R.W.	Page 3
Influences	D.A.	Page 6
American Attitudes	M.B.	Page 7
Silly Statistics	R.H.	Page 8
Watch the Oiseau	R.S.	Page 9
Squirrelling	G.L.	Page 10
Cuttings	J.H.	Page 12
Comments Re Issue 3/92	J.R.	Page 13
Saga (continued)		Page 14
Joke	R.H.	Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

When going through the material that's waiting to be published, I always try to picture the finished issue so that I can get as good a balance as possible of the different subjects and of course the pros and cons. At times this is very difficult, as at the moment, when nearly all the material is pro foreskins, whereas about a year ago it was all pro circumcision.

I know it is difficult for the circumcisionists to air their views without reiterating about smells, cancer and AIDS, and we have only room for one item of the operation at a time because they are, of necessity, always long.

So I have tried to think of subjects for members to think about and, although the response is generally poor, I'll try another one with this question:-

If you were forced to have the opposite of what you have now, and you could take your pick, what sort of finished product would you want? There are many types of foreskins to choose from and many types of circumcisions.

It's only fair for me to start the ball rolling. As I am always between 4" and 5" when flaccid, it would be quite easy to have my choice, which would be a radical sleeve resection, leaving me with my inner foreskin but losing my shaft skin. This I hope would leave no bunching up in the sulcus, but with a smooth unwrinkled, denuded penis. I'm not too sure whether I could bear to part with my frenulum though. This type of circumcision, I know, would be of little use if I shrunk right up when soft.

Now let's hear some other choices.

D.A.

Ray Hamble Answers Bill From Kingston

Hi Bill!

You asked me about Peyronie's Disease, and also where the blood comes from to fill the penis on erection. Obviously you believe in the magic of threesomes because, for good measure, you also want me to tell you something about smegma.

OK... here we go. A long time ago a guy called Peyronie described changes in the spongy tissue of the penis, usually in middle age and later, whereby bands of non-elastic fibrous tissue are formed, and interfere with the ability of the 'sponge' to fill up properly on erection. Sometimes the start of the problem can be traced to an injury, but more often the cause simply isn't known. If only one side of the shaft is affected then only one side doesn't erect properly. The unaffected side stiffens in the normal way, and so the shaft develops an acute bend to one side or the other when it gets a hard on. If both sides are affected, then the extent to which the ability to achieve an erection depends upon the extent to which the fibrous tissue has developed. The condition tends to be progressive, and in extreme cases the ability to get a 'stiffy' is permanently lost.

Treatment by injecting substances known as fibrolycins, in the hope of dissolving the fibrous tissue, isn't all that effective, but the surgical removal of the offending fibres is a possibility when the damage isn't too severe. The penis may be a bit shorter afterwards because of the tissue removed.

On the matter of blood supply, there are two main 'Dorsal Arteries' to the penis, and two other arteries, one in each of the so-called 'Corpora Cavernosa'. These are the two main envelopes of spongy tissue, one on each side of the shaft. There are also various other smaller vessels. There's plenty of blood circulating in the human body, and a little extra finding its way into the penis during erection doesn't effectively deprive organs elsewhere. Upon sexual arousal the penile arteries simply dilate (become wider) so that more blood flows into them. Blood isn't actually forced into them beyond the normal pumping blood pressure of the heart, though this does tend to rise as orgasm approaches, and then the penis often becomes extra stiff just before ejaculation.

Smegma is a clear lubricating fluid which is produced by glands lying in the skin on the inside of the foreskin. Its purpose is to enable the foreskin to slip freely to and fro over the glans. Just as some people sweat more than others so some men make more smegma than others. One particular kind of bacterium, called the smegma bacillus, has adapted itself over thousands of years to grow very easily in human smegma, and it is colonies of these bacteria which often cause smegma to take on a white, cheesy, unpleasant tasting, and smelly state. I hope you aren't really interested in a detailed chemical analysis of the composition of smegma, because I'd have to look it up in my recipe book – and that's lost somewhere up in my attic.

Dr. Ray Hamble

I Wish

As one who is interested in the circumcision scene I can see the general attraction of Acorn's message, but what really surprises me is the number of guys who hanker after circumcision. Envy has to be a root cause of such a yearning, but how strange for people to yearn for something that others haven't got, rather than something they have. The boot's always been on the other foot for me. I'd have loved to have a foreskin, and felt pretty hard done by at being deprived of my own.

The first time I realised the full significance of circumcision was as a boy at school, when I was privileged to witness an uncircumcised boy being masturbated to orgasm by his sister. He had discovered he could come and was showing off to a group of us smaller boys. His sister, who was a precocious young lady with a lively interest in all things penile and sexual, had insisted on doing the honours for him. I was amazed as she manipulated the long skin tube which covered his swollen penis head, sliding it vigorously up and down his shaft so that it was alternately concertina'd down at the root or stretched forward in a handful of loose skin beyond the tip like a half removed sock. The girl bent to her task with enthusiasm, her concentration showing in her frown and protruding tongue tip. In a matter of minutes the boy reached his crisis, whereupon the girl pulled hard back on his skin to reveal his raw-looking, moist knob, and three gouts of thick white sperm shot from the tip, spattering the girl's dress, to her annoyance and our amusement. The realisation of how different this boy's prick was from mine, and the luxury of that long, elegant foreskin, made me acutely aware of how cruelly my penis had been altered.

Consequently I had problems coming to terms with my sex drive when the time came for me to start exercising my love muscle, and I missed out on a lot of fun in comparison with my fully equipped friends. You do get over these things to a certain extent with the passage of time, but there's often something which happens to bring back your fears and worries, particularly when you realise that in the Britain of today the circumcised man is very much the odd man out.

Such an occasion occurred a couple of summers ago when I was on holiday on the windswept east coast. I found myself on an isolated sand dune near a bustling camp site, and was settling down to a quiet sunbathe, when I heard voices approaching, and half a dozen kids in swimsuits came into the secluded sandy hollow about eight feet below me. They were all boys of about twelve years old except for one girl who was a couple of years older. They had no idea I was there, whilst I had a clear and close-up view of them through the tufts of coarse grass. Feeling a bit disgruntled at having my peaceful afternoon disturbed, I tried to ignore them. No chance! Because suddenly the girl exerted her authority of her extra year or two and, summoning all the boys into a line, she expressed her wish to see who had the most ball hairs. There was a lot of nervous giggling from the boys, but no action until she taunted them with being scared. That did it. They all pulled their pants down to their ankles, exposing a variety of cocks from the tiny to the impressive. The girl watched keenly, and then went along the line inspecting each one in turn. They were all facing my dune so I got a grandstand view as she lifted each cock up to see how big his balls were and how much hair he'd got. Needless to say, all of them were uncircumcised, and most still had the long pointed foreskin of childhood. Only one of the boys had much in the way of pubic hair though, and our young lady pulled their legs about it. Until the bigger boy demanded to know if she could do better, that is. Whereupon the little miss, totally unruffled, pulled down her own swimsuit and stood before them all, displaying a small but well-haired pubic patch, which shaded rather than concealed her vulval split. The tiny but well-formed breasts bore witness to the fact that she still had some way to go before reaching womanhood.

Having got into such a state of exposure, they weren't about to tamely pull their pants back up and go away. Oh no! The girl got them together and whispered to them all with much sniggering and joking. She then took her swimming hat off and made each boy in turn come forward and pee into a can some distance away, at the foot of my dune. As she did so she had him balloon his foreskin out with pee so that she could measure the circumference with her swimming hat strap. To a circumcised guy, this is a sight at once disturbing and astounding. I was astounded at just how elastic a foreskin could be when I saw some of them achieving balloons the size of a large orange. I really did feel put down at the knowledge that I could never manage such an achievement myself. Of course, it was a dirty little game, but I would dearly have loved to try it myself: why shouldn't I play dirty games too if I wanted.

Once again our young lady was not to be outdone, because when they had all performed to her satisfaction, she told the boys not to look (just for appearances' sake, no doubt) and then spreading her knees, she pissed like a fire-hydrant, scoring a bullseye from ten feet, and making the can bounce and leap into the air, to the delight of the boys. Me too, except she completely destroyed my long-held theory of male superiority, thinking that girls could never pee accurately enough to achieve that exquisite satisfaction of drowning a fly. One of the bigger boys evidently found the spectacle as stimulating as I did, as he then got a huge erection. The girl, having emptied her bladder, saw this, and, taking it in her hand, started rubbing it up and down, pulling the foreskin right back to have a look at the liver-coloured wet knob, and bringing back to me that scene in the school playground all those years ago. When she realised that she had an even more enthralled audience, she decided that she had gone far enough and pulling her swimsuit up again, she led them all off, whooping and shouting as though nothing had happened.

There is no doubt in my mind that this was one of the most arousing and disturbing things that happened to me all year. For a start, if it had taken place when I was a kid, over half the boys would have been circumcised like me. It brought the feeling of being the odd man out home to me to know that this generation would look on my cock as even more of an oddity than before. Moreover, it was absolutely clear to me that foreskins were a load of fun, not only for their owners, but also for the young ladies who took them in hand. However, I would have forgotten the whole thing if I hadn't seen Samantha's tale in Acorn No 4 last year, where she got a terrific kick out of making her husband do the balloon trick, and like me felt jealous that she didn't have the equipment to try it herself.

R.W. – Stratford On Avon

Influences

The other day I got a peak at a new women's porn magazine. (Porn!! Well, H. & E. with naughty articles). The page fell open at an article on big cocks owned by cinema and pop celebrities. They included Warren Beatty, Dean Martin, Anthony Quinn (over 12"), Victor Mature, Errol Flynn (always whipping it out on the film sets to show everybody), Don Johnson, and Charlie Chaplin (another 12". Surely they were mixing him up with his cane). With all that length and girth around I wonder why we never saw bulging crotches in Hollywood films, especially the Regency period ones? At the other end of the scale, Clark Gable's wife, Carole Lombard, always put it around that he was dismally hung and was a bad lover, though whether from lack of size or lack of technique she never said.

But what caught my eye most was a full frontal picture of muscular Burt Lancaster, sporting a long foreskin extending beyond his glans. For some reason I had always thought of the Hollywood macho-men as exemplifying the circumcised clean-cut American.

Then I got to thinking about age. With the huge influx of immigrants into America in the late 1800's from Europe, the only circumcised people would probably have been the Jews. The black population would not have been circumcised as slaves, even though they might have been in the original tribal rites. Likewise the Red Indians had no history of circumcision as far as I know. Therefore it must follow that the mass changeover to circumcision must have emanated from the Jewish community, and when by all accounts nearly all the immigrant doctors were Jewish, one can see how it all probably occurred.

However, it must have taken over a generation to gain momentum, so it follows that all the non-Jewish film stars that we knew from the thirties and forties, born before about 1910, had foreskins intact.

Of course I may be quite wrong in all this, with the reason lying completely with the wartime medics who believed, quite erroneously, that the huge amount of V.D. among the troops could be drastically cut by removing all their foreskins. But, when in the R.N. around 1960, we used to carry out exercises in the Med. with American ships and often ended up in the same places, their or our ships, or shore establishments, where we would all shower together before dinner. They were all circumcised, and being young and ignorant, this intrigued me. I asked an older sergeant about it and he told me that nearly all the younger ones had joined like it, but about half of the older ones, born in the twenties, had it done in the Service. So that doesn't make it much clearer, does it?

Going still further, the biggest social influence in Australia after the war were Hollywood films and American radio programmes. I saw a Clive James programme last week where he was comparing the difference between Australian TV programmes at the start of their TV era and nowadays. He stated that it was obligatory for quiz hosts and programme presenters to speak with an American accent and forget their own, and showed an example. I would then presume that as most parts of life were American influenced, so mass circumcision was a part of the same scene.

I sure would like to hear any comments, folks! G'day.

David Acorn

American Attitudes

Those who keep a weather eye open for such things may, like me, have noticed a subtle shift in attitude in the States in recent times. Ten years ago I remember seeing a Shaft film, where, anticipating the 'Politically Correct' doctrine, the hero was described approvingly by his girlfriend as being circumcised (and therefore a regular guy). At about that time the movement decreed that all police chiefs in crime movies had to be black, and that is still the case today. But apparently foreskins are no longer considered un-American. In the erotic film Velvet Dreams, a lady writer is led by her perverted lover to indulge in all kinds of kinky sex for his delectation, and finds that she can't get enough of it. In one scene she spies on a young man taking a shower and, as if following her gaze, the camera zooms in on his centre of gravity, giving a frank close-up of a plump sensual-looking penis with the head totally concealed beneath the long tapering foreskin of youth, which we are clearly intended to register. Although nothing is said, the sly sexy smile on the girl's face shows she is favourably impressed with her new lover's equipment.

Then, if you ever watch the soft porn movies on RTL or Sat 1 on satellite TV, you will notice through the pretty dire slapstick German, French and Italian films, that the occasional glimpse of the male article invariably features your fully foreskinned todger, whereas the older American films show only roundheads. Nothing unusual there of course, but in the more recent American soft-porn films, it's noticeable that when you're treated to a bit of full frontal, your man is nowadays fully intact.

Then again, if you read Pleasures by Lonnie Barbach, which is a compendium of American women writers' stories of their most sexy encounters, you will find not a single reference to circumcision, whereas there is more than one mention of foreskins. The writer Valerie Kelly, who contributes to Playgirl, describes how beautiful she finds her new lover's cock with its foreskin slipping back to reveal the tip of his knob as it swells to erection. She finds the urge to touch it irresistible and, grasping it in her hand, slips his foreskin all the way back down his shaft, to uncover the deep shiny red plum of the uncircumcised prick, glistening with moisture.

There are of course, some American writers who have never made any bones about their dislike of the American custom of universal circumcision.

Gore Vidal, in his raunchy book Myra Breckinridge, for example, goes over the top in his description of the heroine's sexual mistreatment of an uncircumcised student, when she humiliates him unmercifully when he cannot respond to her off-putting approaches. After physically manhandling him she asks him about his foreskin, and his many girlfriends' reaction to it. "I don't get no complaints" is his reply.

Another American writer who takes an anti-circumcision stance, is John Updike who, in one of his earlier books, has the heroine describing with satisfaction her lover's long foreskin, whilst her husband also is revealed as being uncircumcised. Since very few women in the States were likely to experience even one uncircumcised partner in those days, let alone two, you can't help feeling that it's a case of wishful thinking on Updike's part.

But generally speaking, the depiction ten years ago, or even description, of the uncircumcised state, would have been unacceptable in the USA. Americans preferred to think that universal circumcision was the norm, and found it uncomfortable to realise that the rest of the world, less a few primitive and religious groups, was intact. The mere sight of a foreskin seemed to be unsettling, perhaps making them wonder if they might be missing something. Could it be that this new American tolerance for the foreskin is down to Marilyn Mylos' NO CIRC campaign? In view of its success in the west coast states, where a majority of males are allowed to keep their foreskins these days, could it be that the P.C. movement has now espoused the foreskin as a cause célèbre, along with anti-sexism, racism, etc. Any ideas anyone?

M.B. – London

Silly Statistics — According To Ray Hamble's Calculator

If you are circumcised in Madagascar it's likely that your foreskin will be wrapped in a banana skin and fed to a calf; and if you are a Marsh Arab in Iraq your severed prepuce will be dried in the sun, ground to a powder, and sprinkled over the raw edge of the dick of the next guy who comes in for a slice. The traditional cost of such an operation is 'one cock'!

Ritual circumcision among some remote African tribes is still part of the initiation ceremony of teenagers into manhood. The wise elders of the tribe masturbate into a communal bowl and the young initiate imbibes their semen to gain strength and wisdom. He then brings himself to ejaculation to prove his own virility, and is immediately circumcised, before a large audience, by a member of the tribal hierarchy. He must show no sign of pain or discomfort to demonstrate his bravery, but is allowed to clench his teeth on a stick to distract his attention as the knife comes down. Afterwards, everyone sings the local version of "For he's a jolly good fellow", and spends the rest of the night in frivolities, feasting and fucking... And they've got something to feast about because, according to Jomo Kenyatta in his book, Facing Mount Kenya, no uncircumcised man can build a house of his own, partake of certain foods, or have intercourse with Kikuyu women.

Other African tribes lead their eight-year-olds into the secrecy of the bush, sozzle them with crude, pain-numbing, alcoholic, fruity fermentations, decapitate their willy, and invite them, or their 'surgeon', to eat the severed prepuce, which has been soaked in the self-same heady tippie.

In the Western World we don't aspire to such picturesque methods of surgery or the subsequent disposal of foreskins but, according to my pocket calculator, almost half a mile of foreskin is cut off British boys each year. I worked out that daft figure a year or two ago. It was based on the then average of about 26,000 'circs' carried out on hospital in-patients annually in England and Wales. Since then, more boys and men are being treated as out-patients, and it is true that circumcision continues to become less common, but with all the thousands of unrecorded operations carried out by G.P.s and Rabbis there's still one hell of a long length of foreskin going down the drain or up in smoke. Mind you, forty years ago, if all the severed bits of foreskin annually could have been sewn together, it would probably have stretched from Marble Arch to Tower Bridge.

Put that in your pipe and smoke it!!

Ray Hamble

Watch The Oiseau

I could not help being amused by a remark that I heard in Morocco recently. A young man there was telling me of the rites of circumcision for Arabs, and explained that all boys must be circumcised before they reach the age of seven. It's a very special day for the boy and a Feast Day of the King's Birthday is chosen for the barber to call.

No women are allowed to be present at the ceremony and the child is given what they call 'potage', which I take to be an alcoholic drink, normally forbidden to Moslems. In the arms of his father and in the presence of his brothers and uncles, the boy is circumcised by the barber (the cleanest cut of all?) with, so he said, very little pain.

But the words that caused me wry amusement were that the boy is told to look at the ceiling and to "Regardez l'oiseau", or, as we use them on entirely different occasions, "Watch the birdie". The world surely is a small place.

While I am a firm believer in ritual circumcision, I would think that the operation should be carried out soon after birth, and not when the boy is four or five years old.

R.S.

Squirrelling Etc.

I haven't written to you before, so I thought it was about time I put things right and became more than a sleeping member of Acorn.

I have been thinking about the newsletter, as I hope the enclosed cuttings will show. I've not seen any of them in Acorn so hopefully some will be worth including. By the way, is the story from the NME plausible? It was printed in the paper's gossip column and it sounds rather dubious to me. I reckon a plum would be difficult for me to accommodate, and my foreskin's not tight at all! What do you think? Maybe you could invite other eligible readers to note the biggest fruit they could fit under their hood. (In case you're not familiar, NME stands for New Musical Express, a newspaper for rock music fans).

I hope you can find some space for the girth statistics, as I find these equally as interesting as length. I believe my cock's thinner than standard. I would also be very interested in attending another Acorn meeting, I don't think that I was a member at the time of the last one.

I'd like to make a contribution to Acorn, but I'm not sure what to do – I don't have any personal experiences to relate, and I'm far from being an expert on any aspect of our interest. Any ideas?

G.L. – Leeds

[You now have just made your first contribution. Congratulations. But if you think you have no personal experiences to relate you can't know what that thing is that's hanging between your legs. Sorry, G.L. that sounds a bit facetious, and I apologize. How about starting with the subjects that you would like to hear more about in the questionnaire, eg masturbation technique, pleasures of foreskins, I first found out about foreskins, etc. You are an expert on all those subjects, and everyone would like to hear more. With regard to another meeting, I don't mind organising one if enough members are interested. And if anyone has an alternative suitable venue perhaps they would let me know. In the meantime, many thanks for the cuttings which now follow. — D.A.]

N.M.E. 8th. Feb. 1992.

There they were, rockband EMF, at the Rock in Rio Festival. Five young lads from the Forest Of Dean with an important duty. They were cultural ambassadors for Britain, representing all that is great about our pop music – and what do they do? Well, it makes us squirm just to tell you...

It transpires that the boys were being grilled by Brazilian journalists at a press conference, when bassist ZAK decided he was bored, and would regale the nation's press with his favourite party trick. Rising from his chair, he picked up a lime from a nearby fruitbowl and proceeded, ugh, to place it under his considerable foreskin! We kid you not, dear readers.

Curiously enough, although a number of journalists walked out in disgust, one representative from a TV station approached ZAK and asked him if he would be willing to repeat the performance on a variety show later in the evening. Good sense prevailed, and he was dissuaded from making a complete dick of himself before millions of viewers.

The Guardian, 25th. Feb. 1992.

Irish Dictionary is Lost for Words on Sex.

An Irish politician once famously remarked that there was no sex in Ireland before television, but a government agency is implying sex may have arrived with the English language.

A new Irish language dictionary has no words for penis, vagina or condom, but it does provide a word for abortion, perhaps confirming that the latter really is a political rather than a sexual question in Ireland.

The dictionary is the latest in a series produced by An Gum, a state-owned Irish language publishing house for schools. It is aimed mainly at teenagers, but describes itself as providing a basic vocabulary.

It defines many modern words in concise and easy Irish, but skates delicately around matters sexual. For example, the word for sex, gneas, is defined as the masculine or feminine in people or animals and "any activity or quality that is mentioned in connection with that."

Taking refuge in the Irish equivalent of birds and bees, it interprets a word with strong overtones of sexual desire or heat, dair, as "a bull's desire for a cow."

Irish, actually, has a large vocabulary for sex, as for most other things. The missing words appear in an Irish-English dictionary, also published by An Gum.

A spokesman for the department of education, which oversees An Gum, said that any omissions were accidental. One of the dictionary's compilers expressed surprise at the absence of the words. "If they are not in, it wasn't me who left them out," he told the Irish Times.

The education spokesman said that many words had not been included because it was only a small dictionary. "The publishers say the exclusions are not based on any kind of censorship, but on frequency of use," he added.

Which seems to suggest that Irish educators do not expect teenagers to call a spade a spade. However, the words they might use more frequently are certainly not included either.

The Guardian, 7th. Nov. 1991

Circumcision Deaths.

Ten people were crushed to death, and seven hurt, when about 2,000 families packed into a mausoleum in Fez, Morocco, to watch the circumcisions of their sons.

[Our very good correspondent from Helsinki, J.H., has sent me a load of pages of letters from British and American Forum magazines dealing with our interests. These I will include from time to time under the heading of Cuttings, as they are mostly pro-circumcision. Herewith the first.]

Cuttings

I notice that most of your male readers tend to reject circumcision, while the majority of females say they prefer a partner who has been circumcised. [Acorn finds the opposite true. — D.A.] It doesn't surprise me that most women, given the choice, derive more pleasure from a penis without a foreskin, but very little has been said about the variations between one circumcised penis and another.

Apart from my husband and my current boyfriend, all the men I have known have been uncircumcised. My husband, who was killed in a car crash two years ago, had been circumcised at birth. His penis was fairly average in size, and when erect the circumcision 'ring' was situated about half an inch behind the rim of his knob. There was enough penile skin to move forwards and back about two or three inches.

I am soon to marry Patrick who was also circumcised at birth, but presumably a different technique was used by the surgeon, as his circumcision 'ring' is further down his penis; about two inches behind the rim of his knob when he is fully erect. The position of this cut means that there is no mobile skin; in fact the penile skin is stretched taut, like a drum, from his knob to the base of his belly.

When I saw Patrick's penis for the first time I was delighted to see that he had been circumcised – I am not a foreskin fan – but I was really turned on by the feel of this very taut stretched skin. His frenulum is also stretched when his penis is erect, and he is particularly sensitive in this area.

I cannot explain why I find myself so excited by a penis which has been cut so far back to expose not only the glans but a large area of delicate membrane behind it. I realise that he has been deprived of the usual method of masturbation, ie, sliding the foreskin back and forth over the tip. I also accept that, in removing his foreskin, his glans is without any form of protection. In my particular case, the more skin cut from the penis, the more attractive it is. I suck Patrick's penis frequently, taking it out of my mouth from time to time to see, at close hand, the results of my attention. I notice that men who are circumcised invariably possess greater self-confidence, and a much larger knob in relation to the size of the penis. Circumcised men expect to be fellated while those with a foreskin can only hope.

I am fond of swimming, and while relaxing by the pool or on the beach I find myself speculating on the size and shape of the sparsely covered penises. Not surprisingly, I can often tell by the outline of the bathing trunks whether the wearer has been circumcised. Unfortunately, I have come to the conclusion that the vast majority of males in Britain still retain their foreskins. Not much of a choice for our younger generation of girls.

Mrs J.B.

Comments Re Issue 3/92

As usual, the latest issue of Acorn is very enjoyable, and new angles and opinions occur.

Three things prompt me to write and comment:-

First, the comment on the infant shown on the record sleeve. Your description reminds me of photographs of my niece's son, born in New Zealand two and a half years ago. His penis had obviously been circumcised, but it had similarly a characteristic of a roll of skin around the glans corona. My guess would be a Plastibell circumcision because, surely, with that the end result depends on the amount of foreskin pulled forward before the ligature is tied.

Secondly, maceheads. Interesting variation of opinions here. I must say that my experience has always been that the circumcised glans has a more bulbous/prominent rim because it is not contained by a foreskin. However, I think I have read in Acorn or Forum that this can also be influenced by the age at which circumcision has been done, that is the rim is more prominent in penises circumcised at birth.

Finally, docking. I have never heard this name for it before but, looking back to Acorn S 1990, I find that I did refer to it in a letter you published. At public school I shared a room for a time with a friend who had been neatly and radically circumcised shortly after birth – he knew exactly when because his mother had recorded it in his 'Baby Book'. I possessed a particularly long and loose foreskin, and we indulged from time to time in mutual masturbation. I cannot swear whose idea it was, but it was eventually suggested that I roll my foreskin over his glans. There was actually enough to stretch to behind his glans, and we both found this enjoyable, so we 'docked' regularly.

J.R. – Norfolk

Saga (continued)

What could be more exciting for a male than a female who is truly fascinated by his penis, and I wonder how many there are 'out there'. Not so many, I suspect somehow. Also, what does a woman think when first she handles a new acquaintance, and what does she look for – if anything?

Perhaps it is just an answer to an idle question, circled or uncircled. My next girlfriend seemed to be this way. On our first evening, correctly sensing the moment, I pushed her hand down my trousers' front. The reaction was fairly startling. Grabbing it enthusiastically, she pinched the knob hard then, to my bewilderment, pinched around just below the corona, then stretched out sideways the skin she had seized, really hard and a bit painfully, then forward over the knob with a little reciprocating motion, keeping it forward, a new sensation for me. She never handled me much again, much preferring straight sex.

The only girl who masturbated me in the conventional way was my last before marriage. She pulled the skin well forward, so that what there was met together beyond the end on each stroke, not pulling it back very far. I'm afraid this was my least enjoyable masturbation from a woman.

Forum – and Acorn already – is full of stories from both sexes about their frustration in masturbation with roundheads. Something, which I hope is clear from the foregoing, I fail to comprehend.

By now, I was clear in my mind that I would get a circumcision if it was on offer. Only I had slight reservations still about loss of the sensitive area, and how masturbation would be affected.

My slow release from my complex began in 1969 with purchase of my first copy of Forum. In it, to my astonishment and delight, I found a letter from a woman who mentioned, inter alia, a 'fetish' (her inverted commas) of hers which was a preference for the sight and feel (the feel!! – what a magazine!!) of the circumcised penis. From then to this day I was hooked on Forum; only now has Acorn stepped in to fill in while the former becomes year by year less serious and more sensational, much of its message, perhaps, having been safely delivered.

However, it has been a great comfort in a life where I have been on my own so much. What I never took regularly was H. & E., although one weekend I happened to have a couple at home. A neighbour came in and, after some chatting, I showed her them. She was at the far end of the room, and suddenly came out with a comment to my wife which had my heart pounding, "Not many of them are circumcised, are they?" We discussed the subject for a while and then she left. I wonder how many females realise the effect on males of their comments like this? I think the vast majority do not, but a little later shall tell of one who I'm quite sure does.

Eventually, I came to live where I am now, without my wife for the most part, our children having greater claim on her than I. Suffice it to say that it is a hot, Moslem country, and that the organisation which employs me has its own hospital, with the staff of which I work together fairly often, either near my home or away on detachment. I also have (too much) time to brood. I also meet many who are on their own also for various reasons and of varying long durations.

I was away with a party which included Susan, who is now the matron. I had not met her before but, at the first meal we sat down together, she very quickly brought the subject round to 'the tribe which is into female circumcision'. This did not develop as we were joined by others, to my disappointment, but at almost the next meal when we were all together she managed to work in some comment about it in general. Soon after, she began visiting our normal workplace roughly once a month on duty and, almost every time while relaxing over coffee she had something to say about it. Normally about a new Indian surgeon who was rather old and slow. For example, "He does a circumcision, and then he's knackered." and later, "He's got circumcisions down to 40 minutes now". "We've lost a few more foreskins this week". I'm sure her primary aim was to enjoy watching us males getting steamed up at all this, but I still wonder how much fascination she had with it?

Before this though, the hospital had had a very patchy period, with surgeons seemingly coming and going constantly, never staying for long. One who came out from the U.K. caused some anguish. He was an expert, apparently, on circumcision and piles – a gorgeous combination. After returning from a home leave, I was in our club one evening with a married couple, close friends, and one or two others. Conversation veered towards the hospital, and the current visiting surgeon. Suddenly Mary said with shining eyes, "They're circumcising all the boys," to the usual blank looks one tends to get. I couldn't wait to hear more, but had to until a few days later, when I bumped into two other friends who were chatting just outside my house. I just heard Jennifer say, "It won't pull back." Then, seeing me, "Sorry, Michael's circumcision." She then wandered off to potter around her garden, leaving Jack (a mutual neighbour), and me alone. He told me about the surgeon in question; "And we all went along to the circumciser," with a big grin referring to parents taking their boys, of course. Then, "I don't know about you, but I was done during the war, and they took it all off." I dearly wanted to contribute, but just could not, with my shameful secret.

Soon after, Mary (a nurse), said to me of Michael, "It's up like a balloon." She had been asked in for an assessment by Jennifer, and, a little later, "It doesn't look any different." It appeared to me that both mothers were circumcisionists for reasons of appearance and social cachet, perhaps, more than for purely medical reasons.

(to be continued)

Ray's Joke

Q. Why are Morris Dancers never circumcised?

A. Because you have got to be a complete prick to be a Morris Dancer.

[Any more relevant jokes?]

ACORN

1992 Issue No 6

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
For Women		Page 2
Royal Foreskins	Mrs F.M.	Page 6
Cockrings	B.H.	Page 8
Masturbation Comments	V.	Page 9
A Change For The Better	Anon	Page 10
Circumcised Pride	C.P.	Page 11
Foreskin Making	R.B.W.	Page 12
Impotence	D.A.	Page 13
The Perfect Foreskin	J.R.	Page 14
Urethral Stimulation	M.D.	Page 15
Saga (Continued)		Page 15

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

I've just come back from a fortnight in the Canary Islands, for which the less said the better. Being a naturist, one of my first tasks was to find the nudist beaches. In Gran Canaria there are, not so much nudist beaches, but beaches designated where you may strip off completely. So we have a total mixture of dressed and undressed, not very good for a togetherness feeling. Most of the holidaymakers are German with British second, and a mixture of all the other Europeans bringing up the rear. Circumcised cocks are the rare item nearly all, I would say, British. A few of the Germans retracted their foreskins, a hazardous business. I've seen some burnt knobs at Studland Bay in Dorset at 75 degrees, so you can imagine what happens at 120 degrees.

I had a long conversation with a young Spanish chap, from Madrid, on our different cultures etc., and after a while brought up the subject of circumcision. He said that he knew of no Spanish men being circumcised, and had never seen any advertisements anywhere for the operation. He also said that he'd spent a few years in Sweden and had never seen anyone circumcised there. But, I saw a group of young Canarians on the beach, three girls and three boys, in their late teens. Only one was nude, and guess what? He was newly circumcised with a rawish scar, and looked to me as though he was proudly showing off.

There is still a sprinkling of questionnaires coming back in, but I hope to have the statistics in the next issue.

I'm sorry for the gap between this issue and the last, but Tony's and my holidays haven't coincided, and the putting out of an issue is a joint task. The next issue will be that much earlier.

D.A.

For Women

[The new magazine For Women ran an article in their third issue on circumcision. I'm sure the editor, Isobel, won't mind me copying it, as it might engender some interest in her magazine. I have to say that because, as you will find out, they know all about us. The article is accompanied by two large pictures of a foreskin and a circumcised penis. — D.A.]

To snip or not to snip.

Do you prefer your men wrapped or unwrapped. We asked two women with opposing views to make their cases for or against the snip, and talked to a man who knows the difference... first hand.

Of course, all men are obsessed with the contents of their boxer shorts. Secretly, though, the obsession stretches beyond the confines of their own flies and into the pants of others. Men who were snipped before they grew hair they could shave are endlessly curious to know what it's like to own a foreskin, and those still intact would love to shed that skin for a day. Few adult males can claim to have experienced life – and more particularly, sexual relations – from both sides of the op.

Stephen is just such a man. Brought into this world fitted with the classic snug foreskin, he remained intact until the age of 24, when he made the momentous decision to lose the skin he'd been living with all his life. The decision was prompted by Stephen's planned betrothal to a Jewish woman. In order to be accepted into the Jewish faith, Stephen was expected to say goodbye to his foreskin forever. The things we do for love!

"I guess it does seem like a lot to ask someone to do, just to get married," says Stephen, "but to be completely honest, the idea didn't bother me. My stepfather was circumcised and had always recommended it. I think it was that attitude that helped me to go through with it. If I'd known just how much it was going to hurt, I might have thought twice about it."

The operation was performed by a Jewish surgeon, using only a local anaesthetic and a pair of his sharpest scissors.

"The operation was more bizarre than anything else. In fact, it was something of an anti-climax, as I'd been building up to it for a long time. The pain came after the operation, and it is definitely the worst pain I've ever felt. It was supposed to heal properly after about a fortnight, but I wasn't as careful as I should have been, and suffered something of a setback. I had to go on a business trip to France and just before I got on the plane I noticed that I was bleeding a little. One of the stitches had caused a clot under the skin which had burst.

Stupidly I thought nothing of it and got on the plane, but while we were in the air the bleeding got much worse and the crew had to radio for an ambulance to meet us when we landed. That episode set me back a couple of months."

Over a year later, everything has healed and Stephen is able to quantify the pros and cons of circumcision, and specifically, what it's meant to him sexually.

"I know this is going to sound fairly uninteresting, but the difference in feeling when you're having sex is hardly noticeable. At first, of course, you do feel particularly sensitive, but pretty soon your penis just adapts and the sensation is just as before.

And the stuff about it being more hygienic is rubbish as far as I'm concerned. Basically, if you wash yourself regularly, there should be no difference."

There is, however, one big difference that Stephen has noticed.

"Masturbation does feel really different. Because there's no skin to slide up and down, you have to find other methods of stroking yourself. It all adds to the fun, though. I don't miss it."

The Case For... by Sally Anne Rodgers.

Seeing an uncut penis for the very first time it was, I believe, the retiring Ruby Wax who screamed, "Eaargh! What the hell is that?" I didn't get to see a roundhead until I was 23. My reaction was 'So this is what I've been missing!'

All right, I'm quite aware that some of you are going to think I'm being an uptight picky prude, but yes, I admit it – I like my men neatly trimmed.

I was always impatient – I never cared how beautiful the wrapping paper was, I just wanted to get at the goodies underneath. I feel rather the same about the male member – I want to see the smooth shaft and the soft mushroom head – I don't want it hidden away in a wrinkled tube of skin.

I can hear the screams already – how dare I require men to be subjected to mutilations just to satisfy my lust! I admit that this is a little unfair, and appearance certainly isn't everything. It counts for quite a bit, though. I mean, no matter how much you love his mind, you're still going to notice whether he looks... well, appetizing... or not.

But let's get really unromantic here – we all know that a high percentage of little boys display something approaching a phobia when confronted with soap and water – and a hell of a lot of big boys, despite all those aftershave, shower gel and male moisturiser ads, still don't regard being 'nice to be near' as number one on their list of priorities. As far as I'm concerned, one mouthful of bell-end cheese is one too many. I know all the books and videos suggest taking a bath with one's lover as a romantic and practical prelude to sex, but does anyone really feel that confident about advancing on one's beloved's plonker with scrubbing brush and Dettol? A little gentle soaping of each other is, of course, very nice – but what exactly are you going to do when you gently tug back the foreskin to find an accumulation of something that would terrorise the yoghurt counter of any supermarket? Miss Manners doesn't, to the best of my knowledge, offer any specific advice on dealing with this problem.

OK, presuming that your uncut man does keep himself lemon-fresh, the difficulties of that extra section of skin are not altogether at an end. You have to keep easing the foreskin back to get at the meat – and it makes condom-time even more like milking-time than usual.

From aesthetic to practical, and some male viewpoints. Foreskins also, according to male friends, can get excruciatingly stuck in one's zipper. I've also heard a couple of alarming cautionary tales of men whose foreskins really were too tight, but who were reluctant to seek medical help. One in particular (we'll call him Nick), met an attractive girl at a party. Unfortunately, Nick's dick came off much the worse in this encounter – according to the girl it just about burst. I don't know about you, but that definitely brings a tear to my eye.

The Case Against... by Tuppy Owens

I'm used to writing about intimate subjects, but the topic of foreskins is religion. They mean so much to me. I don't want to insult or upset those men who had them removed at birth – I hope they're enjoying things anyway. But thankfully, there aren't too many of these men in Britain. We might be the most censored country in the western world, but we do manage to have plenty of foreskins to our name.

Foreskins keep the glans of the penis wrapped up all day, leaving it tender and receptive. When the penis stiffens, the foreskin retracts back to expose its jewel. A membrane so tender and intricate has its own personal idiosyncrasies and it is perhaps because of this that people decided to chop them off at birth. I suppose I should state the obvious and say that foreskins are natural, the way penises were supposed to be. That alone makes them precious in their own right. If they've been cut for religious reasons or to make a man so-called 'cleaner', that can only be sacrilegious in my view. I suspect the reasons behind circumcision are far more to do with the prevention of pleasure – nobody has ever come up with a satisfactory explanation in my view – it's a barbarically cruel thing to do to a baby or young boy.

Admittedly, sometimes foreskins have spots on them. But sometimes there is such an exciting interaction between the foreskin, the glans, and the shaft, that it must be ever-tempting to keep jiggling about with it. Occasionally, smegma builds up underneath and it gets cheesy – which some people might find disgusting, but since pizzas, fetta cheese and grilled haloumi capture our culinary imaginations, I can't think why!

Sometimes, the foreskin is so long that it bunches up around the top of the glans and gets in the way, and sometimes it's so tight that it won't go down, or when it does it gets stuck. However, high-tech surgery procedures can stretch or widen the foreskin, if men take a brave step forward and have it done. However, unlike some women who opt for plastic surgery, men are usually monstrously attached to their foreskins and don't want them altered for the world.

There are many different kinds of foreskins. This all helps to make them endlessly fascinating for people who want to play with them. I've never come across one that wasn't interesting in its own way. Uncircumcised gay men have a thrilling time playing at a game they call 'docking'. This involves inserting a penis inside each other's foreskins and 'shunting' across. Unfortunately this is definitely not Safe Sex, as it's very easy for the HIV virus to seep from one penis to another. But, regardless of your sexuality, you have to admit it's still a stupendous concept!

For me, the thinner the foreskin the better. Thin ones are the most exciting because you have to be so very careful and gentle with them. If the foreskin is a bit thicker though, don't feel left out. It can be a lot of fun to play boisterously with, as you don't have to be so gentle.

There have even been a number of magazines devoted to foreskins and their wearers: Foreskin Quarterly was easily the best. In the United States, Bud Berkeley runs The Uncircumcised Society Of America, in a country where foreskins are a rare commodity. In the UK we have The Acorn Society with its own little newsletter for fans.

In my view, foreskins are for dirty, wild, crazy, blast-your-mind-out sex, whereas circumcised dicks are for polite, boring and endless in-outs. However, modern times has meant that the compulsory use of condoms has sent the sensual advantages to the darkest corners of our memories. And alas, because of our rubber friends, those of you who have just started exploring the many different options available may never be able to fully fathom what is undoubtedly the forefront of sexual experience!

Few guys out there will ever know what it's like to experience life with and without a foreskin. We girls have been blessed with that option of being able to make a choice. That's all very swell, but for me I know that there is definitely no choice to be made.

Royal Foreskins

The husband of an old friend of mine gets your newsletter, and whenever I go over for a coffee morning with her we have a jolly good giggle over it. Although some of the content is a bit over the top, in general it's far more entertaining than the usual run of women's magazines, especially when you print the views of the girls. They do seem to have a less extreme approach; but then, they can take a more detached view.

One thing I have yet to see mentioned is the influence of the Royal Family on public attitudes. Princess Diana is on the record for finding circumcision distasteful to the extent where she successfully defended her sons' foreskins, including that of the future king of England, against a powerful lobby of Palace circumcisers. Although naturally enough the event did not receive wide publicity, it did make The Times, which reported that American anti-circumcisionists had voted her and Prince Charles 'Parents of the Year'. It was also mentioned in Ned Sherrin's programme, Loose Ends, some time ago, when it was said that she'd been influenced by her experiences in childcare, and also the advice of a well-known doctor, who wrote a best-seller on sex.

Those close to Palace circles knew all about it of course, including a rather grand family I used to work for. I was present on several occasions when the subject was mentioned, and it clearly impressed a lot of people who pride themselves on their Palace links. One young girl who'd just got married was heard to say, "Good for Diana. If foreskins are OK by her then they're OK by me." She went on to say that the whole idea of circumcising children made her feel queasy and, despite her In-laws' views, no way was she going to let her sons' cocks be altered. Others felt the same, and there's no doubt that the 'Royalty can do no wrong' factor had a big effect on families who would otherwise expect to circumcise their offspring as a matter of course. Consequently, if anyone can think of a way of doing the necessary research, I think they'll find a surprising proportion of young blue-bloods these days with their dickies intact.

This attitude is mirrored in the fundamental change in the views of those erstwhile disapprovers of the foreskin, the British nanny. I was leafing through the Good Nanny Guide the other day, and was amazed to read that a lot of nannies will refuse to work for a family where it's customary to circumcise the children. From my experience, the nanny class tended to deplore foreskins as toys which they couldn't confiscate and, although they were quite happy to have their own menfolks sporting foreskins, they didn't expect it of the upper classes. Unfortunately they tantalisingly fail to give a reason for this change in attitude. Can any of your readers expand on it perhaps?

As far as my personal view is concerned, I'm really not in a position to say very much, since I've never seen a circumcised penis, let alone had a circumcised partner. My husband has a foreskin and so does my little boy, and I cannot really imagine them without one. I do think some of the remarks about cleanliness are exaggerated: I've never found any of my sexual partners offensive in that respect. To my mind the female has much more of a cleanliness problem than the male, since virtually all of her genital region is wetted every time she takes a pee. Consequently I choose to wash my fanny once a day. But I tend to go along with David Acorn when he says that unretracted foreskins do not necessarily have to be smelly. My husband can go for a week without washing (probably more, but it's never been put to the test) and with only a slight male scent, which I find attractive when I pull his foreskin back. Besides which, we have sex seven times a week on average, and his foreskin never gets a chance to collect anything underneath it.

Certainly I find the thought of cutting part of a little boy's penis off repellent, but in view of the powerful pro-circumcision feelings of so many of your members, they must feel that there are some real advantages to be had from it. To my mind there is a solution to this problem which should suit everyone, and that is to make elective circumcision freely available under the NHS to all who have reached maturity. But I don't think it's right to have children done who might not like it when they grow up. Is that reasonable or is it not ?

Mrs F.M. – Bromley

Cockrings

As requested in newsletter No 4, information etc. about cockrings.

I have a metal one, a rubber one, a leather one, and a ballbag ring combined. All are comfortable to wear and have the desired effect of enhancing the erection. I think, if used sensibly, they are a good thing. It is documented that Casanova used a version of a cockring in his many sessions with his lovers. It was a ladies' hair ribbon tied around the base of his cock going behind the balls. Although it did the job, this type is not safe as it is like a tourniquet.

My metal one is large enough to fit snugly behind my balls, but not too tightly. The method of putting it on is to pass the balls through first, then, providing you are not erect, feeding your cock through. You can use a lubricant to make this easier if you want. The rubber one is put on the same way. The metal one is much more comfortable to wear for a long time. The leather one is a half-an-inch wide strap held by press-studs but because of its width it is not comfortable to wear in underbriefs although OK in the nude.

The ballbag one is quite comfortable and easier to put on with a soft cock. The bag has a hole that takes an average thickness cock which you pull down the full length of the cock, pull the bag under the balls, and then pull the laces which tighten up the pouch to neatly hold the balls with the cock sticking out of the hole. It is comfortable to wear and when the erection goes down it is quite comfortable to wear with briefs.

As an extra to sex these are great, but like all good things they must be enjoyed, so if they are uncomfortable forget it. You don't want to damage the plumbing. Certainly orgasms seem to be more enjoyable when wearing a cockring and, as it does constrict the cock a little, it does slow down the cock softening after coming so that you are still half hard if you can do it again.

Circumcision Facilities

National Medical Services
12, Harley St.
London W1.
Tel:- 071-580 6216

Mr. R. Thomas
Yorkshire Clinic
502, Eccleshall Rd.
Sheffield
Tel: 0742 663501

I've not contacted these for details, but anyone who does can let us know costs.

B.H. – Leeds

Masturbation Comments

Herewith a few comments on some of the 'statements' in your editorial to Issue 1/92.

First, to put things into perspective, I would say that I am now 80, and was circumcised as an infant. I had somehow 'discovered' masturbation by the time I was 5.

Three of the statements refer to masturbation. Nos 1, 2, and 12, and I will comment on these as a group.

I disagree that masturbation can only be achieved with a fantasy, although as one gets older they assume a much greater role. Up to about age of 60 the urge for relief was quite sufficient to initiate and sustain a wank, and to reach a satisfying orgasm without any great mental stimulus. However, after that age, I have found it increasingly necessary to fantasise strongly if the act is not to take an undue length of time to complete. Furthermore, I also now find that if I do not concentrate hard on a fantasy at the point of coming, I get absolutely no pleasure from the orgasm, and ejaculation is no more than a mechanical action such as peeing, except that the semen emerges in individual jets rather than a steady stream.

Being circumcised, it is perhaps not surprising that all my fantasies involve a penis having a long loose foreskin in some action. These actions usually involve mutual wanking, more often than not with my bare knob 'docked' in the other's foreskin. These very limited fantasies have not lost their potency, and even now I masturbate twice a week.

As regards 12, it depends upon what is meant by 'properly'. Obviously there is no problem in masturbating a circumcised prick to orgasm. What I did not realise, until I first had intercourse, is that the quality of orgasm resulting from the stimulation of the glans directly by the soft, smooth lining of the vagina is vastly superior to that obtained by manual rubbing of the shaft. Try as I may I have never found a way of involving the knob in the wanking process that does not result in acute discomfort, or indeed pain, at orgasm.

Now that I have reached an age when erections are in a decline, I have found a way around the problem. If I push back my knob when the penis is flaccid, the loose skin of the shaft forms a pseudo foreskin, and working the knob within it can give rise to an orgasm quite as intense as in intercourse, before any significant degree of erection has set in.

The upshot of all this is that I assume that anyone still left with a foreskin can regularly obtain a better quality orgasm than one who is circumcised.

As regards 7, I did for a short time in my teens shave the pubic area, as I enjoyed seeing my prick and balls free from hair. However, I found the area tended to get itchy, and gave the practice up.

I do hope you will get enough replies to spread the experience of others in these largely uncharted seas. In particular, I would like to have practical ideas on how to achieve a reasonable erection in later years!!! (No 3).

V. – Shropshire

A Change For The Better

Jeez, I must have a pee. Ah, here's the toilet, and I've just got time before the train goes. Blast these non-corridor trains. It's surprising how long a pee takes when you're pressed for time. Right, that's done. Up zip. Ooooh, that hurt. God, I've trapped my dick in the zip, and the zip won't move. I can't go out with that hanging out of my trousers. Close my eyes and give it a tug. Ooooooh, I've split my foreskin down one side. Look at all that blood. Must tie it up with my hanky. Bloody train's gone too...

You can see what I've done, doctor. Yes, I suppose I will have to be circumcised. Can you do it now?...

Not so bad when you get used to it. Think of all the good things. No more spending half an hour, twice a day, in washing it. It'll just keep itself clean rubbing in my pants. And no more having to unblock the sink to get rid of all that smegma. I can still smile to myself at the time I decided to keep it for a week and filled the bin bag with it. And when I put it out with the garbage, the dustman threw it over his shoulder, split the bag and had it all pour down his back. I'd have loved to have heard his wife when he went home with that awful smell, That's another thing, think of all the money I'm saving on all the air fresheners I'm not using now...

It's a lovely even scarline, the bit that got split by the zip, that is. I can get used to the bunched up lumps on the other side, and think of all the time I can spend happily cleaning out the passageways in the stitching. Of course, if I want any more taken off it, the doctor said he would do it and would charge a bit less than for the first time, which I thought was quite fair of him. I'm not too sure about the frenum though, it was my most sensitive part, but the doctor thought it best to be rid of it. Besides, with most of the sensitivity gone I can now last much longer than my usual paltry three quarters of an hour. Sometimes now I can last three hours or more and if I'm lucky I can succeed in not coming at all. Also, I can spend some time browsing in Boots for different sorts of lubricants for masturbation purposes... Oh yes, I think I'm more or less happy with things.

Anon

Circumcised Pride

I read with great interest the article in 4/92 by Brian of the West Country, entitled 'Widening Membership'. I think it would be a great idea to have a 'Year of the Circumcision', with plenty of advertising, if one could afford the cost of advertisements in sex magazines such as Forum which normally has a good coverage on the subject of circumcision.

In the News of the World we quite often see circumcision advertisements by the S.A.S. in London. It was there that I was circumcised by Mr Hasan, and I am delighted with the result, the frenum being cut away as well, which left a nice tight job.

I correspond with many people, married couples, young lads and their girlfriends, and young mothers on the subject of circumcision and am always delighted to hear from more. In my view it is most essential that both parties should be interested, if the man is contemplating circumcision, as the result is beneficial to both. As a naturist my penis is on show to both males and females regularly, therefore I am in no way shy at showing it to others who are genuinely interested. Most people are quite surprised at what a good job it is, thinking that there is going to be a large cut left and look like a zip fastener. Also, I have many photos of my penis both before and after the circumcision which I will always loan to interested couples

Whilst on holiday in Cornwall recently at a naturist site, a party of us sat round discussing the subject of circumcision, and it was easy comparing our scars and foreskins. After some long chats together, two women convinced their husbands that they should make a booking to be circumcised, and three mothers decided to have their children done, two of which had foreskins like elephant trunks, and an eight-year-old whose foreskin was so tight that it could not be drawn back.

I have addresses of people who do circumcisions privately, which I obtained when I was looking for the operation for myself. If anyone is interested, please contact me through Acorn.

I was circumcised only a year ago and am very proud of it. I actually watched the operation being done and it was nice to see the surgeon cutting off that piece of skin and throw it on the operating trolley, a good two inches of it. It was quite a relief as I had always wanted to be circumcised from a child, which is when my brother was done. I often wish that I had another foreskin and I could watch it all over again.

It would also be nice if we could all meet at various places as a mixed party and chat about our interest in the penis.

C.P. – Wiltshire

Foreskin Making

Live and let live they say, and so do I. Consequently, although I shall never understand the urge of otherwise normal people to mutilate their sexual organs, I've no quarrel with them if that's what they want. I just don't like to hear of people who want to inflict their neuroses on everyone else. I've spent a lifetime of unhappiness because someone decided that I should forfeit my foreskin on the grounds that I was too young to complain, and Acorn has been good enough to allow me to work out my distress and anger through your pages (see issue Q). So when I see remarks to the effect that all boys should be required by law to be circumcised when they reach 16 to 18 (R.H. of S.W.8 in Issue 6/91), I realise that there are some people who are so obsessed with their own daft fads, that they either don't notice or just don't care that people like me are condemned to long-term misery because of people like them.

Incidentally, R.H.'s split stream when he pees is a classic symptom of impending prostate trouble.

But now let's move to a message of hope. I did write once before to say that an American organisation called 'BUFF' exists to relieve the widespread distress of those circumcised in infancy, through a foreskin restoration technique using gentle stretching of the remaining skin with surgical tape. I have been applying this technique for two years now and recently had the satisfaction of fooling a urologist into thinking that I was intact. It is a matter of some elation that I have managed to thwart the decision, made in my infancy, that I should go through life sexually mutilated, although I shall never forgive my parents and the medical profession. It's too late now to derive any sexual benefit, and nothing will relieve the lack of sensitivity which I put down to the loss of the rich nerve endings when my foreskin was thrown in the bin nearly sixty years ago. Another thing I can't understand is the desire to numb the exquisite sensitivity of an organ designed just for that purpose, by those who are looking for a justification for committing such an insult to nature as circumcision.

The skin has now stretched far enough to cover the head completely with some overlap. The trouble is that this tube of stretched skin lacks the taper of a natural foreskin and tends to hang open. This is still infinitely better for my peace of mind than my previous hated state of evident mutilation, but I wonder if any of your resourceful readers can think of a way of tightening the opening so as to allow me to pee with a normal jet.

[This looks like a job for A.D. of Oxford. If he feels so inclined to drop a line to R.B.W., I'll certainly send it on. — D.A.]

As an act of public-spiritedness I did write previously to give BUFF's address for those who feel as I do, but it didn't get printed. If you've no objection I'll give it again:- BUFF, c/o Tony Lesce, PO Box 26377, Tempe, AZ 85285-6377, U.S.A. Enclose a $5 bill.

Now, to lighten the mood, a circumcision/foreskin joke.

A personable gent on a cruise decides to take the air on deck. He sits in a deckchair and borrows a large blanket from the pile to pull over his lap, noticing that it has 'Samuel Goldstein' embroidered on it. An attractive young lady in a mini-skirt has the same idea and he invites her to sit next to him and share the blanket. They get talking, and the girl lets it be known that she is a photographer's model. He asks her if she's required to shave her pubic hair, and she says yes, but only when she's working. He grins slyly at her and says, "In that case you haven't worked for about two months, have you?" She grins back and retorts, "No, and you're not Samuel Goldstein, are you?"

R.B.W. – Bedford

Impotence

A friend of mine has given me the brochure from the London Diagnostic Centre which specialises in the field of male sexual problems, of which impotence and premature ejaculation are the two main ones. Extracts:-

Impotence can be a source of great distress and unhappiness for men and their partners. The failure to achieve or maintain an erection of sufficient rigidity and duration can make vaginal penetration and sexual intercourse impossible.

It is estimated that impotence affects 10% of all men, with a considerable increase in its occurrence – to around 40% – after the age of 50. It was once thought that in 90% of cases the primary cause of impotence was psychological, but research has shown that in over 75% of cases medical problems are responsible – and these are aggravated by psychological factors such as 'performance anxiety'.

Earlier attempts to treat impotence were based upon incorrect diagnosis, leading, not surprisingly, to disappointing results. But new diagnostic procedures have recently been developed which have led to revolutionary treatment methods.

As a result, it is now possible to treat impotence with the confident expectation of a 90% success rate.

As with all successful therapy, treatment depends entirely upon correct diagnosis and evaluation. Only after this has been achieved can the appropriate treatment be decided upon.

Diagnosis

Correct diagnosis and evaluation begins with an appraisal of your medical and sexual history. You will be required to complete (in the strictest confidence) a detailed interview with an experienced counsellor.

A thorough medical examination will be made by the doctor, including special tests of penile blood flow, and a comprehensive blood sample analysis will be obtained. In most cases this will entail only one visit.

Treatment

An erection will be induced by a revolutionary new technique known as PIPE (Pharmacologically Induced Penile Erection). The initial experience of PIPE will be administered by the physician, after which you will be instructed on self-administration and provided with a supply for home use, with assessments every month, over 6 months. After that, a return to normal sexual function can be expected in a significant number of cases.

PIPE was discovered by accident, but is highly effective and safe.

The L.D.C. not only has a centre at 98, Harley St. but also at St. James Building, 79 Oxford St., Manchester; and 29, Heriot Row, Newtown, Edinburgh.

D.A.

The Perfect Foreskin

In response to your rather good idea in Issue 5, just received.

I have spent 26 years with a thick elephant's trunk, and the last 28 years with a quite acceptably circumcised penis. If I could return to the uncircumcised state I would, happily, provided that the foreskin was thin and of such a length that it covered the glans when flaccid, but to the extent that the very tip was just protruding by a centimetre or so. The opening would be tight enough to prevent retraction on erection without assistance, but the skin would be sufficiently elastic for the foreskin to be comfortably retracted when wanted, and would therefore remain retracted until manually pulled forward. The perfect foreskin!

J.R. – Diss

[Thanks for the offer J.R. of further cuttings etc. You could have them back by next post. — D.A.]

Urethral Stimulation

I am happy being circumcised, though just sometimes I wish I had a long foreskin. I have had some very pleasurable experience of urethral stimulation by passing a soft rubber catheter down my erect penis to the level of my testicles, whereupon I have always ejaculated. I am prepared to write about it if you wish. I believe the practice is very dangerous, but I do know of others who do it apparently with impunity. I am also very interested in penile piercings, particularly of the Prince Albert type.

M.D. – London

[We're always happy to hear of any habits or experiences, although this one has me squirming a little as I write. — D.A.]

Saga (Continued)

Later still, Mary gave me a fuller explanation. Apparently the surgeon had achieved a method of doing partial circumcision. "Have you ever heard of that?" Nothing sprang to mind, but later I remembered some Forum correspondence, where it was explained in answer to a reader's query, that circumcisions must be complete, so that the scar lies safely and relatively immobile behind the corona, not up around the glans, where constant, albeit slight, movement would hinder neat and clean healing at the very least. I happened to see young Michael later in his home, and had a look. He had healed by now, but the cut could be seen clearly enough. Should one have been troubled by phimosis, yet desired the retention and use of his foreskin, I should have said that the results would have been most satisfactory, provided of course that they were successful.

I knew that poor little Michael had been shuttled to and fro to the hospital for seemingly endless consultations with a rather unsympathetic English chief medical officer, and over the next eight or nine months or so, I thought he was going to be left alone. But no, the elderly Indian surgeon was appointed, and back again he went.

We were all together one evening at a barbecue which was also attended by my old American friend, Joe. Being alone, I tended to be kept away from any family matters and gossip, so my ears pricked up when Jennifer slipped away for a few minutes and returned saying, "Not very happy!" with a big smile, and, to Joe, "Our son has just been circumcised for the second time!!!. It's been done by a good old Indian, who's probably been doing it all his life." Apparently he was sitting up watching a video with his little sister, who was absolutely fascinated by what she saw – and not the video – and wanted to attack it. Jennifer said, "He'll thank us for it one day." – a true-blue circumcisionist. All this started Joe off on a story about how he was invited into a US army hospital in Germany by a surgeon friend to watch the fun.

Apparently, many of the blacks asked for it, 'because the girls liked it'. Too many it seemed for the surgeon who, to relieve the monotony, fell to varying the method of stitching around the circumference.

(To be continued)

ACORN

1992 Issue No 7

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Survey Results	D.A.	Page 2
Penis Trouble	R.F.	Page 5
Happy Schooldays	J.T.D.	Page 6
Alternative Preference	A.W.	Page 8
Another Preference	J.A.	Page 9
Aborigine Ritual	P.D.	Page 10
Dick	Miss J.S.	Page 13
Saga (continued)		Page 14

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

To try to streamline our efforts in the future, we would request that all contributions for the newsletter and letters to other members be addressed to me, DAVID ACORN, while all correspondence to do with membership, fees, or personal matters be addressed to TONY ACORN. In each case the same P.O. Box 113 be used. This is because we live a long way apart and time and postage is wasted transferring items. This routine will always be on the title page of each newsletter.

The questionnaire is as complete as we're going to get it, so I've printed it in full in this edition. I hope you'll all spend many happy hours poring over it and finding something to your satisfaction.

I get one or two letters, from both sides of the fence, that I can't publish because they are either too vitriolic or abusive to other members' viewpoints and opinions. If I did I know it would escalate, polarise, and eventually destroy all that we've built up, and I'm sure none of us want that. So, to those people, I would say, please make your points without going over the top or being repetitive.

Having got all that off my chest, read on.

D.A.

Survey Results

We have had 49 replies to the questionnaire, many thanks to everyone who did. I'm reprinting all of them as a finale.

The subject preferences now look like this:-

More/OK/Less

38	3	3	observations of foreskins/circumcision
35	5	2	foreskin problems/advantages/pleasures
34	4	3	contact with other Acorn members
30	4	7	masturbation techniques
30	4	8	circumcision operations/descriptions/methods
28	6	7	stories beginning "I first found out about foreskins/circumcision when...."
28	4	9	discussion of reasons for/against circumcision
24	9	8	penis size etc.
21	9	8	intercourse – male and/or female aspects
20	6	12	erections/staying power/premature ejaculation
16	8	12	sexual identity (hetero/bi/homosexual)
12	6	17	sexual fantasies

Replies are arranged with the most popular topics at the top. Other topics of interest were so numerous that it would be best to say that any subject regarding the genitals is of interest to someone.

What has surprised me is the number who would like more contacts. There has always been space available, and those who have advertised have been very pleased and surprised with the response.

With Foreskin – 15

Age	Erect	Flac	Glan Circ	Foreskin			Pleased Indif Sorry	Identification
				a	b	c
26	6.8"	5.0"	4.8"	e	s	l	P	GL – Leeds
45	6.3"	4.5"	5.0"	e	s	l	P	AD – Oxford
62	7.0"	5.0"	4.8"	e	s	a	S	RGB – Leeds
45	4.0"	2.3"	4.3"	e	s	l	I	HC – London
48	5.0"	3.0"	3.8"	e	s	l	–	Anon
35	6.0"	4.0"	5.0"	e	s	a	I	NG – Norwich
54	7.0"	5.0"	6.0"	e	s	s	P	DA – WsM
29		U/Av		e	s	l	S	JK – Wales
71	6.5"	5.5"	5.5"	e	s	l	P	JTD – London
25	6.5"	3.5"	6.2"	e	s	l	S	SDG – Stafford
72	7.0"	5.0"	6.0"	e	s	l	P	HJM – Mid Glamorgan
45	6.5"	3.5"	4.8"	e	s	a	S	AGT – London
77	7.1"	2.7"	5.1"	e	t	l	S	RF – Tayside
33	6.0"	3.0"	4.5"	e	s	l	S	ME – London
26	7.0"	5.0"	5.0"	e	t	l	P	KL – London

Foreskins

a – hard or easy to retract

b – tight or slack at the end

c – longer, as long as or shorter

It will be seen that no one has any trouble with their foreskin, and that they are all as they should be in the natural state. The only surprise I think is the length of the foreskins, which don't grow at puberty like the rest of the penis, so that, nationally, a high percentage overall are slightly behind the glans tip.

Circumcised – 34

					Scar	Scar	Ple
			Glan	Op at	Even	Behind	Ind
Age	Erect	Flac	Circ	Age	Uneven	Glans	Sor	Identification
31	7.0"	4.5"	6.5"	27	E	0.1"	P	DJ – Gwent
24	6.0"	3.5"	4.7"	3	E	0.1"	I	SK – N. London
62	7.7"	4.5"	5.0"	1	E	1.0"	I	MDSS – London
66	7.5"	5.5"	5.5"	43	U	0.1"	P	AW – Sussex
53	5.8"	4.0"	3.2"	39	U	0.5"	P	GL – Germany
48	6.0"	3.0"	6.0"	31	E	0.4"	P	PD – Dublin
49	4.7"	4.0"	5.1"	20	E	0.4"	P	JW – France
34	6.0"	4.0"	5.0"	24	E	0.75"	P	JGC – Lancs
	4.8"	2.4"	4.2"	22	E	1.0"	P	JH – Finland
31	6.1"	4.2"	5.5"	31	U	0.5"	P	JM – Middx
32	5.8"	3.9"	4.2"	31	U	0.0"	S	JA – York
42	7.0"	5.5"	6.0"	41	U	2.0"	P	JBT – Westcliff
42	6.5"	4.5"	5.0"	41	E	1.0"	P	RH – London
69	7.5"	5.0"	5.5"	58	E	0.75"	P	CP – Devizes
58	6.3"	4.0"	6.4"	44	U	0.5"	P	SW – Gwent
41	6.0"	4.0"	5.0"	32	U	0.5"	–	PJ – Shropshire
28	7.7"	5.0"	6.2"	18	E	0.5"	P	BH – Suffolk
41		Av		26	E	1.0"	P	Brian – W. C'ntry
46	7.0"	4.0"		31	E	0.5"	P	RJL – Whittlesey
37	7.5"	6.0"	7.5"	19	E	0.5"	P	PH – M. Keynes
54	5.9"	3.5"	4.5"	33	E	0.75"	P	WM – Kingston
53	5.8"	3.0"	5.3"	26	U	1.0"	P	JR – Norfolk
49	6.2"	3.0"	5.0"	2	U	1.0"	S	Anthony – Devon
40	5.3"	3.0"	4.7"	0	E	1.0"	P	IW – Dorset
52	6.5"	5.0"	4.0"	0	U	1.0"	P	GP – Perth
58	6.3"	2.0"		0	U	0.3"	I	RH – London
59	7.5"	4.5"	6.0"	0	E	0.5"	S	RW – Sussex
77	7.0"	2.0"	5.8"	0	E	1.0"	I	HM – Colchester
81	6.3"	4.0"	4.5"	0	E	–	S	V – Shropshire
61	6.5"	4.5"	4.7"	0	E	1.0"	S	Anon – London
32	7.0"	4.0"	5.0"	0	E	1.5"	P	NA – London
64	4.8"	3.0"	4.7"	51	E	0.75"	P	JC – Ayrshire
73	6.0"	4.2"	5.5"	22	E	0.6"	P	GJ – Devon
48		Av		20	E	1.0"	P	JM – Spain

If you care to work out the averages for sizes I think you will find there is hardly any difference in each state.

Sexual Status

Heterosexual 15

Bi-sexual 16

Homosexual 18

No-one can say we aren't a representative lot.

D.A.

Penis Trouble

From early schooldays I became aware that while most boys could retract their foreskins, or had their glans permanently exposed, my penis was just like an elephant's trunk. As I got older, and erections became more frequent, the tight foreskin became ever more frustrating. Despite determined efforts at retraction I could only just expose the meatus, until, at the age of 12, with a really savage pull, the glans suddenly popped out like a snowball. After the shock I cleaned off the smegma, then tried to return the foreskin, but it had puffed up and would not move. Fortunately I fell asleep, and by morning things were back to normal, but it was some time before I risked a repetition. Eventually, by the time I married, I had achieved a reasonable degree of mobility, but in one way or another my foreskin was a source of annoyance.

At the age of 35 I eventually asked my G.P. about circumcision, but he said that for an adult it was a very unpleasant procedure, and instead he advised me to immerse the complete organ in hydrogen peroxide. I then decided that I would attempt permanent retraction of the foreskin. For a while it was in a state of flux – it would suddenly without warning rush forward, trapping pubic hairs, which I found I had to keep short to avoid unpleasantness. After about 6 months of perseverance my foreskin did stay permanently retracted, due, I believe, to an expansion of the corona, and has remained so ever since for a period of over 40 years (I am now 77).

This condition I find infinitely preferable to my earlier condition, but there are two snags. The rolled up skin behind the corona tends to harbour some smegma, though it is easily cleaned. What was the original tight tip of the foreskin now forms a constricting band, permanently red, behind the corona, and although it looks sore it has never given any trouble.

Soon after retiral I heard that adult circumcision was becoming more available, and I became interested, as I felt that it would be a distinct improvement in my case. However, not knowing where to go, I drifted on, and I gather that surgeons are not keen to deal with my age group, although it is not long since I had a hernia operation with complete success.

I was particularly interested in the method followed in Argentina (Acorn 1/92) which includes the removal of the frenum. I have always considered the frenum to be a useless item which, far from being ultra-sensitive, in my case at least, merely distorts the shape of the glans.

Finally, I mention two items which may be of interest. When I was with a party being shown some of the wonderful exhibits in the Cairo Museum, our lady-guide showed us a stone circumcision table, pointing out the groove for the blood to run in, and the cup for the ring of detached skin. The table, beautifully made like all the other exhibits, was said to be 4,000 years old.

Secondly, a few days ago, a sports writer in an article about the forthcoming Tour de France cycle race, said that an uncircumcised rider had an advantage in that, if he were asked to provide a urine sample for test, the smegma beneath his foreskin was thought to have a neutralising effect on any residual drug that may be in the urine. This seems rather unlikely.

Personally, I can see no advantages in a long foreskin, only disadvantages; and it seems to me a pity that the trivial operation of circumcision, which benefits a male for the rest of his life, cannot be made universally obtainable. Human nature being what it is, there will always be complainers, but I do feel that the objections to circumcision are based on sentiment, and to some extent on religious prejudice, rather than on fact.

Congratulations on your interesting and well-balanced newsletter, which sheds light on problems which are normally swept under the carpet.

R.F. – Tayside

Happy Schooldays

Reading M.W.'s contribution headed 'Wanker Watching' reminded me of an episode in my late teens. Actually, remind is the wrong word. I have never forgotten it and often thought of it. But, although in contributions to Acorn and Forum, I have written about most of the things of a sexual nature which occurred in my life, I have never written about or mentioned this to anyone before. Somehow, I believed that what we did was unique, and that if I told, people would think that I fantasise.

It started at high school (about 53 years ago). It was an all boys school, and we were sitting in pairs on school benches. One day my friend Bruno indicated that he had a hole in his trousers pocket, and that he was touching his cock in this way. He invited me to verify this, and when I touched him he promptly came in my hand. Next day I told him that I too had a hole in my trousers pocket, and from his sideways glance I guessed that he was anxious to see my cock, which I made to protrude slightly. Our form-master guessed that something untoward was going on between us in class and we were split up. I then invited Bruno to visit me at home. He was at first reluctant, guessing what would happen, but finally gave way and came. We soon had our cocks out and he came almost immediately. Now I had a girl of the same age as myself as a friend. Our mothers were friends and we had been together from babyhood on, so, to call her a girlfriend would be wrong. When we came into puberty, she led me on, and we did the "I'll show you mine if you show me yours" thing. (Although my mother was not ashamed to show herself in the nude to me and I got into her bed frequently, I had never seen female pudenda closely. I was amazed at the very pronounced labia and the projecting clitoris that I was made to examine when Lore started this thing. Of course, I didn't know what all these parts were called, or their role. Lore made me touch her, and was delighted when I was disgusted with the smell.) However, as she was curious, I thought I would bring her into a meeting with Bruno. I also had a real girlfriend, Wanda, and she really wanted to see cocks. So one day, Bruno, me, Lore and Wanda had a get-together, and examined cunts, cocks, budding boobs and bottoms. The girls were fascinated when Bruno first, and I later, ejaculated. They loved to touch our cocks and particularly remarked on the silky feeling of the skin.

Unknown to me, a few of the boys in class had got together to form a mutual wanking group. I guess they came to hear of our exploits. There was one Jewish boy in class with me who had been circumcised. He was the only roundhead, and therefore an object of interest at all times. The idea of introducing girls into the masturbating sessions excited all and sundry. In no time, sisters and their friends were nominated, and the masturbating circle became multisexual. After a first very exciting exploratory session, with each sex doing their own thing, a game was invented. The girls were to do the masturbating of the boys. The boy ejaculating first was the loser, and the girl getting her boy to come last also was a loser. The boy who could resist longest was the winner.

When the great day of the contest arrived, dies were cast to apportion girls to boys. The girls were allowed to position the boys the way they wanted, and allowed to do it the way they chose. I did not realise that by that time Wanda had progressed beyond anything that I knew of her before (she later prostituted herself as a 17 year-old just for the price of a cinema ticket). We had all started, when Wanda asked the Jewish boy to stand on a chair, and there was a gasp as most girls stopped, when she proceeded to take Carl's cock in her mouth and began to suck him. Of course he didn't stand a chance and came first. Wanda had won. However, none of the other girls emulated her. Bruno came next, and I lasted a good while but did not win – my girl was much too good, and the sexual excitement of all that was going on was too much for me. The winner of the boys got to have sexual intercourse with the losing girl, and we were allowed to watch. The winner of the girls could choose three boys who had to take her out. What happened after that I don't know, because the whole thing came out and we were all called in front of the headmaster. Heavy punishments were doled out, and parents and teachers made certain that our little group had to stop.

J.T.D. – London

Alternative Preference

Dear David,

In Acorn 5 you invited members to describe their preferred equipment, assuming their present condition to be reversed. As an ex-cavalier the choice is easy. So here goes:

If I had to reverse my present condition, I would choose to have a short foreskin, leaving part of the glans visible at all times, and retracting naturally during erection. To improve mobility, the frenum should be minimal or completely absent, allowing the skin to be worn 'back' or 'forward' as desired.

With such a foreskin I might have saved my money, but I doubt it.

I also enclose an open letter to Brian of the West Country.

Dear Brian,

I would like to comment on the questions raised by your letter in Acorn 4.

1 & 2/ Acorn membership has never been large. Circumcision is a delicate subject with probably the majority of persons hearing of Acorn being too shy to admit their interest. All specialist organisations have a hard core of loyal members, but an annual turnover of 30% is common, most 'dropouts' being within two years of joining.

3/ Not everyone has literary abilities, and transforming one's ideas into well turned prose takes time and trouble; and how does one avoid repeating what another contributor has written on this necessarily limited subject?

4/ A fine idea. Introductory and informative leaflets should be available to members (and others) at a reasonable cost, and should cover:-

- a/ background information on circumcision.
- b/ description of the operation.
- c/ indications for, and pros and cons of circumcision.
- d/ directory of circumcisers.

5/ a/ Low profile advertising in suitable popular and professional magazines is fine, but care must be taken to avoid adverse interest and publicity in the media.

b/ Approaching acquaintances on this delicate subject could be deemed an invasion of privacy, and cause offence.

I appreciate your concern to increase public and professional awareness of the subject, and consider efforts should be made to interest the medical, health and sex counselling sectors also.

Finally, congratulations on losing your frenum, a useful but often overlooked modification which is worthy of a short article in a future issue of Acorn.

A.W. – Sussex

[As a postscript to this letter, if you are a potential 'dropout', don't do it too lightly. Please drop us a line and tell us what would be required for you to stay a member.

Also, please don't be deterred because you have difficulty writing your ideas, or you worry about your spelling. You are certainly not alone, and one of my most enjoyable tasks is transforming into publishable material. All I ask is that I can read the writing. – D.A.]

Another Preference

You asked in the last newsletter for members to describe their ideal penis if they were forced to have the opposite state to that which they have now. In fact I would jump at the chance to have a penis with a foreskin as I only reluctantly underwent the operation due to having a totally unretractable foreskin.

Length and thickness of the shaft are not of great concern to me, as long as they are not too much below average. Much more important is the appearance of the foreskin and glans. In the flaccid state I would like the foreskin to fully cover the glans, smoothly tapering to a smallish opening about half an inch beyond the glans tip. It would not be wrinkled, giving a sleek, streamlined appearance to my cock. On erection the foreskin would not slip back of its own accord. Instead, the outline of the glans would become prominent beneath the taut skin covering, with just the tip becoming visible through the small opening, inviting manual assistance to release it from its sheath. The opening, though small, would be very elastic, allowing the skin to be fully retracted without difficulty, revealing a shiny purple knob.

Such a foreskin has two advantages as I see it. Firstly, the act of sliding the skin back or forward has to be a deliberate act, giving great pleasure as the tight ring of foreskin slides over the sensitive glans. Secondly, on full retraction the skin clips into place behind the glans rim, allowing it to remain back as long as desired, even when flaccid.

I seem to remember these characteristics being quite common among my schoolfriends before puberty, but it seems that most foreskins become shorter and looser in adulthood.

J.A. – York

[This next contribution is about ritual circumcision with a difference. It is told by a white schoolteacher in a letter to a friend, and although I'm against cutting or altering any contribution, I'm doing it this time, mainly the beginning, because I think it might be outside the law. But different cultures have different attitudes, so, because it appears to be an integral part of the ritual, I am leaving a bit in.]

Aborigine Ritual

About ten days before Easter, David's father came across to the school to talk to me privately. He told me that David was to have his first initiation rite on the first morning of the long week-end, and that he wanted me to be his sponsor. He then went on to explain that the custom in his tribe was for the initiate to spend the eve of his initiation in sexual intimacy with his sponsor, and could I see my way clear to carry out that necessary function. I asked for a day or two to think about it. After speaking to David though, I realised that the request was genuine, and agreed, much to David's delight.

After dinner on the Thursday night, David accompanied me back to the school, where we showered together. Then I read to him for awhile before we climbed into bed together. He knew what was expected of him, and after I had made love to him gently he accepted it without question.

In the darkness of the wee hours we were woken, and in company with David's two older brothers who had returned from secondary school, drove out of town to a dry creek bed some ten miles away. While the family all stripped naked, I retained my briefs, not so much from modesty, but to hide my uncircumcised status, and we collected wood to make a large fire in the sand. This was mainly boree and brigalow, whose ashes I discovered later are regarded as having strong medicinal qualities. Then we all sat quietly until the fire had burned down to a bed of glowing embers. David was naturally tense, but tried not to show his fears for what was to be done to him.

A little before dawn the tribal initiator arrived with his young apprentice-cum-assistant. David was beckoned towards the fire and lay on his back in the sand, with his legs wide apart and his head resting in my lap. Then, as the sun's first rays lit the tops of the trees, the old man held up an old razor blade and commenced a short incantation, which was for the blade to cut clean and true.

Before the coming of the white man, the instrument would have been a knife chipped from hard flint, and even in these days the initiation would be accompanied by a great deal of tribal singing and dancing. But, because he had some European blood, David was denied these rituals and the revelations of secret tribal lore which is associated with ritual entry into manhood.

So the old man knelt between the boy's legs and gripped the point of his generous foreskin, while the two elder boys knelt beside to restrain him if he should try to struggle. However, David remained perfectly still as his foreskin was stretched out to a quite remarkable length. Then the old man sliced into the taut preputial integument with a skill born of hundreds of such operations.

David's body went rigid and his face screwed up against the searing pain, but when the fifth or sixth such slice saw the unwanted foreskin detached from his penis he made no sound of protest. The shaft of his penis withdrew into his groin while the head lay bleeding freely, the blood dripping down over his scrotum into the sand, while he was congratulated and highly praised for his bravery.

The assistant now went to the fire and scraped up a handful of fine warm ashes. This was applied copiously to the gaping wound in the skin of the penile shaft, and the bleeding stopped almost as if by magic. Those ashes certainly had some extraordinary qualities, as, despite the lack of stitching and proper sterile procedures, his penis suffered no infection, and was well enough healed for him to be on his feet the next day, and resumed school on the tenth day.

When his penis was healed it was clear that very little of his foreskin remained, while the scar was a ring of rough tissue up to a quarter of an inch wide round the shaft, a result of the wound not having been sutured. Five weeks later the second and more rigorous part of his initiation was carried out.

This started the same as the last, with him sleeping with me, and going in the night to the same spot. The fire was the same as before except for the inclusion of two large smooth stones in it. The other variation was that, when David lay in the sand, his arms and legs were held firmly, and it made no difference if he should cry out during the ceremony. The instrument was the same used razor blade as before.

At the moment of sunrise the old man handled David's penis until it was fully erect. Then he gripped the shaft tightly in his fist leaving only the engorged glans exposed. David tensed in anticipation as the blade was positioned at the lower extremity of his meatus, and without further ado the old man sliced deep into the flesh, opening the urethra from the meatus down to the base of the glans in one firm slowish motion. The lips of the wound seemed to spring apart, the blood gushed freely over his lower stomach and upper thighs, and David screamed from the tearing, searing agony of the cut.

There was no delay with the ashes this time. David continued to sob from the pain, and as fast as the medication was washed away by the bleeding, more was applied until it stopped after a few minutes.

His next eldest brother then stood up and in a loud voice called on the old man to come and cut his subincision down to the root. The opening of the glans was compulsory, but it was considered more manly to have the shaft opened along its full length. Andrew stood with his feet planted firmly in the sand, gripped his penis by the divided glans, and stretched it upwards against his stomach. The old man then simply knelt in front of him and sliced open the urethra from the base of the glans to the top of the scrotum. Bleeding profusely from his mutilated penis, Andrew lay beside his young brother and had the wound packed with ashes.

Like the eldest brother, Andrew was more Aborigine in appearance and in the measure of his penis, and, on looking at the others there, I noticed that all four had been completely subincised, and that each had a penis which was short and stubby and extremely broad in relation to its length.

About an hour later both boys began to groan aloud again from the pain and this was the cue for the two rocks to be rolled out of the fire. Each squatting astride one of them, the boys began to urinate on the red-hot surfaces. Steam rose copiously, enveloping their groins as they emptied their bladders, not without the extreme discomfort of the acid stinging their open wounds. Apparently the steaming eased the pain, and they were then again packed with ashes.

It was nearly a month after the operation before David felt comfortable enough to start masturbating again.

[The author was writing all this as a letter to a friend, and continues]

I hope that everything is well with you, but I suspect you will now be sitting with a rather sore penis and a new meatus well back towards the top of your scrotum. I will be looking forward to a detailed description of how you performed the operation if that is not too much to ask, and particularly how you would rate the level of pain as you cut into flesh between your urethra and the bottom of your penis.

Actually, when I performed a small superincision on my own glans, I found that it hurt more than when I made small extensions to my subincision, and that it was more difficult to control the bleeding there. I originally cut back about 5 or 6mm, but about half of it healed up again. That was quite some years ago and I had no idea how to control the bleeding. In an operation I performed on a part-Maori chap in Rotorua in 1988, I used a solution of alum and vinegar which proved to be fairly successful, and have since been sent some silver nitrate sticks from America. However, I haven't been moved to extend my own subincision in recent times and try them out, but I would eventually like to have my glans bisected completely.

I have read of the button-hole circumcision as performed by certain tribes in Africa and found it quite fascinating. I would be interested to know what you perceive as being a Muslim circumcision, as those I have read of consisted of a simple stretch-and-slice method, apart from the drastic Bedouin practice of flaying the entire shaft of the penis.

Sent by P.D. – Dublin

Dick

Just for a laugh my boyfriend bought the video, Dick. It's an absolute scream and, although it only lasts 15 minutes, you get to see more dicks than most girls see in a lifetime. For those who don't know of the film, it consists of a rapid series of dick shots in closeup – and a more pathetic bunch of floppers you couldn't imagine! With few exceptions they are either wizened, wrinkled, tiny, distorted, bent or misshapen in some way, and some look downright shabby. Heaven knows where the producer found his subjects – a down and outs' hostel I should imagine. If I believed them to be representative of the male sex as a whole, I think I'd turn lesbian! A raving feminist couldn't have dreamt up a more convincing put-down.

The film was shot in the U.S.A., I'm told, which accounts for the fact that most of the dicks portrayed are circumcised, and it has to be said that this is often the cause for their odd appearance. Although some people are said to prefer the appearance of circumcision, I'm sure it's really an acquired taste. I certainly wouldn't want my boyfriend done. Some of the cocks in the film have the most unsightly bunches of scar tissue behind their glans, like twisted elastic bands, or all rough and traumatised like a ploughed field – not the least bit appetising.

I had some of the girls in the other night to see the film, which caused much hilarity. Afterwards we had a lively discussion, with a couple of them saying they thought circumcision might be a good idea from the hygiene point of view. However, when I asked them to consider it, not from their own point of view, but from a man's, i.e. as if they were a man, both said no. They thought that there would be less to play with and less enjoyment.

Only one of the dicks in the film came close to reality as I know it, and that was a fairly normal looking one with a longish foreskin; but even that was spoiled by being too short overall and having a long fat underlip of skin which stuck out rather ludicrously.

Other uncircumcised dicks included one tiny one with only a pinhole in the tip – a clear case of phimosis, and one whose foreskin was longer than the rest of his cock – it had a huge padlock in the tip.

The commentary consists of remarks made by women from both sides of the Atlantic and Australia, and what they say is almost as side-splitting as the pictures! They obviously feel as contemptuous of the specimens trotted out in the film as I do, because they pointedly say they prefer them a decent size.

Miss J.S. – Croydon

[I have a copy of the film, and must concur completely with this letter about the dicks in the film. However, knowing how the film was made (Jonathan Ross programme, where the director was interviewed), I can understand it. The men were asked to go into a booth (like our passport photograph booths), drop their trousers and – snap. All bunched up as in their underpants, with no time to caress them lovingly into their most photogenic attitudes. For those of us who love the look of a penis, both cut and uncut, it is a very cruel film, and I think was meant to be, in answer to the way women's genitals are displayed in girlie magazines.

I have been asked by several members on how to obtain a copy. It is distributed by Polygram Video, 083 266 3, and can be ordered from W.H. Smith for a cost of about £6. — D.A.]

Saga (Continued)

By now I almost felt part of our hospital, and, in truth, to an extent I was. With a now regularly functioning theatre, it all seemed so easy in principle, yet how to make the initial approach? Also I was very put off by the prospect of a general anaesthetic: even vasectomies were being done under them, and I didn't fancy the sound of the old man, despite Jennifer's glowing allusion. But I was becoming increasingly nervy with what I sensed was the inevitable approach of the occasion, even becoming uncomfortable in other men's presence, always wondering what their state was.

Then I heard of a new surgeon with UK experience, and reports of him sounded good. I happened to be introduced to him socially, and somehow I knew that this was to be my circumciser.

I had always thought of a vasectomy as a good idea in principle, and it seemed to offer an ideal 'cover' under which to initiate things. As casually as I could, I broached the subject of it to one of my medical colleagues, and he answered straight away, and completely matter-of-factly, "We can do that for you." Some two or three months had to pass before I could be free, and then a consultation was arranged, primarily to set a date. When I was almost ready to go, I said, unnaturally calm, "Could you do a circumcision at the same time?" The surgeon just stooped down (we were both on our feet) and wrote my name in his diary, 'Vasectomy and Circ' I could hardly believe my eyes! I walked out and drove home on air. The only slight hesitation had come when I asked for all to be done under a local.

Still two or three weeks were to pass, but, at long last, I began my preparations. I borrowed a good camera, and started to get used to having my foreskin forward once again, as the last thing I wanted was last-minute awkward questions. I kept it so for longer periods than ever before, and eventually, to my surprise, it became positively uncomfortable. But exactly why I am not too sure.

I took as many representative photographs as I could of the 'old order', but was in such a nervous state that I set the focusing somewhat inaccurately. Then I shaved carefully and as completely as I could.

After a surprisingly good night I drove calmly to the hospital for the 0630 admission time. I really felt that, at last, all the hassles were over, and resolved to enjoy the whole experience – after all, I'd waited for it long enough.

I went in along the familiar passages, to be greeted with smiles. I was expected, and knew everyone to a greater or lesser extent. I sat down for a blood pressure check, which was sky high despite feeling icy calm. During the check I glanced around and saw the day's theatre list. Sure enough, my name was at the end – 'Vasectomy and Circumcision'. No more secrets now! I wondered how far it would go afield and what people would think.

I undressed and hopped up onto the high bed, settling down to read a magazine and wait. All the routine pre-op procedures gradually took place (what a difference from the quick visit to the doctor's surgery): more shaving, enema and form-filling. The latter was the acceptance of a general anaesthetic, so I did not sign, but this minor misunderstanding was sorted out when the surgeon appeared. Prior to this, Susan had appeared. I suddenly became aware of her regarding me with a quizzical smile, doubtless wondering what on earth I thought I was up to. After she explained that 'it' was normally done under a general in the UK unless time pressed, I reaffirmed my wish, and she just said, "Tough cookie." which made me think a little. I really imagined that, for me, the whole thing would be a walkover compared with some of my experiences in dentists' chairs.

Now, for the first time since my tonsil op, I was being wheeled along a hospital corridor, rather an enjoyable sensation actually, and then, theatrically it seemed to me, through swing doors into the theatre itself. I was told to remain passive while I was lifted off and on the respective trolley and beds or tables. I had been in there before on a social visit, and knew it to be very impressive and modern-seeming, but I was slightly amused and rather gratified to hear muzak coming from a loudspeaker somewhere. A clock on the wall beyond my feet stood at 0950.

The surgeon bent down and, from behind his mask and a powerful pair of bifocals, said, "First I will do the vasectomy, then the circumcision." I said, "OK," and wondered fleetingly if he thought I would have a change of heart – at least, vasectomies are supposed to be reversible.

I could see an impressive array of instruments somewhere around my knees and thought, perhaps all my wishes would come true and that I would be able to watch, but I was not really surprised when the ward sister wheeled up two stanchions and stretched a linen cloth between them in front of my face. The surgeon scrubbed up, and then injections, one each side as I remember. In no time he said, "Can you feel that?" – a sharp pain, and I winced, to my shame. The ward sister was by my right shoulder, and she nodded. Seconds later, "Can you feel that?" (What?), and we were off on the great adventure, part one.

I had no idea what was being done at any time, and only remember a stretching sensation at one or two stages, and, near the end, a kind of buzzing noise, which I was told later might have been the cauterisation.

At 1030 the surgeon came up to me again, seemingly from about twenty feet away, and said, "I have completed the vasectomy, now I will do the circumcision." Looking back, I can remember a feeling of detachment at this news. Perhaps the total bodily surrender involved in these proceedings brings about a degree of mental detachment also. Can anyone see a link here with the female love of medical books, dramas, and visits to the doctor?

(To be continued)

There will be another edition out before Christmas and I hope that we can manage some more pages for that. I must thank everyone who has sent in contributions, and if they haven't appeared yet, they will.

If anyone wishes to write to me personally without being published, please feel free to do so. I'll be only too happy to receive them, just say they're not for publication.

D.A.

ACORN

1992 Issue No 8

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Questionnaire Comments		Page 2
The Yanomami Indians	H.C.	Page 4
Revision	D.J.	Page 6
Boyz 'N' the Hood		Page 7
Infliction	P.D.	Page 9
Bolivia	D.P.	Page 11
The Spanish Scene	J.M.	Page 11
Retrieving My Short Foreskin	H.C.	Page 13
Royal Circumcisions	J.M.	Page 14
True or False	H.M.	Page 15
Unhappy	G.	Page 16
Questions for Dr. Ray	J.B.	Page 17
Saga (continued)		Page 18
Penile Enlargement	A.W.	Page 23
Contact Corner		Page 23

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1992 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Here's the last one for 1992, and as promised, a larger one. I hope everyone has enjoyed the issues, and will continue to do so. 90% of them are from, and about, you yourselves, your experiences and your feelings, and I know from my own experience that it is a great feeling telling your innermost thoughts and feelings, albeit anonymously. One member put it so well when he said that when he read the newsletter a kind of brotherly feeling came over him. As for me, the newsletter is a labour of love.

Right – put the wet handkerchief away! Those who have been following 'Henry Pratt' on TV over the last few weeks will have seen the episode where he went to a private school. The prefects lined up all the new boys and made them drop their trousers. A list was compiled of all those with foreskins (there were 13, Henry among them) and they were told that they would all be circumcised. Henry thought it was for real, but it was a mock ritual of the school (circa early 1950's). David Nobbs (apt name), the author, must be one of us. Homosexuality was talked about as the 'in' thing, but it didn't appear to be going on. In fact, Henry's chum said to him one day, "I had a wank this morning. Have you started yet?"

Keep the letters rolling in in the New Year, there's still plenty to be said, I've no doubt.

D.A.

Questionnaire Comments

Here are some more comments that came in with the completed questionnaires:-

Anon.

While I am quite happy being uncircumcised, I dislike my long elephant trunk type foreskin. What I do now is to retract the skin fully, pinch it and pull forward again, so that the foreskin then only covers about  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the knob. This both looks and feels better and, for instance, means that I don't have to pull it back to pee.

I find that masturbation is only possible with the skin pulled back fully, and, with lubrication (usually saliva), applying direct friction to the bare knob, as a roundhead would. I am now finding that my knob is less sensitive than the foreskin itself, which is fairly tender and liable to damage during sex. This is possibly an indication for the 'cut', but I am hesitant because I am not certain how it would change things – for instance, how much sensation is through the frenulum. If circumcised, I would definitely opt for the most radical form, with no skin left at all – otherwise, why circumcise and leave skin behind? I noticed in the page of pictures, from the video 'Dick', published in a magazine last year that, although most were roundheads, many of them seemed to have a ring behind the knob, and very few had the knob totally bare.

[See my comments on this in the last issue. — D.A.]

I am therefore interested in others who are considering the 'cut' or who have recently gone through it; mainly in comparing sexual sensations, both intercourse and masturbation, before and after. I like the foreskin for providing an added dimension to sex, and I like the convertibility of having the skin back or forward (although my foreskin is too long and my knob not sufficiently prominent to keep it retracted all the time), but I would want to have definite benefits in having it removed.

M.E. – London

My foreskin is easy to retract, slack at the end and is slightly longer than my glans. I am sorry about being uncircumcised because I feel the 'cut' organ is much more attractive, and seems more masculine.

K.L. – London

My foreskin is easy to retract when flaccid, although harder when erect. I am pleased about being uncircumcised because my foreskin can be fun. I just pull it back when I feel like having it exposed.

S.K. – N. London

I am indifferent about being circumcised but want to know more.

H.M. – Colchester

I was circumcised at about 6 years old in the local hospital under a full anaesthetic. The scar line is even but sloping. I am indifferent about being circumcised because I have got used to it and it no longer bothers me as it did for about 10 years.

J.C. – Ayrshire

I was circumcised at the age of 51 because I had an unsightly and very tight foreskin, and premature ejaculation was a big problem. I am pleased about being circumcised because I no longer suffer from premature ejaculation and my penis is now cosmetically perfect.

With regard to sexuality, I resent very much society's attitude that all homosexuals are 'mincing poofs', and that homosexuality is regarded as an illness. This is not helped, of course, by the way they are portrayed on television, etc. There are thousands upon thousands of couples in stable relationships, and these relationships go much deeper than just the physical.

I do not accept that it is not normal or that it is unnatural. What is normal or natural for one person is not necessarily so for another. Is it normal and natural for priests and nuns to remain celibate? One could go on and on.

Perhaps I shall write an article for the newsletter some day on the subject.

G.J. – Devon

I was circumcised at the age of 22 by an R.N. surgical specialist for reasons of a special assignment operation abroad in 1941. I am pleased about being circumcised because, family-wise, I was no longer the odd man out, and I enjoy a feeling of well-being.

The Yanomami Indians

Sometimes I tie my penis up against my stomach with the aid of a clothes peg attached to my belt. It is very comfortable and I often go to sleep this way. A small (lightweight) penis like mine stays up easily. With every movement I am conscious of my scrotum.

I got this idea from a (gay) Spanish lover from Latin America called Geraldo, who learnt it from the Yanomami Indians, who live in the Brazilian Rainforests. Geraldo, who had a nice long foreskin, tied up his penis (a decent 5" flaccid) to his stomach permanently. His scrotum, which was very long, swung like a pendulum, and he never wore underpants.

In the early days, he used the cubicles when peeing, but eventually he became so adept and quick at tying and untying his penis that he used the 'stands' again, pushing his trousers down in full view of other men standing nearby, totally unembarrassed.

It transpired that Geraldo, who had a genuine interest in primitive culture, had spent several months (about 10 years before I met him) living amongst the Yanomami Indians. With him was his American friend Alan, an anthropologist writing a thesis on these people.

So as to gain the trust of the Indians more easily, they had agreed to live naked if needs be. On the very first day that they had made contact with the village elder, and gained his confidence, both Geraldo and Alan, in full view of the whole village population of naked men, women and children, had removed their clothes.

These two big Caucasians, with their large physiques, hirsute bodies, big penises and heavy scrotums, were a source of curiosity to the smooth and small Yanomami Indians. The sight of a naked glans was offensive, thus foreskins are never retracted in public. Alan, who was circumcised, and moreover, with an 8" penis and a giant glans, very well hung, was apprehensive that his lack of foreskin might give offence.

The glans' of the Yanomami men themselves, being never exposed except perhaps for brief moments during sexual intercourse or masturbation, were probably a raw liver colour, shiny and damp – the common lot of all fully foreskinned men. But their curiosity about the big cocks of these two visitors, and especially about the pink dry and desensitised massive glans of Alan, made them forget to show disapproval over his non existent foreskin.

It is a sign of friendship to offer the guest one's own penis-string and then help to tie up the guest's penis with it. This the village elder and a younger man (probably his son) proceeded to do. Alan's penis string had to be wound tightly round his corona, causing some discomfort and pain. He never got used to it, and untied it each night before bedtime.

Geraldo took to his penis-string like a duck to water, and has ever since remained permanently tied up. Moreover, his scrotal sac, long, dark, heavy, and pendulous, looked sensual in its unobstructed display.

The above narrative was told to me by Geraldo and I have every reason to believe it true, as it was substantiated by excellent colour photos which he showed me of himself and Alan, both stark naked with penises tied up against their stomachs, surrounded by a sea of small Yanomami Indians, similarly naked and tied up. Geraldo was around here for only about six months, and we met about twice a week. Seeing him undress each time was a big turn-on.

Halfway across the world from the Brazilian rain forests lies Papua New Guinea. The western half is now called Irian Jaya and is ruled by Indonesia. In the Baliem Valley of Irian Jaya live the Dani People. Their sole clothing consists of a penis sheath or gourd, called by them, 'Holim' or 'Horim', held upright by strings around the waist and around the scrotum. The scrotum hangs exposed and free.

Other than on the head, the Dani men remove all body hair, which they consider ugly. Hair removal is done by manipulating two grass fibres between the fingers. Their pubis is hairless, and colour photos show their scrotums to be tight, black and crinkly, and on the smaller side. Perhaps a lifetime of allowing the scrotum to hang loose and uncovered, and subjected to the ferocious heat, has tightened and shrivelled it up. An anthropologist has described the Danis' scrotum as looking like black walnuts.

Their penises are probably not very big, and being still in the stone age, circumcision is probably unknown. Even though married, men and women sleep separately in their own communal huts. Women wear a brief reed skirt barely covering their vulvas, and suckle pigs at their breast as well as babies.

There are other Pacific tribes that wear penis-sheaths too, though the Dani is the most numerous. The Observer recently reported that a tribe had adopted Prince Phillip as a God, and sent him a consignment of penis-sheaths as a tribute, via their local Governor. Buckingham Palace received it.

Another tribe of these Papuan people, the Sambia, practise what anthropologists call 'ritual fellatio'. When a boy is about twelve years old, he begins sucking the cocks of all the healthy virile men in the clan on a regular basis to drink their semen, in the belief that by doing so he will absorb all the desirable masculine qualities on the way to manhood. This habit carries on till he is about 25 years old, which is a tremendous amount of cocksucking. Then he in turn will offer his penis to other pre-pubescent youths. This cocksucking is carried on in private between the two individuals concerned, and is not enacted as a ceremony. But regardless of whether the parties concerned want it or not, it has to be done, and regularly.

Naturally, with so much energy spent on gay fellatio and not heterosexual sex, this tribe is dying out.

H.C. – London

[No dashing for Papuan Airways timetables. — D.A.]

Revision

Many thanks for Issue 5/92, an excellent edition. I thought I'd drop you a line to tell you about my recent experiences and their relevance to your editorial subject.

I was circumcised in October 1988 at the age of 26, having at last found enough information about where and cost, then finally getting time off from work. I went ahead via the S.A.S. in London, and was initially pleased with the result – the scar was about  $\frac{3}{4}$ " behind the glans rim, but was fairly uneven; leaving the frenulum intact. When I had completely healed and settled down (around 6 months later), I found that what was left of my inner foreskin was still overhanging the rim of my glans when non-erect, and was fairly slack when erect. I should mention that I am about three and a half inches flaccid and seven erect.

Having spent the last year in various tropical countries, I was finding that the effect of this was causing irritation again, and so decided, on return to the UK, to go back and have a complete revision. I contacted the S.A.S. again and managed to talk to the surgeon, who suggested a complete revision – and within a week I was there on the table.

We discussed what he could do to help me and what I wanted, so I took the opportunity to ask him in great detail what exactly was possible. I decided to go through with the following:-

All the inner foreskin has now been removed, the scar being around 2mm or less from the base of the glans. The frenulum has been completely removed, again the scar being 2mm. As a result, when I am not erect I have a perfectly smooth shaft skin with no bunching or wrinkles at all, and when erect the skin is extremely taut and very sensitive – far more than before. My wife is absolutely thrilled with the result now that things have calmed down again, and I must admit that I only wish I could have been cut like this in the first place. But it is very pleasing to have tried out a 'standard' circumcision and then be able to alter it later.

D.J. – Gwent

[I don't know who sent the next item in, but I must thank him, as it's not often we have a nationally published article so well done. It comes from the Arts section of The Guardian of June 9th. this year, and was written by Jay Rayner, who collected the prize for 'Young Journalist of the Year'. — D.A.]

Boyz 'N' The Hood: The Uncut Version

Sometime around the middle of 1504, when Michelangelo came to put the finishing touches to his David, the artist appeared to have been overcome by an extraordinary attack of modesty.

Sure, his David was naked, remarkably naked for a lad who was about to go out into the middle of the desert to fling some sharp rocks about. But he wasn't naked enough. David, a Jewish shepherd boy, would have been circumcised; Michelangelo carved him with foreskin intact.

Maybe Michelangelo knew he was no cop when it came to carving glans. After all, he wouldn't have been alone in being stumped by the human body. There are some artists who just can't get hands right. However hard they try, they always come out looking like a bunch of mutant bananas. So they cheat and do their figures with their arms behind their back, beneath the table or in the sink. Maybe Michelangelo hid his failing beneath a foreskin. It's unlikely; Michelangelo was one of the best anatomists in the business.

Perhaps, then, he was overcome by sloth. An uncircumcised penis would certainly merely have meant less effort, a little rubbing with sandpaper to get the detail right. The circumcised variety would have required some heavy-duty hammer and chisel work. "Ah, sod it," he may have thought one hot Florentine afternoon. "What's one tiny foreskin between friends? I'm going for a little lie down." And with that he would have downed tools.

Or perhaps Michelangelo simply didn't find the circumcised penis aesthetically pleasing; maybe he thought it too exposed. He would not, it appears, be alone. There are very few penises in the history of art which appear sans foreskin. In the eyes of the art world, the male nude and his foreskin should not be separated.

At Hamilton's, the photographic gallery off Berkeley Square in London, they have a large collection of male nudes, genitals to the fore. All the penises that appear are uncircumcised. Michael Roberts' two blond adoni, rippling with muscle and foreskin; Bruce Weber's Jeff, Tuscon Arizona, similarly clad.

And then there is Robert Mapplethorpe's Man in Polyester Suit. It is a close-up of an open fly, a length of flaccid penis complete with foreskin, hanging out towards the camera. It is a veritable celebration of foreskin, a tribute if you like. But then Mapplethorpe always did have a thing about the uncircumcised penis. Perhaps it was the rarity value. Up until quite recently almost all American boys were circumcised soon after birth as it was believed to be healthier. As a result, one volume of Mapplethorpe's work, 'The Black Book', has become highly sought after by women art students. Many have never seen an uncircumcised penis and so needed a book of reference.

"I think the uncircumcised penis in art comes from the Greek tradition of sculpture," says Emmanuel Cooper, art critic, and author of 'Fully Exposed: The Male Nude in Photography'. "The shape of the ideal male nude was always linked with sport. He would be muscular, hairless, the penis would be small and uncircumcised. In essence the body would be boyish, and that tradition still remains."

The circumcised penis, apparently, gives off rather a strong message. In the uncircumcised variety, the glans only pops out when the penis is aroused. With a circumcised penis, it is there all the time, flaunting itself. For the timid Greeks, this was all a bit too much. They wanted their heroes macho, not randy.

They would certainly have approved of For Women the new top-shelf magazine for, well, women – its pages fair dripping with oiled male flesh. This seems a circumcision-free zone. Even the artist's impression that appears in the magazine of what Messrs. Kinnock, Ashdown and Major would look like stripped to their basics puts them firmly in the uncircumcised camp. (A press officer at Downing Street refused my request that he ask the Prime Minister if this was, indeed, the case). For Women say that they will always be running a mixture, as they want to please everyone.

At the end of the day, which is often when these things are examined, which version you find more aesthetically pleasing will probably depend on what you know. Those of us who have had the job done may well extol its virtues. Personally, I think the circumcised penis is neater; I also find the uncircumcised model deeply peculiar, an alien slug-like thing which bears no relation to anything I have. That little hood covering the glans personifies English reserve. It is a perfect disguise to hide behind.

Such feelings can run deep. When the video, The Lover's Guide to Sex was released in Israel, many people complained, not because of the explicitness of the title, but because none of the men featured in it were circumcised.

It is pointless raising the subject with women. The majority consider the penis to be a ludicrous organ. What is really needed, they will say, is a total redesign, not cosmetic surgery.

As a Jew, I underwent the ceremony when I was 9 days old. This, I am told, is part of a covenant we, the Jewish people, have made with God. Fine.

What I don't know I won't miss. But there is one question I can't get out of my head: what in heavens name is He doing with all the bits?

Jay Rayner

[The article is accompanied by three pictures, one of David, another of Picasso's 'Two Brothers' and a large one of 'Man in Polyester Suit'. The penis is over 2" long and half an inch thick, in the picture. The foreskin curves right under the glans, and ends with the opening on the top face of the glans, with a little bit of the glans showing. It obviously retracts correctly. The glans rim can be seen through the foreskin but does not alter the slug-like profile, and a large vein runs down the side. The penis, although flaccid, is as long as the hands, which are hanging beside it. A real specimen, and I'm only sorry that it couldn't be copied. Robert Mapplethorpe died from AIDS in 1991. — D.A.]

Infliction

You asked me for further details of my three stage self circumcision (4/92), perhaps not realising that most of those details are already out in Issues C and V, and a fuller version appears under the pseudonym 'Pat' in Alan Thomas's excellent monograph on circumcision. I will not go over the three circumcisions again, but will describe further modifications that I have inflicted on my penis.

There is one penile modification which is described as fully as the literature allows in Alan Thomas's monograph, but which has not been mentioned in the pages of Acorn... subincision of the penile urethra, as practised by many Australian Aboriginal tribes. As with ritual circumcision among other tribal peoples, the reasons for the practice have been lost in myth and folklore, but in the few 'western' articles on the subject, speculation is rife about both the origins and the effects of the modification.

In many more than three stages, I have sub-incised my penis for about two inches from the tip of the glans when flaccid (three inches when erect). From the topside you would never notice any difference: from the side there is a slight excess of skin for about an inch behind the circumcision scar. From the underside there is a slit where the two halves of the glans meet, and a channel about one-eighth inch wide from the back of the glans to the end of the subincision, about half an inch from my scrotum. When I'm erect the glans becomes even more firmly closed, but the groove in my shaft opens to about half an inch wide and deep, and about two inches long, leaving two inches of intact shaft and urethra beyond my scrotum. Contrary to the speculation referred to above, ejaculation within my partner is easy, and peeing is also easy, with a well-formed jet emerging behind my glans. Ejaculation after masturbation is spectacular... I regularly achieve six feet, and have shot it nine feet on one occasion. There is no sensation in the urethral groove, but the frenal skin, which lies either side of the groove, is as sensitive as before. The end of the groove nearest the rest of me fixes the shaft-skin halfway down the shaft.

During the intermediate stages, peeing was more difficult to control than it is now, and ejaculation was no more than a drool because of the persistent closure (by tissue pressure, not healing together) of the subincision in the glans.

I don't think that any sane western male will imitate me (I know of only six that have subincised before me), but just in case any Acorn reader is tempted, a word or two of warning. The first cut(s) to the beginning of the vee under the glans are deceptively easy, and are relatively painless and bloodless. After that point, the urethra proper starts, and while cutting it is less painful than cutting the skin down the median line, the underside of the urethra contains a midline blood sinus, which has none of the usual shut-off mechanisms of veins, and which bleeds profusely, especially on erection. If you cut into it and cannot control the bleeding by cauterisation, or by local stitching, an embarrassing emergency hospitalisation may result.

As some of your readers already know, I welcome correspondence on Acorn matters, and am keen to visit for a chat and mutual inspection any time that I am in the UK.

For R.B.W., who required a recipe for foreskin tightening. This involves some cutting, but no significant removal of tissue, and is the reverse of the operation called the dorsal slit.

1. Pull your neo-foreskin as far forward as it now lies naturally.
2. In both flaccid and erect states, estimate how much circumference you wish to remove.
3. With your foreskin forward, cut along its folded edge, either symmetrically about the top midline, or better, at three points (40, 80, and 120 degrees, viewed from the front), so that the total incision length equals the circumference you wish to remove. You may have to remove a sliver of skin in doing this.
4. Stitch the ends of the cuts together.
5. Pull your narrowed foreskin back to ensure that you haven't given yourself a phimosis, and put in extra stitches into the cuts, which should now lie parallel to the long axis of your penis, to ensure rapid healing without obvious scarring in six month's time.

P.D. (Dr.). – Dublin

Bolivia

First of all, thank you for all your work with the Acorn journal. I always look forward to receiving it. Of course I do not agree with all the views expressed, but life would be very dull without controversy. I have been subscribing to Acorn ever since it started. I am pro-circumcision although not yet circumcised, but I don't believe in universal infant circumcision. I would be interested to correspond with those circumcised as adults, especially if they have had a revision. I have already had some correspondence with other members, which has been thought-provoking and stimulating.

The following item was given to me by a friend who is very pro-circumcision. He has subscribed to a computer Bulletin Board in the States (BBS), where he found it. The BBS was founded for those who are very pro-foreskin, as you will see.

"Message 467

10.05.89 08:50

From: FRANK FORESKIN (SYSOP)

To: ALL

Subject: Bolivian Foreskins

Folder: G. UNCUT men discussions

I just read a most interesting article about Bolivia. It seems that Bolivia has a REQUIREMENT that all citizens of that country must be uncircumcised, and that is written into their national constitution. The article describes the process by which an application for citizenship in Bolivia must prove to an agent of the Department of Health that they are uncircumcised before Naturalisation into Bolivian Citizenship.

Looks to me like Bolivia would be high on the list of places to visit for the foreskin hound."

D.P. – London

[And do they let people die from phimosis etc.? — D.A.]

The Spanish Scene

Some time ago I wrote Acorn a report on the Spanish scene. I explained that circumcision was not carried out on babies and young boys, but noted that, during their school years, military service, college days, and prior to marriage, some 15-20% of the Spanish males have themselves de-hooded. Also I reported that there are adverts in their Yellow Pages for the op. and that doctors advertise for it in the newspapers.

Now in Issue 6/92, a young Spanish chap from Madrid is reported as knowing no Spanish men being circumcised, and never having seen adverts for the op. anywhere. No, I didn't mislead Acorn readers, and having lived in Spain for 22 years, and sure of my facts, a small explanation will clear up the apparent different reports.

In English we have two words: 'foreskin' and 'prepuce', but everyone knows they refer to the same thing. In Spain there are two words: 'circumcision' (Circuncision) and 'the phimosis operation' (operacion de fimosis), and the vast majority of Spaniards do not connect the two at all. They never realise that the circumcision of the Bible, of the Jews and Moslems, of African tribes, and which the Spanish Inquisition burnt people at the stake for practising, is the same procedure that Spanish doctors refer to as the 'phimosis operation'.

Of course, a bright Spanish boy with a medical atlas and a few good dictionaries could figure out that the two terms mean the same thing. Never in his life will a Spanish man hear a doctor pronounce the word 'circumcision' when conducting a medical examination, or when removing a foreskin and sometimes the frenulum too.

I have spoken to a few Spaniards who did connect the two expressions, but most do not. I would assume that the young Spanish chap our editor spoke to in the Canary Islands would have replied differently if the question had been phrased in terms familiar to him.

The teenager spotted on the beach with a newly circumcised organ would probably be surprised (or shocked) if he learned that it was a circumcision that had been done to him. This linguistic strategy serves its purpose well in Spain. Men can get trimmed in a medical setting and no thought/reference or apology to the Jews, Moslems, or the Inquisition need ever trouble anybody.

Today's Barcelona newspaper has 2 adverts for circumcision. Madrid's also has 2, and a provincial paper has three. [He kindly sent me copies. — D.A.] In doing research I have noted adverts for circumcision as far back as 1952.

I don't think I claimed that circumcision was on the increase in Spain. I don't have any evidence for that, but it is about 15-20% of men in their 20's. My own theory is that Spanish men have longer foreskins than most races. Hence, probably more tight foreskins, and perhaps more phimosis, than elsewhere. Also, boys are not taught to retract their foreskins when young. Having inquired of many Spaniards when they first retracted their foreskins, I am impressed by how often the age given is 14. This, by the way, is one of the common ages for circumcision.

One gathers that our editor's conversation with the chap from Madrid was none too lengthy on our subject. He knew nobody done in Spain, seen no adverts anywhere, and had seen no cut cocks in Sweden either. I confess this reminds me of a typical conversation with a Spanish male about our topic.

[How right you are J.M. I had to really push the subject, with those meagre results. — D.A.]. Other nations have men who can write pages. Rare is the Spaniard who can produce a paragraph.

Readers of English language sex magazines know how frequent it is to state a preference for a cut or uncut partner. Since the death of General Franco, contact magazines are everywhere in Spain, but I have never seen a contact (gay or straight) where a preference was stated.

Because circumcision has so little importance given to it in Spain, it is not a taboo subject. I remember a university student some 17 years ago, and I was dying to ask him if he was circumcised. After some months and after he'd had a few drinks I got up the courage to ask him (No, he had not been cut). He realised that I had had to get up my nerve to ask him. He added, "Jimmy, you could have asked me that the first day."

So, while you can't get much information from Spanish guys, you need not delay in picking their brains. From what I learn, Spanish boys don't do much cock comparisons during their schooldays. Foreskin games appear to be non-existent, even though they have foreskins galore. They are not, however, unteachable. But they are always amazed that this can interest American and British men.

J.M. – Spain

Retrieving My Short Foreskin

For 15 years or so I had worn my foreskin retracted, with a desensitised glans. When pulled forward, the upper part was short, and the lower (frenulum) part dangled forward like a duck's beak, and overhung the glans. For a small glans, my frenulum is very thick and highly sensitive.

For the past one and a half years, I've been hanging heavy weights (max. 800 grams) from the frenulum part of my foreskin, at first for titillation, as all this pressure on my frenulum brings on an intense orgasm. My frenulum is so resilient, that it can carry 600 grams for a full evening, and 800 grams for half an hour each time. I usually carry the full 800 grams, with a ten-minute break every half-hour, for a full evening.

Gradually I found my foreskin, especially the shortened upper part, beginning to lengthen again. Perhaps it had just rolled in on itself from frequent masturbation. Now I have a foreskin again, with a slightly crinkly overhang, and a rather open and big, long rosette. My rosette is a dark brown, almost black, colour. Father's very short foreskin was ever a mystery. Maybe this is the explanation too, it had merely rolled in upon itself.

H.C. – London

[Some good drawings here too, which unfortunately can't be copied. — D.A.]

Royal Circumcisions

Item from The Jewish Chronicle, April 9th. 1982

I was intrigued to read in the Sunday Mirror that 'a royal tradition is likely to be broken' if the baby of the Prince and Princess of Wales, expected on July 1st. is a boy.

The paper recalls that for generations all males born into the royal family have been 'circumcised' by a Jewish doctor 'experienced in ancient ritual'. But now the royal family's medical advisers want a royal surgeon to perform the operation. Apparently, medical men who advise the Queen and her immediate family are against the idea of a mohel performing the operation.

The Jewish physician who 'circumcised' Prince Charles was the late Dr. Jacob Snowman, recognised as a world authority on circumcision. The operation on the infant Prince Charles is referred to in Anthony Holden's biography of the prince. Soon after the birth of Prince Charles, on Nov. 14th. 1948, Dr. Snowman was called to Buckingham Palace.

For more than 40 years, Dr. Snowman, chief medical officer of the Jewish Initiation Society, and honorary medical officer to Jews' College, had secretly been called to the palace to carry out 'circumcision' on male members of the family. He passed on his skills to many medical men.

There had to be an intervention by King George VI over Prince Charles' 'circumcision'. Dr. Snowman wrote in his diary, "When Prince Charles was born, the obstetrician, Sir William Gilliat, was anxious that I should perform the circumcision. He had, however, some hesitation because he thought that there might be some court etiquette or tradition which required a surgeon officially attached to the Royal household to perform the operation. When King George heard that the doctors in attendance advised this operation, he remarked that he thought Jewish practitioners were the most expert at that particular surgical procedure."

"The Princess (Now Queen Elizabeth) occupied a first floor suite on the north side of the palace. While scrubbing up in the bathroom of the suite, my attention was directed to a rare example of hygienic refinement. One basin was marked 'hands' and the other was marked 'face'."

Dr. Snowman returned to the palace the next day to see how his royal patient was progressing. While he was in the nursery, Princess Elizabeth came in. Dr. Snowman expressed his great satisfaction that he had been entrusted with the operation on the little prince. The Princess replied, "It was a great satisfaction to us to know that you would undertake it."

Sent in by J.M. - Spain

True Or False

Reference your suggestion in 1/92 [glad to see there's more than one of us browses over back issues, Harry!], and the discussion items listed:-

1. I disagree that masturbation can only be achieved with a fantasy, taking masturbation to mean exciting one's erotic areas to achieve orgasm and/or ejaculation. I understand that infants, prepuberty children, mammals, especially herd members, and some cetaceans, masturbate and achieve some sort of satisfaction (orgasm?), but I doubt that they fantasize.

Speaking personally, I have masturbated from about 3 or 4 years of age. I certainly didn't fantasize – just enjoyed the sensations produced by my manipulations. My first fantasy occurred about the age of 15. My mother had been given a pair of flyless pyjamas by the lady upstairs, that her daughter had outgrown. The daughter was an attractive well-built brunette of about 19. I spent that week riding the crutch of those pyjamas, imagining the daughter as my partner. But, much enjoyment was lost between holding the dream and keeping the sensations active.

Personally, when I need relief or fun, I just rub up, finger and thumb, whole hand, plastic bag – whatever suits. Sometimes lubricated with talcum powder, soapy water, oil or cream, but usually dry, especially if I am riding the mattress.

2. I agree however that fantasies lose potency with time, except where an actual incident is relived.

3. I don't know the answer to this one. Just persevere and don't try too hard. After all, you can't score at everything all the time.

4. I would agree that masturbation is more potent than copulation. Like fantasy, one's concentration is divided between partner's satisfaction and one's own pleasure.

5. Probably. But a cockring should always be 'failsafe'. I make mine with a split, held closed by a U-shaped clip, so that it can be released quite quickly if necessary.

6. Agreed. My frenulum forms a natural piercing between glans and stem. Although it will accommodate a  $1/4$ " ring or rod, a couple of hours use makes it uncomfortably sore – a certain turn-off.

7. Each to his, or her, own. I like hairless quims but only shave my prick and scrotum occasionally. 10 times this year so far, but at intervals of between 12 and 78 days, an average of 34 days. I like the smooth silky feel after shaving and dusting with talc. Sometimes I use my Remington triple head electric dry shaver, but this is rather bulky, although the solid head is safer than the curved foil types which are very likely to graze or nick the skin. But dusting with talc clears this up very quickly. I prefer dry shaving with a Wilkinson twin-blade disposable.

8. No experience yet, but I hope not.

9. Definitely not in my case. The left one is larger, heavier and lower, and, much to my tailor's surprise, I 'dress on the left' too.

10. No comment.

11. No experience.

12. Ridiculous! Taking my definition of masturbation, I've enjoyed it for 74 years and still do. Moreover I love the sensation of my hand on my prick, and the feel of my prick being held in my hand as I walk – hands in pocket.

I hope this helps research, adds information and aids correspondence.

H.M. – Colchester

Unhappy

I was circumcised as a family tradition at 3 months old by the local G.P., "We always have the boys 'done'", "We believe in it" etc. etc. I'm sure my maternal grandmother would have insisted. I was told that my mother had great difficulty in getting the doctor to do it, hence the 3 month's delay. I was circumcised at the same time as a cousin born 3 months later. I suspect the same G.P. capitulated in the face of a combined female onslaught. I know that when the matter was again raised at the birth of the next generation, all of whom remained intact, the story of how they had had to insist was told, and I was expected to be grateful.

The scar line is very uneven, varying  $\frac{1}{4}$ " or so. In places the actual scar line is very neat and in others is very irregular, with lots of brown scar pigment and general disfigurement. Where the scar comes closest to the glans rim, at one point there is a slight adhesion with some scarring of the actual glans rim itself. I have no frenulum and virtually no slackness of skin. I always need a lubricant to masturbate.

It is obvious that I am not at all happy about my circumcision. I was aware of the 'difference' from an early age, and at first followed the family line that my condition made me superior to more common people with foreskins.

As I became sexually active at an early age I soon changed my view, and I am now, at this relatively late age, trying to come to terms with my resentment and anger. However, alongside this resentment, I have an erotic fascination with the whole subject of circumcision. I love to see and examine circumcised cocks, and to study the differing techniques, results, etc. I have found, as a gay man, that, generally, circumcised men have made more satisfying lovers as they have a better 'grasp' of technique.

I am grateful to Acorn for the opportunity to share my feelings on this most sensitive subject.

G. – Birmingham

[Your completed questionnaire arrived too late for inclusion in the final list, but I think you've said it all above except your dimensions which are all average. — D.A.]

Questions For Dr. Ray

Since my circumcision I have a shallow spiral of darkened skin for which I should like an explanation. This is in the middle of a narrow band of lighter skin behind the circumcision scar, in the main wrinkle when totally relaxed.

It is not to be confused with the broader band of darkened skin to be observed just behind the corona on the retracted foreskins displayed in every H. & E., which I know from my own experience to be the area round the tip when unretracted.

My circumcision scar line in the frenal area is in the form of a vee, but is in the opposite direction to the natural vee of the frenulum itself. I should be more than interested to know if this indicates the employment of any particular-named technique.

A last question. How would you rate the chances of success of transplanting the foreskin, or even the whole penis? I thought, albeit briefly, of offering my foreskin, bearing in mind the anguish expressed by some, but I allowed the opportunity to pass. Many Thanks.

J.B. – Oman

[J.B. is the author of 'Saga' and his circumcision operation is contained in the following episode. I was hoping that Dr. Ray would have given his reply in this edition before we went to press, but it looks as though he's got stuck in the dusty archives of the British Museum or the B.M.A. or some such research establishment. Never mind, it'll be in the next. — D.A.]

Saga (Continued)

More injections now, about three or four, and a certain movement round the table. There was to be a spectator, it transpired. Two, to be precise, but one was the anaesthetist taking a busman's holiday.

Throughout my stay, the whole atmosphere, despite the modernity of everything, was redolent of the third world: in this case the Indian sub-continent with a small Filipino minority and a tiny number of locals.

I was just aware of a local approaching the ward sister, who was saying, "Abdullah, come – you want to watch?", in a tone suggestive of his having made his request earlier. He was not, though, to escape lightly, for the ward sister said, "Are you circumcised?" (Grunt). "Where?" "Zanzibar." "How?" (Silence) "How – with a stone?" (Snigger) "With a razor blade in the mosque. I was in agony." "What dressings did you get?" "They dressed it with spirit". He was released from his embarrassment and the conversation became general. "The parents come in too, often." "They don't do it to women." "Some women come in with it done." "Some tribes do." "Why do Moslems do it?" (Most of the staff are Hindu or Catholic). "Better for sex," repeated around with sniggers. Even the surgeon had something to add, although not to the general throng, of which there seemed an awful lot; but to the anaesthetist. "I've done a lot of these," (reassuring, aimed at the patient, I wonder!). Then, "Some people cut here, but I don't" (frenulum, I wonder. No point in worrying now).

Now, another exploratory slice, another sharp pain in, I think, the right side of the foreskin, but very quickly, another, then to work, "Number 11 blade, please." This time I never felt a single thing, and could only speculate about the scene so tantalisingly close behind the linen, until 11:15, when I received the news that my circumcision was complete. What an event! Still, though, I was drained of emotion. After my first urination, he told me, the bandage would become soaked, and I must discard it. I must have looked puzzled, for he raised the cover to reveal a white gauze dressing where once I had a penis, something I had long wanted to see; and also, I must be sure of a daily bath for the first week at least. The stitches would come out unaided – there were none used for the vasectomy. I thanked the surgeon and hoped that I'd not been too tensed up for him – a reason, apparently, for their normally preferring generals. He said that there'd been no problem, and to return for a review in about a week's time.

Back on the trolley to the ward, trying to look nonchalant, to the best cup of tea of my life, and a foil of distalgesic pills to kill the pain. I was told to take one. I thought a moment, and decided that any risk here was worth taking to obtain some insight into what is endured without such benefit by so many. After being chided for not taking it, I hid it, and about half an hour after leaving theatre I felt a fiery pain which was strong enough, to be sure, but not unsupportable. Unlike other wounds in my experience, it did not seem to reduce at all and settle down to a lower level, but, of course, I was forgetting that I had missed that phase, and if this was the 'settled down' intensity, then what I would have felt during the actual cutting must have been pretty impressive.

Until now I had planned to drive myself home, and started to feel that time was slipping away, as the surgeon had said that it was preferable to do so sooner than later. The British nurses, of whom there were a few around, took a hand in the proceedings and applied the veto, so I arranged a lift with colleagues. The particular nurse in question said, "It's a painful operation." Since I had just had two I felt entitled to ask which, although I knew the answer, and she said, "Circumcision," quietly and modestly. Thus, for the second time that morning, I saw the reluctance to use the exciting word – Susan had just referred to 'It', and her free use of it over our coffee table by contrast, reinforced for me my theory that she enjoyed seeing men getting worked up. The other term favoured, as I now know, is 'small op'.

By contrast, the locals and Indians do not seem to have the same inhibition, although it might be possible that, as they were referring to it in the context of a Moslem ritual, they felt no embarrassment. Certainly, when the death of one Sultan's mother was announced on Malay television, the female announcer mentioned that one of her public duties during her life was officiating at the circumcision of the present Sultan, without batting an eyelid.

I digress somewhat, but now I was home and settling down for a bit of peace and tranquillity. And also research of course, to discover as time went by what sort of a job had been done on me. I felt pretty confident, as it was hard to imagine the surgeon varying his technique just for me, and, at the time, I understood that the Moslem was the most radical of circumcisions. I had arrived at 13:30, springing out of the car for the benefit of one of the lady secretaries who was just returning for lunch, and who must have known that I had gone for a vasectomy, anyway, as that had been the reason for my absence.

Nevertheless, I felt pretty unimpressed when I thought back to the Forum letters, which seemed to imply that the writer returned home after circumcision in the doctor's surgery, to an afternoon's digging in the garden.

I rested most of afternoon, resisting any temptation for painkillers – by now, not so hard, actually – and got up at 4pm for a gentle walk round, dropping in for idle chats and cups of tea. It was not so easy to go to bed at my usual early hour, but I got there eventually, and had my first painkillers, two aspirin, at 11pm, followed when again awake by two more at 1.30 in the morning. The pain that I was combating was by now an ache.

I kept a detailed log of progress throughout the first 46 days, and thereafter until 4 days short of a year. What follows is a summary. It includes a record of ejaculations as I needed this before the sperm count. D1 is the day of the ops; 12 o'clock is the site of the frenulum; 6 o'clock the top vein.

The ops took more out of me than ever I thought they would, remembering others' accounts. For the first 5 days I managed the mornings fine, but was starting to feel decidedly seedy by early afternoon, with increased inflammation. I was only to learn the latter's remedy a year later, after the revision.

Early on I described the appearance and effect sought. On the afternoon of the op (D1) I had my first inspection. Even before the dressing came off I could just see where the glans frenulum attachment had been: I could no longer see it, only a little cleft and a spot of blood. Sure enough, the first urination resulted in drops running back and wetting the dressing, so off it came. A sad sight was revealed. The line of stitches was prominent, with swellings surrounding each to give an effect as if the member had been garlanded with a string of sausages. There was a blood blister in the corona adjacent to the end of the dorsal vein, and the whole underside was swollen and inflamed, too much so for an accurate assessment of the fate of the frenulum, although it appeared that the latter had been merely replaced by a stitch.

40% of the scrotum was blackened by internal bleeding. Generally, the effect was that the skin around the cut was swollen, hardened and numbed, and, a little later, also appeared to be shrunken – certainly the usual elasticity was absent for some time.

After two months the swellings were still slowly reducing, the last being the frenal zone, and the penultimate between 10 o'clock and 12 o'clock. This latter would be the main cause of my later revision., I found to my disappointment that this portion folded forward to cover the corona when totally flaccid, whereas the right side seemed perfect.

It also gave me, on the whole, the most discomfort, together with the stitches. A day after the review with the surgeon, who told me to swim in the sea instead of the pool, and to continue the daily bath, and when I had foolishly failed to mention it, and having tried both Adcortyl-A and Cicatrin, I encountered two of our nurses at our club disco (D8). The problem was that it was painful and moist. One would be on duty the following morning and I was welcome to come along.

She asked me to get up on the couch and provide "Access to the desired part." On seeing it she said, "What's this, a hydrocele?" (What's a hydrocele?), then, "That looks normal to me." Not agreeing with my use of Cicatrin, she gave me some gauze dressings and said to wear jockey pants, as the pain was from the vasectomy. As I was leaving she asked me the reason for the op. I said that I had always wanted it done, whereupon she smiled, and seemingly becoming quite excited, said, "Why did you wait until this incredibly advanced age instead of having it done around 18?" I failed to catch her mood, not feeling that much had been achieved, and just said, "When I was 18, if I'd asked for something like that, I'd have been sent straight to the shrink" (not an unjustified comment, I think). With her advice to see the surgeon with any further problems, I took myself off for a swim in the sea. The salt water stung enough for me to be out after about 5 minutes.

To this day, there are small lumps between where the stitches were, although now barely visible. I now know that the cause of all this was the amount of local anaesthetic used, which resulted in swelling during the operation and stitching. Until the revision it was the source of little twinges of pain. The free ends of the stitches began to stiffen out straight on D4, and began to cause a reasonable amount of discomfort which would continue until the last one was out. I mistakenly cut them short near the knot, which increased their rigidity so that they were like pins sticking in, and gave a hedgehog-like effect to see. In the bath they waved around like seaweed. The first dropped out on D6, the last on D28 at the frenulum/scar line (12 o'clock) after 4 days of trying (thank you Forum, for ensuring, through your correspondents, that I didn't try too enthusiastically).

Healing, as such, progressed at varying speeds, the right side being the most rapid and the frenal the slowest. My notes say that I considered it complete on D201, having been the cause of the most abiding discomfort, being tender when pulling out the member for a pee, and also feeling tightly stretched. This would be another motivation for revision; in fact the opening gambit when I drew attention to the tiny tag of skin remaining at the glans end on its own, the rest having been removed.

In the early hours of D5 I was awakened by pain which I thought was from snagging of the stitches, as I had unwisely left off my pants; but clearly it was the first erection that pulled. Some time before D12, I maintained one long enough in the bath for a first orgasm, which had to be achieved by simply rubbing the glans. With the mental joy at what I had at last achieved, I came as near as I have ever done to passing out. D12 had the first recorded one, and an alarming sight it was too. The aforementioned damage to the skin caused stretching sufficient to pull up the covering skin from the rest, and back around the glans so that it was mis-shapen around the erectile tissue and reduced in size, shining as if polished.

Pain in general was generalised at first, then began after 24 hours to localise into:- penis root (injections – or vasectomy?) and stitches, especially where the dorsal vein had been tied off. These began to itch after any had been removed on D7, when the testes also began to ache somewhat.

I kept a careful record of the ejaculations until the magic 30 for the sperm count, which was done on D197. I had hoped just to be able to bring in the proverbial little bottle, but the lab staff asked where I would “collect?” As 30 minutes was about the bogey time, I agreed to “collect” at the hospital. The surgeon gave me the result a few days later, when I mentioned my ‘complaints’. He looked slightly taken aback, but examined, and said, “I can tailor that,” then, “Is it worth it?” I agreed to let things be for a few months.

It was just over a year after the ops that I decided to do something about things. Apart from the little tag left of the frenulum, there was enough of the latter still to pull down on the glans by being less elastic than the surrounding skin, and by being still attached far enough forward on it. Also, the pull on it when extracting for urination was uncomfortable. The flap coming forward to cover the corona was frustrating too.

I was loath to return to the same place, as I found the surgeon a little unapproachable, so I thought at least I could try the easy way out. An attractive Australian lady doctor had been appointed to our local clinic a fortnight after the ops, and I had had cause to mention them. Later we were both together in a group at our club, and, in response to some comment of mine she had said jokingly, "Your circumcision scar?" I felt therefore that at least I would not get an unsympathetic hearing – and what better and more appropriate way of helping to rectify my long-standing 'hangup'?

So, I went along, and sure enough, she heard me out attentively and asked me to sit on the couch for examination, pulling a screen round, and bolting the doors with a smile, as people were always wandering in and out. Although there was food for a multitude of confused thought, I remained icy calm as I displayed what I had always covered for inspections in my youth. She said, "It's here, isn't it?" accurately, and the caress of her fingertips was like dew on burning lips, as she looked at the flap, and then, with two index fingers, gently stretched the remains of the frenulum – I suppose, my most intimate and guarded part. "That's the frenulum, the most sensitive part of a man's penis. It's not normally touched." As I dressed she asked, "Is it cosmetic, or because of discomfort?" I told her a bit of both, really, but I found the rolling forward of the left side when seated annoying. I could be referred to the main hospital, as, "I wouldn't do it myself. I've never done one, although I'd do that little tag", with a dazzling smile. I was disappointed, but not particularly surprised, as I knew she did little skin cancer removals, which are not quite the same thing.

Without delay, I went off to seek out the original surgeon at our own hospital where I found him in one of the wards. He asked if I had had the sperm count, and then, without demur, said I could come in in a couple of days.

With a slight sense of deja vu, I shaved and presented myself again. I glanced at the daily list, and, sure enough, there was my name and 'tailoring of circumcision'. I wondered what the staff, most of whom I knew, were thinking.

The usual discussion took place about a general anaesthetic, which would require a 'pre-med' (tranquillising and pain-deadening injection). The upshot was that I went off to discuss this with the surgeon between his ops. He explained about the quantity of anaesthetic required, causing swelling at the time and making estimations difficult, thus leading to unsatisfactory results. Would I accept the necessary reduced dose, with the slight possibility of having to be 'put under' if things became unbearable? Right, that seemed eminently reasonable, So off I went for the 'pre-med' – and further shaving.

Both nurses who did these were known to me, locals, the latter asking, "Didn't you have circumcision?" I answered yes, and he must have wondered what on earth was going on.

(to be continued)

Penile Enlargement

A 'This Morning' programme on TVS included interviews and discussion on penile enlargement. An American surgeon has apparently developed the system, and has performed over 200 such operations without any complaints.

First, liposuction is used to remove fatty tissue from the patient's lower abdomen and pubic area, thus making the penis more prominent. If increased thickness is desired this same fat is injected beneath the shaft skin of the penis.

If further lengthening is required, the suspensory ligament is severed, allowing the penis to hang and project more freely.

Sexual function is not affected by this treatment, and it was also recommended for seriously under-endowed schoolboys if hormone treatment to promote normal growth was unsuccessful.

A.W. – Sussex

Contact Corner

Member would like to contact other readers with foreskin interests. Discretion assured. All letters answered.

J. – N. Yorks

Finally, I expect Tony will be putting membership renewal forms in with this edition, so I hope you'll all be still with us next year, and both Tony and I wish you all a Merry Christmas and a prosperous New Year.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 1

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Russian Jews	R.B.W.	Page 3
Remembering	Anon	Page 4
A Multi-Lingual Dictionary		Page 5
Circumcision and Art	G.	Page 6
Plea for Female Views	Anon	Page 6
Inevitable Trauma	D.	Page 8
Asking	D.P.	Page 10
French Book	J.M.	Page 11
The Year of the Cock	T.A.	Page 11
Laser Circumcision		Page 12
Infant Circumcision		Page 12
Circumcision of Jews		Page 13
Dr. Ray's Answers	R.H.	Page 13
Saga (continued)		Page 14
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Hello! and welcome to a new year of Acorn. We are now in our 6th year and still going strong, so life can't be all bad. I hope we can still keep pleasing members from both sides of the fence. I know that most of you love all kinds of cocks but with a little preference to one.

Talking of preference! Those members who saw the second episode of 'The Good Sex Guide' on ITV will have noticed that when the lady presenter did a measuring job on 9 cocks, 6 of them were circumcised. This appeared to me to be against the national trend. Then, as she had just been talking to some gay males, I thought that maybe she had used their cocks for her statistics. Then, thinking of statistics, I went through the questionnaires, and lo! Of the members who filled in the questionnaire, 69% are circumcised and 31% have foreskins. When broken down into sexual status it turns out that homosexuals are 83% circumcised, bi-sexuals 88% circumcised and heterosexuals 50%. How's that for some food for thought!

The above does show how the statistics we ask of you can be used. I might add that the questionnaires are now all destroyed and the information is now stored in a secret file in the computer that only I can reach, with no names or addresses attached.

Bearing in mind how many members in the past, wishing to, but having trouble in, keeping their loose foreskins retracted, I have tried out an experiment with the following results. For three days and nights I clamped a 1¼" bulldog clip vertically, to the underside of my penis, just behind the frenum, thus constricting the retracted foreskin. I found that with a new clip there was too much spring in it and hurt a bit, but a fairly worn one was ideal as it doesn't have to be tight. Inside the jaws I put a small piece of lint. I found that it was very comfortable and couldn't feel the clip at all. The only difficulty was when peeing, getting it out of my briefs (boxer shorts might be better).

Conclusion:- After just a few minutes I didn't know whether my foreskin was retracted or not, and had to keep looking to make sure. There was no difference in feeling between the two states. This led me to believe that, for those who longed for, and got circumcised, it's not the fact of having a bare glans that is so satisfying, but knowing that you have a bare glans. More in the mind than anything else. Of course, that makes it just as valid.

Other observations were that, in no time at all, my knob became crinkled, and took on a lighter colour, just like a circumcised one. I think Drs. Masters and Johnson were right when they stated that they could find no basis for thinking that the circumcised glans was less sensitive than a foreskinned one. It appeared to me that with the crinkling that took place when flaccid, only about one fifth of the surface was in contact with clothes, etc., so that the other four-fifths remained just as sensitive.

After taking the clip off, my foreskin had got used to the constriction put upon it and refused to move for another day, so maybe if it was kept on much longer the foreskin might remain constantly retracted. As I am very happy with my present state, I'll leave that to others.

The last item on my agenda refers again to a part of the questionnaire. The most popular topic stated was 'Observations of Foreskins/Circumcisions'. On top of that a few members in their remarks asked if we could have information on celebrities' or well-known people's penis status, either from personal knowledge, reliable second hand, films, magazines, or anywhere else. I think I started the ball rolling a few editions ago, talking about Burt Lancaster's foreskin. So if you have any knowledge please let us know – still all confidential.

David Acorn

Russian Jews

I was utterly gobsmacked to read of the Russian emigrés, trooping off the planes in Tel Aviv to be separated from their wives and children and herded into the nearest 'clip joint' for a quick circumcision. Surely, as good Jews, they should have had it done on the eighth day, or whatever.

Even if circumcision was forbidden, which it probably was, it didn't stop Jews in the past from defying the Roman death penalty and giving their sons the chop. After all, unless you're a rampant shafter, a flasher, or a nudist, who's going to know? So there has to be some other reason.

We know that in the States where 'over the top' is the norm, we have Jewish parents refusing to circumcise their sons in a novel interpretation of the scriptures, which is more than counterbalanced by the advent of the 'mohelet', or lady circumciser (I can't imagine anything more distasteful; you'd think a woman, even a Jewish one, would have a bit more reverence for the male sceptre).

Then, again, we hear that Israelis are battering down the doors of B.U.F.F, wanting foreskin restoration. Once again there is the noble historic precedent of the athletic Hebrews who, unable to face the humiliation of revealing their sawn-off cocks next to their Greek rivals with snake-like foreskins, underwent a primitive uncircumcision procedure.

Could it be that the Jews of Russia, too, have decided that the foreskin is aesthetically desirable, and enhances sexual pleasure for both sexes? I'd like to think that religious prejudice could be overcome by enlightened self-interest, but I'm not optimistic. Can any of your experts on the Jewish faith clarify why Russian Jews aren't circumcised?

R.B.W. – Bedford

Remembering

My interest in circumcision dates back many years, at least to my years at grammar school. My father had been circumcised at the age of 21 as a result of a tight foreskin (a very large glans, but so much spare skin it appeared simply to have been rolled back; I never saw it erect), but neither I nor my brothers were cut. A regular threat, however, if we did not pull our foreskins back to wash behind them was that he would have us 'done'.

As I have remarked before, although the boys in my year were born in 1955/6, which, according to the article in 2/92 should have given over 40% incidence, it was nearer 10%. One was the result of an American father, and one for surgical reasons. As far as I know the others were all at birth. On 'spotting' a new one, the remark, "Oh, I see you've been done" was passed, but no reply was considered necessary. All cases were such that they seemed merely to have a retracted skin, but if they were pushed forward, it proved otherwise. There was also a theory current, that 'all men are circumcised by the time they are twenty' – ie that their foreskins, if not cut off, retracted of their own accord. This was, I think, put about by a boy whose own foreskin covered no more than about half his glans, to explain his situation! Any suggestions as to why this happens in some cases and not in others? It was about this time that I began experimenting with keeping my own foreskin pulled back not a very satisfactory experiment as it tends to slip forward, but I'm working on it still.

I remain extremely interested in the whole subject of foreskins (present or absent). Firsthand observation is somewhat more limited than at school; a college roommate had been cut, and also had the roll of skin behind the glans. But apart from sexual partners, and the odd sighting in public loos, there's little to report, not being a 'sporty' type, and thus having no access to changing rooms. I was interested to see a young man the other day in the public loo pull his foreskin right back before urinating, and not push it forward again until he had shaken all the drops off. You will notice that I have placed some emphasis on the style of circumcision; that all the ones I knew were with a generous amount of skin left. I didn't come across the radical version (ie a completely clean shaft) until a few years ago. I find it infinitely more erotic than the other style.

Anon – Norfolk

A Multi-Lingual Dictionary

English	circumcise	circumcision	foreskin	glans	penis
German	beschneiden	die Beschneidung	die Vorhaut	die Richel	der Penis
Dutch	besnijden	besnijdenis	voorhuid	eikel	mannelijk lid
Danish	omskære	omskærelse	forhud		pik
Norwegian	omskjære		forhud
Swedish	omskäre	omskärelse
Finnish		ympärileikkaus
French	circoncire	circoncision	prépuce	le gland	la verge le membre viril
Italian	circoncidere	circoncisione	prepuzio	glande	pene
Spanish	circuncidar	circuncisión	prepucio	glande bálano	pene
Portugese	circuncidar purificar (figurative)	circuncisão	prepucio	glande bolota	pênis
Manx	giar chymmylt circumcised: chymmylty chymmuiltit	giarrey chymmylt		kione woid	bwoid slang : bossan bwoid niargan rollian cudjal beg
Gaellic	timchioll-ghearradh
Welsh	enwaedu	enwaediad	blaengroen		cala pidyn gwialen
Czech	obrezati	obrizka obrezáni
Polish	obrzezac oczyszczać (serce, namietnosci)	obrzezanie	naplatek
Hungarian	körülmeté	korulmeteles	fityma		himvesszo
Romanian	taia imprejur
Greek	peritemno
Turkish	sünnet	sünnet

Any additional languages, or words to fill gaps, will be welcome.

Circumcision And Art

Thank you for printing Jay Rayner's Guardian article "Boyz 'n' the Hood". Though a regular reader of the newspaper I missed this gem.

Reading the article brought some of my earliest negative feelings about my own circumcision flooding back. As a child taken on visits to art galleries, I was painfully aware that none of the statues of naked cherubs and nude gods were circumcised. I was particularly intrigued that none of the infant Christs displayed a circumcised penis. I knew enough about circumcision and religion by then to know that this was inaccurate.

My own circumcision had been explained to me as a privileged and desirable state (see 'Unhappy', issue 8/92). Why, then, were these beautiful figures and paintings showing penises with foreskins intact?

I spent many hours looking through art books seeking confirmation that circumcision was OK. I searched in vain. Apart from a few paintings of the actual ritual circumcision of Christ, I have never found a representation of a circumcised Christ. Why is this?

The only example of a circumcised penis in classical art, that I have seen, is on the grand staircase of the Winter Palace in St. Petersburg (formerly Leningrad). Amongst several marble statues of biblical figures, about two-thirds lifelike, I was amazed to see a naked David with a very definitely circumcised penis. Could it be that in Russia, very consciously aware of its own substantial Jewish minority, an artist would be very aware of circumcision, and that it would seem natural to show a Jew as being circumcised.

In California a few years ago, I came across cheap plaster copies of Michelangelo's David with a circumcised penis. The American friend I was with said that the large reproduction of the statue in Forest Lawns cemetery in Hollywood also displays a cut cock – perhaps my leg was being pulled!

Modern artists don't seem to have any problems in portraying the circumcised penis. Most notably, David Hockney's beautiful drawings of male nudes, most drawn from American models, show many examples.

G. – Birmingham

Plea For Female Views

I've recently enjoyed discovering and catching up on the past issues of Acorn. Some of the views and angles are a bit OTT, but I really appreciate the letters from women, either pro or anti roundhead. Whilst taboos have relaxed to allow almost all sexual topics for discussion in after dinner conversation, circumcision still creates coyness when raised in mixed company. I suspect the ladies are reluctant to tell all for fear of offending their partners, but Acorn now affords them anonymity and an eager audience. In an effort to draw forth more female comment, I outline several areas in which it would be good to have their views, feelings and experiences.

1) Early Years

The majority of girls grow up unaware of circumcision, but a few will have seen brothers or playmates who have been cut. How did parents answer their questions which would naturally arise? What explanation was given when brothers were whisked off for surgery and returned with penises which were dramatically altered? Was the sexual dimension ever discussed? Did it influence their own preference in later life?

2) Age of Discovery

Though circumcised boys are in a minority, I'm sure when one is encountered the word spreads among sexually active girls. Please tell us how you first learned of this mysterious male modification. Did you speculate about a partner beforehand? Were you right/wrong, pleased/disappointed? Did you ask? Were you told? Did you find out with your fingers? Was it a surprise? How did you react? Did you say anything to your partner at the time? Was it the truth, or did you lie to spare his feelings?

3) Motherhood

It's clear many women prefer circumcised penises and have a strong wish to see their sons cut, simply to express it! To achieve this they may have overcome fierce objections from their partners, parents (on both sides), and the medical establishment. Do tell us your story. Conversely, many mothers are anguished when, against their wishes, they have to see their sons cut for religious or medical reasons. In either case, did you witness or take part in the operation? What were your feelings and emotions at the time? What did you say to comfort boys who were old enough to understand what was to happen to them? Or to console them afterwards? Have your views altered as a result of your experiences?

4) Women Professionals

There must be many female doctors and midwives and nurses who perform or assist circumcisions every week. Are their views in conflict or accord with the action their work requires? Just what do they explain about circumcision to young patients before and after the op? Have any midwives or nurses performed the operation on their own sons, or those of family or friends? Or been begged to advise after frustration with the NHS?

5) Feedback

Mature mums may often be the buffer for their sons' reaction to being circumcised, especially when it was done outside the bounds of informed consent. How many have had to defend their decision? Or been thanked for it? Would they do the same again with hindsight? Of special interest is any woman to woman feedback from satisfied/dissatisfied daughters-in-law and partners. Have they ever spoken out to promote or prevent the circumcisions of grandsons?

Every day, somewhere, this whole fascinating topic must be subject of conversation in all female company. Here's one man who'd love to be a fly on the wall! In many ways women are close to the deed and the decision, so yours is the view we value most. As an early edition of Acorn put it so perfectly, "it's the 'end' user's opinion that really matters."

So, fellas, show this to your wives and partners – persuade them to write to Acorn uninhibitedly.

The young mother just takes a decision and without asking her young son's permission.
She takes him away
to the doctor one day,
who gives him a neat circumcision.

Anon

[No need, ladies, to even tell your partners that you are writing. Everything will be published completely anonymously. — D.A.]

Inevitable Trauma?

The widely-held view of British childcare professionals is that circumcision performed at later ages than the postnatal stage and early infancy is inevitably accompanied by the risk of lasting psychological trauma, which can exert a damaging influence on the psycho-sexual development of the individual. While the intensity of such trauma will vary, with some children being able to control and subliminate the effects better than others, it is argued that all children will sustain some degree of underlying psychological and emotional injury. Some children will be more conscious of this than others.

This is an area, however, in which the amount of investigative research has been inadequate. The current climate, in which there is an unquestioned acceptance of the proposition that circumcision performed in later childhood, particularly between the approximate ages of four to ten years, is damaging, is influenced to a considerable extent by Freudian studies and long-fashionable castration theory.

There has been minimal study into the actual situation as it relates to differing ethnic and religious groups for instance, and the infrequent studies that have been made among Anglo-Saxon children do not convince in respect of their generality. Among other aspects of this issue requiring fuller investigation there is, for example, the child's perception of the relative role of responsibility for decision-making he sees as being exercised by each of his parents in his circumcision.

Two examples cited in support of the general proposition of inevitable trauma in late childhood circumcisions, though differing significantly individually, are as follows:-

The first is a case reported by psychoanalyst Gerald Pearson, which involved a nine-year-old boy who had been referred to him because of a reading disability, enuresis, and a trance-like attack. The mother, who had adopted him as a baby, had a very warm loving relationship with him. When he was four years old, however, she became antagonistic to his frequent masturbation, and decided to have him circumcised as a means of stopping it. He was frightened by the experience and by the hospitalisation. Although he ceased masturbating, the problems for which he was eventually referred for psychoanalysis, subsequently appeared.

In a brief summary of his conclusions, and discarding as much psychoanalytic jargon as possible, Pearson concluded that the boy regarded his circumcision as punishment for masturbating. He had consequently begun to suffer typical castration fears, compelling him to repress his masturbation and sexual feelings – particularly towards his mother and older sister, who were sources of stimulation – because of the fear of losing the rest of his genitals as further punishment. Instead, the problems which developed were symptoms of his conversion hysteria.

Another instance of late childhood circumcision from which far-reaching deductions have been made, concerns the poet, A. E. Housman (A Shropshire Lad, etc.).

After the death of Alfred Housman's mother, his father remarried. At 50, his new stepmother was several years older than his father. She had a good relationship with her stepchildren of five boys and two girls, Alfred being the eldest. Shortly after the marriage, Alfred's father suddenly decided to have all the boys circumcised, Alfred being about fourteen at the time.

In later years, one of Alfred's sisters, Kate, commented, "I don't think that it was to fulfil a scriptural rite that he (her father) sought, for there was no Abrahamic tradition in our family, but on sanitary mosaic lines ... he ought to have thought of it in their babyhood. It was severe treatment, mentally and physically, for wellgrown boys."

Kate and subsequent Housman biographers have all expressed bewilderment at Housman senior's sudden and seemingly impulsive decision. Yet can it be mere coincidence that the decision to have the boys circumcised occurred so soon after they had acquired a stepmother who, understandably, would have her own views on child management.

But that is not the focus for the present. More importantly, for those who regard circumcision in late childhood as unavoidably damaging, psychosexual implications can be identified from the experience of the Housman family. On Alfred's brothers there is little circumcision related information, as they have never been biographically scrutinised to the same degree as Alfred. In Alfred's own case however, there has been no scarcity of claims that his experience of being circumcised was so traumatic for him, causing him to regard heterosexual activity as dirty and forbidden (with the ultimate punishment of castration, as in Pearson's analysis), that this was the core experience influencing his subsequent homosexual development.

Space does not permit a more detailed examination of these two examples, but, while differing individually, they appear to be reasonably representative of a range of evidence used to support the view that later childhood circumcision inevitably produces negative effects, whether obvious in the individual or not.

In the two examples cited there may indeed be justification in believing that circumcision was the trigger for what occurred later, their validity in this respect not being challenged. But such assessments of individual cases raise more questions than they answer if extrapolated to support a thesis of both generality and inevitability of lasting psychological trauma.

What about, for instance, those non Anglo-Saxon children who are traditionally circumcised at later ages for cultural or religious reasons? What is the trauma incidence amongst them? If it is minimal or even non-existent, why?

These, and related issues will be discussed in a future issue of Acorn. Meanwhile, you may be asking: But is this just an academic exercise of posing theory against theory? Is the author's own personal experience in any way relevant to these issues, and sufficient at least to provide an overview?

Perhaps, yes – as a socio-anthropologist who has spent most of his professional life in Africa; as an English Muslim with cross-cultural affinities; and as someone with total recall of his own circumcision when nearly five years old.

D. – West Midlands

Asking

I was reading the letter of a few editions ago by Brian of the West Country, and A.W.'s reply to it in the next issue. Brian suggests that we might talk to our friends about circumcision, but A.W.'s reply tells us that it would be too embarrassing. All I can say is that if it is done with tact and doesn't appear to trespass on people's privacy, it's perfectly possible to ask if a guy is cut. I've done it from time to time and no one has ever minded, although some found it a big surprise, and one or two have not felt like answering (which is their right of course). The people you can ask easiest, it seems to me, are fairly close friends and total strangers; anything in between seems to be more difficult. I don't know why!

Another thing I noticed recently was an article in The Guardian in which the reporter had been talking to a Kenyan just before the elections there. They were talking about a particular politician, and the man said, "I couldn't vote for him, he is uncircumcised." What a great idea! If only our politicians would undergo a foreskin check.

D.P. – London

French Book

Members who can read French will be interested to learn that a 220 page book on the history of circumcision came out in November in Paris (I have ordered a copy but have not yet received it). The author, Malek Chebel, is an Algerian anthropologist who lives in France. The book guide says it treats the question from religious, historical, and surgical points of view. The title translates directly to "History of Circumcision: from its origins to our day." Obtainable from André Balland, 33 Rue Saint - Audre des Arts, 75006 Paris. Price 135 Francs.

Please can anyone living in London find out the address of "The Brotherhood of the Cross and Star", the Nigerian Christian sect that requires circumcision, mentioned in Newsletter Issue 4/91.

Following the recent item in the newsletter regarding the fact that all Bolivians must have a foreskin, The Jewish Travel Guide lists 4 synagogues in Bolivia and a Jewish School in La Paz.

J.M. – Spain

[Seems to be a conflict of interests somewhere. — D.A.]

The Year Of The Cock

Those of you who celebrated Chinese New Year on January 23rd. this year will know that it marked the end of the year of the Snake, and the start of the year of the Rooster. Australians tell me that a slang term for penis there, is 'one-eyed trouser snake', so last year should have been an auspicious one for snake-fanciers. But the new year should be even more auspicious. The term 'rooster' became widely used in America because people were too prudish to say cock, which of course is one of the most widespread slang terms for penis. It seems that just as good a translation from the Chinese would be 'The Year of the Cock'.

Cock is in itself an interesting word linguistically for its many usages, all of them with an ambiguous connotation, linking it to its slang meaning. The Shorter Oxford English Dictionary gives the following usages of cock:

1) the male domestic fowl (ever since Chaucer's Canterbury Tale about Chanticleer, a proverbially randy bird, as he was expected to service a whole flock of hens);

2) the leader, head or chief man as in the Cockney greeting, "Wotcher, Cock";

3) a spout through which the flow of a liquid can be controlled;

4) to turn up (e.g. hat rim) (or the erect penis);

5) to stick stiffly up or out (e.g. haycock) (or the erect penis)

So, with most of it still to look forward to, here's wishing all Acorn readers a very pleasurable and successful Year of the Cock.

Tony Acorn

G.J. of Devon sends in the following news item (as did others).

Laser Circumcision

Israeli doctors have performed their first circumcision by laser on a 14-year-old Jewish immigrant from Moscow, who has a rare blood disease, and was unable to undergo the usual operation.

G.J. asks if anyone could comment on the laser method, because he for one would like to know more about it. It has obvious haemostatic advantages, but it is surprising that the method is acceptable in Jewish law, because circumcision is symbolic of the (blood-)Covenant between God and the Jewish people.

Our Oslo correspondent sends two letters from the very respectable newspaper Aftenposten, which Tony Acorn translates as follows:

Infant Circumcision (25 November 1992)

Norwegian Broadcasting's documentary series about religions started on Sunday 22 November with the title, 'Faith meets Faith', a very informative meeting with the Jewish faith. It is quite unbelievable that the modern Jewish faith can survive old-fashioned and strange rites and customs. A scene in the programme showed a family gathering in which the circumcision of an eight-day-old infant boy was the central event. Three old men stepped forward, two held the child, laid it down and held it fast, whilst a rabbi set to with a knife and cut off the foreskin of the penis – not exactly the most unfeeling part of the body! As the rabbi began to cut, the boy began to scream. He was not anaesthetised.

It is a shame that modern Jews keep to this bestial circumcision. It is illegal to give a child a smack on the back. But the Jews in this country are obviously allowed, in relatively unhygienic conditions compared to an operating theatre, to carry out, without anaesthetic, a very painful operation

Circumcision Of Jews (1 December 1992)

Olav Skeie's contribution to these columns on 25/11 about the circumcision of boys is evidence of great intolerance and ignorance. Even if a ritual is foreign and unknown in this country, that does not make it 'old-fashioned and strange'. In many countries, such as U.S.A., Canada and Australia, a majority of non-Jewish boys are circumcised for hygienic reasons.

Jewish boys are circumcised eight days after birth because their sensitivity to pain is minimal at this stage. If they cry, it is partly because they are being held, and partly from some pain. This pain can be compared to the pain a small child feels when vaccinated. Most people accept vaccination, and are glad to subject their child to the pain of an injection, without anaesthetic, many times during childhood. As after a vaccination, a child calms down quickly after circumcision. The rabbis who do the operation have completed a special course on circumcision for several years, and have worked in hospitals. Manu hospital doctors have been present at his circumcisions to learn how it is done. In addition there is always a responsible doctor present at a circumcision.

Skeie writes about hygiene. Circumcision is done under sterile conditions, and complications are rarely seen. I would also point out that for many centuries Jewish people have survived great infectious epidemics precisely because of rituals in which cleanliness and hygiene are central — H.F.

Dr. Ray's Answer

I've been looking at the photo of J.B.'s appendage, which he sent with the questions published in 8/92. I don't know why he should have this particular line of pigmentation, for that's what it almost certainly is, but I suspect that it could be that there was always a line at this point. I think that after his circumcision the remaining skin on his shaft has been stretched to lie in a slightly different resting place from its previous disposition. Maybe what used to be a slight fold is now laid flat because the stitches have just pulled the skin into a slightly different position. Skin which is usually in a fold is often slightly more pigmented than 'flat' skin. Now that the fold has been unfolded the line of pigmentation has been revealed. It's only a thought and it may not fit the facts, but I can't offer any other suggestion – and in any case, I'm sure it doesn't matter.

I confess to not being well up in the latest 'named' techniques for circumcision operation variants. Many surgeons have their own particular styles and I don't attach much significance to the 'V' line on the undersurface of the shaft.

So that's two rather negative answers. Just one more question to go: I suppose that careful tissue typing might make foreskin transplant a possibility, but the economics of doing it would almost certainly put the operation quite beyond the reach of any but the richest patient. The cost of discovering a tissue compatible foreskin, involving a search through possibly hundreds of foreskins from amongst dozens of different operating centres would be astronomical. It's worth it for a life-saving procedure like a heart or kidney transplant, and the necessary logistical machinery has been set up all over Europe – even the world. To establish the same for foreskins isn't on. As for transplanting the whole penis. Yes, again, subject to establishing a network to trace tissue compatible organs, it may be technically possible, but the transplanted penis would not have a natural nerve supply and wouldn't have any sexual sensation. Nor would it become erect on stimulation. Hearts, lungs and kidneys don't depend on a nerve supply to perform their automatic functions. Sadly, penises do.

Dr. Ray Hamble

[Editor's note: Due to the fact that they came from the same part of the world and their stories were similar, I mistakenly stated in the last issue that J.B. was also the author of 'Saga'. My apologies, J.B.]

Saga (Continued)

The pre-med had had no effect by the time I was wheeled in at 9.20 to a scene less dramatic in its impact than before. One of the assistants said good morning through her mask – she appeared very attractive. The sister I recognised from before.

A thick folded cloth was put across my chest to shield my view, an evil looking weapon with some pinkish fluid on the end was used to swab, and then the injections. I hardly bothered to take much in this time. The exploratory nick was painful, followed very soon after by another hardly less so. "Not so much as before?" quoth the surgeon, and I must have grunted with misgivings, for off he went. Very soon I felt a sharp pain as the first cut was done, but I didn't worry overmuch, thinking that the deadening would soon take full effect. It didn't, and the slices came one after another, incredibly fine and sharp, each seeming to last quite a long time. I was able to avoid wincing or jerking, but my mouth went dry, and my face must have been a bit of a sight. The sister moistened my lips with a swab, and held my left forearm, once or twice stroking it back and forth (lovely!), and I enjoyed watching the assistant's gorgeous eyes fixed intently on ... over her mask. So that, when the surgeon glanced at me and said, "I think I'd better give you a little chloroform, I had no hesitation in saying no, especially as things didn't seem in any danger of worsening. Shortly thereafter, I mentioned that it was better than the dentist – which was about true when I thought back to earlier experiences.

I feel that I might have dozed a little towards the end, being awakened by a few more slices and a strange stretching sensation. I glancing up, and suddenly realised that I could see my bloodied member reflected in the chrome rim of the big theatre light. Soon, though, I could see from the large arm movements that the stitches were being applied. For this, I could actually feel my penis being handled, so I wondered just how much anaesthesia I had actually had.

Conversation seemed to be in grunts. I couldn't tell what was being said, but wondered at one point whether anything had gone slightly awry (which was not, actually, the case).

Back to the ward, and a different ward sister, Asian, who smiled and said, "No pain?", to which I could easily agree. Interestingly, the only time I felt any at all was during the cutting. Lunch, and then some reading. But, by now, the pre-med must have taken effect, for I could not stay awake, and slept until 6.30, whereupon I got permission to dress and depart.

Again, I kept a log, but with so much repetition of past experiences, less detailed. Convalescence proceeded much faster, which I can only attribute to the lower doses, and also, perhaps, to the modified technique which the surgeon mentioned at the review on D9. Initial discomfort was confined to when I was moving around. I awoke at 9am on the day after without any pain, and was able to take a swim the same way on D3.

I removed the very much more substantial dressing after 24 hours in the evening bath, as I had learned previously how to keep it dry after urination, by judicious use of a little gutter of tissue held below and near the meatus.

The all-important inspection revealed far more than I ever expected: instead of a tiny removal, almost a complete recircumcision! At any rate, the cut extended fully round 40% of the periphery, this presumably having been necessary to obtain access to the offending parts.

Stitches were fewer in number, and the offending little tag had gone, leaving a spot of blood, but the usual bruising and swelling precluded any further conclusions being drawn – in truth, I was worried about the possibility of too much having been removed.

The hedgehog effect of the stitches began again on D4, but this time I left well alone. The first came out the next day, and all but one of the remainder at review on D9, when the surgeon busied himself plucking them out. Some inflammation was already starting, but he made no comment. All he said as I left was, “I crushed it – now it ought to be alright”, with a pleased expression.

The following day I discovered one minute one left behind, which I got out with a tiny jab of pain and bleeding. Later in the morning the inflammation was starting to annoy so I decided to go to our clinic, remembering my unsuccessful attempts at self-treatment the previous year. I just asked for a treatment for post-operative inflammation. The nurse said that although old-fashioned, a saline solution should do the trick. I went home and mixed a tablespoon of salt in a toothmug of water, and sunk my length into it. Relief was immediate and lasted some hours. This might be of assistance to others and I wished I had known of it a year ago.

(To be continued)

Contact Corner

D.J. – Gwent, would like to write to other members, or hear from them, on any matters relating to circumcision. All letters answered.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 2

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Celebrities' States	J.M.	Page 3
More Circumcisers	Brian	Page 7
Old Spain	V.S.	Page 7
Observations	V.W.	Page 8
Vasectomy	C.W.	Page 9
Multi-Lingual Dictionary	J.H.	Page 12
Saga (Conclusion)		Page 13
Penis Sensitivity	C.A.T.	Page 15
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

The few members that I have met have heard something of my first interest in circumcision etc., but most have not. Unlike any of the other stories that have been told, mine is principally a tale of poverty. Like most of the other stories, though, it will probably be a little longwinded and digressive, so please forgive me as I set the scene.

I was brought up in the country in a tiny cottage whose lath and plaster walls couldn't keep out the winter winds, and tended to blow the candles around when we went to bed. The hot water bottle was one of Mum's irons wrapped in a piece of old rag. The last thing that was done at night was to fill the kettle. The first thing in the morning was to clean out and light the range, boil the kettle and pour it down the pump outside to unfreeze it and prime it. The mats on the floor were made from sacks from the nearby farm with bits of rag woven into them, a task that the whole family applied themselves to. And, of course, the toilet was a bucket in a little wooden privy at the bottom of the garden, the contents of which my father buried every week. (It wasn't until the early sixties, the Macmillan government I think, that grants were given so that water, baths and toilets could be indoors). An oil lamp on the table was the only light. My father was never in work. So you see, when people talk about poverty now, I fall about laughing.

Came the time to start school. I enjoyed it and did very well. In those days, every lesson was a competition, with marks out of ten. Some of the time I came top, with only one boy consistently beating me. I couldn't understand why, not knowing that that sort of thing came from the brain, so I kept looking for an answer. Then, one day in the school toilet I found it. He had a different willy to me. This was the answer. God had made him that way because He favoured him. I remember going to bed at night, and when the iron had cooled enough to be bearable, I took the rag off, pulled my foreskin back and pressed the iron on my knob. I did this night after night in the hope that it would stay back permanently. I could be like the other boy, and in favour with God. Needless to say it didn't work. My foreskin could never have fully retracted anyway as the inner foreskin fully adhered to the rim of my knob until I forcibly freed it when I was twelve.

The next thing I noticed by chance, was that the village doctor's son was also different, as were the twins from the village shop. In fact all those who lived in big houses and wore nice clothes were just about all the same. This also applied to those in the small council house estate (I always thought of them as well-off and superior to me because they had water indoors and gas). The poor farm labourers' boys were all the same as me. So I then decided that those with bare knobs were the chosen ones in life, and that I had to know my place which was below everyone else. I couldn't possibly allow anyone to see my willy as I was so ashamed of it, it showed so clearly my lowly estate

(this stayed with me until I was about twenty). My self-esteem was absolutely zero, and thus began my life's personal pecking order.

Everyone, in life, puts everyone they know on a scale of respect, and no-one uses the same scale as another. A football fan would put a footballer at the top with maybe a pop star next, while someone else would have a film star top with a tennis player next, and so on. This also happens with your personal acquaintances, each one being on a slightly different plane according to their attributes. Of course, one of the top requisites on my pecking order was circumcision, and I did my best to find out the penis status of everyone. None of this was sexual, just a pure inner urge. I joined the Navy as a boy with 200 other boys, and to this day I can remember exactly what each boy's penis looked like.

In my late teens I decided that I would have to do something about my lack of self-esteem, so I did some amateur dramatics. After a time it worked with me saying to myself as I delivered my lines, "Five hundred people are sitting there hanging on my every word, so I can't be as low as I think." The final test came when I went out with a girl and plucked up enough courage to allow the petting to get to the feeling and looking stage. I was trembling with anxiety about what she would say when she saw my lowly foreskin, fearing the scornful rejection. Nothing. She didn't bat an eyelid. From then on I became, as it were, normal.

The peculiar thing about all this, is that even after I had learned all about circumcision, it didn't alter my basic thinking, which must show that what gets into your mind as a small child never leaves it, even when logic tells you different; something like the anorexic syndrome. Even though over half of the chaps that I knew were just like me, this was completely dismissed from my mind as being of no importance. Another peculiar thing is that after the first childhood wish, I never ever contemplated being circumcised. Later, I learned to love what I'd got and it has repaid me with hours and hours of pleasure. I still like to know everyone's status, but it isn't the desperate urge that it was.

How's that for baring the soul. There's not much about me now that you don't know.

David Acorn

Celebrities' States

Since so many members stated on their questionnaires that they were interested in the penis status of famous men, six months ago I started searching for a man in America who had compiled a list over the years of about 1800 celebrities. I have had no luck until recently when a friend in California took up the quest for me, and I am expecting it any time now. Then I mentioned the idea in the last newsletter to see if we could get some British names. J.M. of Middx. sent me the list that I had been searching for, many thanks to him. The list is so long and covers film stars, sportsmen, politicians and other personalities, that it couldn't possibly go in one edition. So for a start I'm publishing just the film stars in this issue.

American Stars With Foreskins

Nick Adams	Lou Ferrigno	Audie Murphy
Alan Alda	Clark Gable	Eddie Murphy
Keith Andes	Ben Gazzara	Ramon Navarro
Desi Arnez	Christopher George	Hugh O'Brian
James Arness	Peter Graves	Jack Palance
Dan Blocker	Andy Griffiths	Elvis Presley
Marlon Brando	Dan Haggerty	Robert Preston
Rossano Brazzi	Charlton Heston	Anthony Quinn
Yul Brynner	William Holden	Aldo Ray
Ed Byrnes	Earl Holliman	Robert Redford
Maxwell Caulfield	Rock Hudson	Burt Reynolds
George Chakiris	William Hurt	Cliff Robertson
Charlie Chaplin	John Huston	Mickey Rooney
Montgomery Clift	David Jansson	John Saxon
Charles Coburn	Van Johnson	Arnold Sxhwarzenegg
Chuck Connors	Gene Kelly	David Selby
William Conrad	Alan Ladd	Tom Selleck
Frank Converse	Fernando Lamas	Frank Sinatra
Jackie Cooper	Burt Lancaster	Donald Sutherland
Bill Cosby	James Macarthur	Mr. T.
Bob Crane	George Maharis	Robert Taylor
Richard Crenna	Nick Mancuso	Rudolph Valentino
Bing Crosby	Ed Marinero	Raf Vallone
Bing's Sons	Dean Martin	Dick Van Dyke
Robert Culp	Marcello Mastroianni	Robert Vaughn
William Defoe	Victor Mature	Dennis Weaver
Buddy Ebsen	Sal Mineo	Johnny Weismuller
Vince Edwards	Ricardo Montalban	Lee Marvin
Douglas Fairbanks Sr.	Greg Morris	Rod Taylor

American Stars, Circumcised

Woody Allen	Glenn Ford	Steve McQueen
Alan Arkin	Harrison Ford	Robert Mitchum
Ed Asner	Michael J. Fox	Dan Monahan
Fred Astaire	Tony Franciosa	David Morse
Christopher Atkins	James Franciscus	Zero Mostel
Max Baer Jr.	Robert Fuller	Paul Muni
Martin Balsam	John Garfield	Bill Murray
Gene Barry	James Garner	Don Murray

Warren Beatty
John Beck
Richard Benjamin
Jack Benny
Milton Berle
Theodore Bikel
Bill Bixby
Pat Boone
Joseph Bottoms
Timothy Bottoms
Bruce Boxleitner
Scott Brady
Beau Bridges
Jeff Bridges
Lloyd Bridges
James Brolin
Charles Bronson
Mel Brooks
Jim Brown
George Burns
Raymond Burr
Gary Busey
Red Buttons
James Caan
Sid Caesar
Rory Calhoun
Joseph Calliea
McDonald Carey
David Carradine
Keith Carradine
Richard Chamberlain
Jeff Chandler
Chevy Chase
Lee J. Cobb
James Coburn
Gary Cole
Jackie Coogan
Gary Cooper
Danny
Kevin Costner
Tom Cruise
Tony Curtis
Ted Danson
Howard da Silva
Jim Davis
Sammy Davis Jr.
James Dean

Tom Geary
Richard Gere
Mel Gibson
Jack Gilford
Michael Paul Glaser
Jeff Goldblum
Leo Gorcey
Elliot Gould
Harold Gould
Farley Granger
Cary Grant
Lorne Green
Joel Grey
Steve Guttenberg
Buddy Hackett
Gene Hackman
Larry Hagman
Mark Hamill
George Hamilton
Ty Hardin
David Hasselhoff
Hurd Hatfield
Van Heflin
Robert Hegyes
Darryl Hickman
Dustin Hoffman
Bo Hopkins
Lee Horsley
John Houseman
Jeffrey Hunter
Tab Hunter
Jim Hutton
Tim Hutton
John Ireland
Richard Jaeckel
Sam Jaffe
Al Jolson
Kaye Harry
Stacey Keach
Michael Keaton
Brian Keith
Tommy Kirk
Jack Klugman
Kevin Kline
Chris Christopherson
Bert Lahr

George Nader
Barry Newman
Paul Newman
Leonard Nimoy
Carrol O'connor
Ryan O'Neal
Al Pacino
Larry Parks
Sean Penn
Joe Penny
George Peppard
Anthony Perkins
Tyrone Power
Denver Pyle
Dennis Quaid
Tony Randall
Basil Rathbone
Robert Reed
Christopher Reeve
The Ritz Bros.
Jason Robards
Pernell Roberts
Edward G. Robinson
Will Rogers
Bobby Rydell
Michael Sarrazin
Roy Scheider
George Segal
Omar Sharif
William Shatner
Charlie Sheen
Martin Sheen
Phil Silvers
Red Skelton
Tom Skerrit
David Soul
Sylvester Stallone
Dean Stanton
Rod Steiger
James Stewart
Dean Stockwell
The 3 Stooges
Peter Strauss
Don Stroud
Patrick Swayze
Russ Tamblyn

Robert de Niro	Martin Landau	Topol
Bruce Dern	Bruce Lee	Rip Torn
Brandon de Wilde	Sam Levene	John Travolta
Bradford Dillman	Jerry Lewis	Jan Michael Vincent
Matt Dillon	Jack Lord	Jon Voight
Kevin Dobson	Peter Lorre	Robert Wagner
Troy Donahue	Chad Lowe	Christopher Walken
Kirk Douglas	Rob Lowe	Eli Wallach
Melvyn Douglas	Paul Lukas	Jack Warden
Michael Douglas	Kyle MacLachlan	John Wayne
Richard Dreyfuss	Guy Madison	Adam West
Patrick Duffy	Lee Majors	Cornel Wilde
Clint Eastwood	Karl Malden	Gene Wilder
Richard Egan	Fredric March	Robin Williams
Emilio Estevez	Stuart Margolin	Henry Winkler
Peter Falk	Steve Martin	Keenan Wynn
Norman Fell	The Marx Bros.	Effrem Zimbalist
Errol Flynn	Walter Matthau	Michael Landon
Peter Fonda	Doug McClure

British Stars With Foreskins

Richard Attenborough	John Hamill	Ian McKellan
Richard Burton	Richard Harris	Dudley Moore
Michael Caine	Benny Hill	Christopher Neame
Graham Chapman	Paul Hogan (Aus)	John Noakes
Ian Charleson	Anthony Hopkins	Peter O'Toole
Nicholas Clay	Jeremy Irons	Vincent Price
Sean Connery	Gordon Jackson	Oliver Reed
Tom Courteney	Gordon Kaye	Leonard Rossiter
Roger Daltrey	Mark Lester	Terence Stamp
Albert Finney	Roddy McDowall	Richard Warwick
Peter Firth	Malcolm McDowall	Michael York
Stewart Grainger

British Stars, Circumcised

Anthony Andrews	Roy Dotrice	Ron Moody
Phil Banyard	Barry Evans	Roger Moore
Ray Barrett (Aus)	Marty Feldman	Anthony Newley
Alan Bates	Laurence Harvey	Christopher Plummer
Stephen Boyd	Leslie Howard	Peter Sellers
Jeremy Brett	Derek Jacobi	Peter Ustinov
Simon Callow	David McCallum	Kevin Whately
David Cassidy	Warren Mitchell	Michael Wilding
Michael Craig

More Circumcisers

I have found out about two more places to obtain adult circumcisions which can be published:-

- |  |   |
|--|---|
| 1. West One Clinic,57, Harley Street,London. W1N 1DD               | Tel. 071-637 7614Price £595Local Anaesthetic  |
| 2. Transform Medical Group,502, Eccleshall Road,Sheffield. S11 8PY | Tel. (0742) 660798Price £485Local Anaesthetic |

Both are very expensive. I am continuing in my quest to obtain other names and addresses of those performing circumcisions.

Could we ask all roundhead members who have had adult circumcisions to pass on details of who performed the operation on them – might get some extra names.

Brian of the West Country

Old Spain

Last year was an important one for Spain. It was the 500th. anniversary, not only of Columbus' discovery of America, but also of the expulsion of the Moors from al-Andalus, the last Islamic stronghold in western Europe.

In some respects, the Moors in Spain, who had been there for 800 years when they were finally kicked out, represented the pinnacle of Islamic achievement in scholarship and architecture, being way ahead of their Christian neighbours, who in those days were relative barbarians. But they were not highly regarded by other Muslims when it came to religious observance. They were far too keen on their booze and their women, and had a reputation for immodesty and lechery, a scandalous state of affairs to God-fearing Muslims.

Moorish Spaniards were very little different from Christian Spaniards in appearance, since assimilation had taken place over so many centuries, and, until the final push which expelled them, lived fairly amicably with their Christian neighbours. There were often disputes and skirmishes though, and any Christian warrior captured by the Moors was offered the choice of istislam (conversion) or death. A surprising number chose death: istislam meant the stigma of circumcision, which meant that they could never go back to their own society, since they would be branded indelibly as heretics.

Those who did opt for istislam were given a couple of weeks' grace before being divested of their foreskins, and if the man was well-born or of personable appearance this bonus extended to the sort of sexual favours he could only have dreamed of previously. In the free and easy society of Moorish Spain, whilst the men were out breaking the strict prohibition on strong drink, the women were left free to break the even stricter prohibition on female unchastity.

The novelty of having a bit of rumpy-pumpy with a foreskinned man was highly prized among these women, who could normally only expect to experience circumcised partners. Consequently, any dishy or well-connected Christian prisoner was immediately taken over by the girls of the harem, and for two weeks he was required to perform prodigies of sexual virtuosity to satisfy these saucy Muslim ladies' lust and curiosity for gift-wrapped winkle. Thereafter of course he was given the chop and had the rest of his life to lament his lost foreskin, made all the more poignant by the value put on it just before the knife descended.

After the expulsion of the Moors (and Jews) in 1492, Spain joined the rest of Europe in being a totally uncircumcised society. And so it continued to the present day.

V.S. – London

Observations

For the first time I was disappointed by an Acorn newsletter – 5/92. Please don't let the pendulum swing too far and have it become an anti-circumcision manifesto. Instead of people bemoaning lost foreskins, they should be thanking their lucky stars for the comfort, cleanliness, and protection against urinary infection their circumcision has bestowed on them. As far as masturbation goes, and I have tried it with and without a foreskin, circumcised is infinitely more pleasurable. Before, I had to contend with a sore penis every time I sought some relief, which isn't much fun, whereas now it is a guaranteed source of pleasure.

I am the first roundhead that my present girlfriend has experienced, and she is a convert on the grounds of shape, cleanliness, feel, and staying power, not necessarily in that order. Prior to meeting me she worked in Italy, and has loads of horror stories concerning foreskins, from smell, smegma all over the place, to boys being able to have sex about once a fortnight because of sore and abraided foreskins. It seems that, in Italy, boys are not taught to retract their foreskins, and so a tight one on a boy ends up as a tight one on an adult. Catholic teaching, at least in Europe, shamefully and inaccurately, equates circumcision to being Jewish, and for this reason alone some parents are reluctant to have their sons done, hoping that the problem will 'go away'.

Back to my girlfriend. She thinks that all boys should be done, and has become very adept at working the subject into the conversation, which can be a lot of fun at times.

Now, some amateur statistics. Recently we spent a weekend at a very large nudist complex on the south coast of France. Walking down the beach, and counting in one direction only, so as not to count twice, I observed all the naked boys from babies to the age of twelve or so. On the first day I counted 133, of whom 13 were circumcised. Of these, one was an Arab, and two Jewish brothers (parent wearing the star of David), thus leaving 10 non-religious circumcisions – or 7.5%. On day two, at a different time, the count was 98, of whom 8 were circumcised, or 8.1%. This proves to me that the message of the health benefits of this benign and simple operation are not getting through to modern parents, which I simply cannot understand. Is it a conspiracy by the medical profession, and if so, why? From overheard conversation, the circumcised boys were from many different countries – France, Germany Italy, England, Scandinavia and so on, no country having a monopoly. Most semmed neatly done (plastibell?), but all seemed to me to have had too little skin removed, leaving it either bunched up behind the glans or even slightly covering the rim, which surely cuts down on the hygiene benefits. One unfortunate boy (French) had the left side of his glans completely uncovered, but the right side covered halfway along its length. Scandalous. When I reload film in total darkness in my darkroom I cut it much more accurately than that. This, of course, is a catch 22 thing. If more circumcisions were carried out, the person doing it could achieve and maintain a high standard. I still feel that the best method is freehand by a skilled operator.

We all know that America and Australia are the main proponents of non-religious circumcision. A few years ago I was in Mexico on business, and I noticed that at least 50% of the naked boys on the beach were circumcised, both the 'European descent' upper class and local Indian children. Could this be because of the proximity to the USA? I once saw a collection of photographs of male nudes taken in Brazil by a very talented lady photographer, and 90% were circumcised, with visible circumcision lines on the shaft some way behind the glans, so they weren't faking it. Not like that pathetic sight so prevalent on nude beaches, of the cavalier with his foreskin retracted with all the skin bunched up, fooling nobody.

V.W. – France

Vasectomy

As an ardent supporter of Acorn I always look forward to receiving the next copy. Long may the publication run, and many thanks for giving us, the readers, such a vehicle. Like, I suspect, most males who give circumcision consideration, I fall into one of the two camps. For the record, I'm in favour – my parents were not – so I elected to have the cut privately, via a Forum recommendation, some 12 years ago. Strange to say, I enjoyed the experience (the only loss I felt was that I would not be able to have it again!). My only regret at being circumcised was to find that I still had that ugly bunch of skin underneath my shaft, known as the frenulum. Like other views expressed, I too would like to see more articles on that 'little tag of skin' including the combined effects of the loss of same, and also techniques for properly excising it.

That however is not the main point of this letter, which is to develop a more contentious debate. Namely, who are the people who want circumcision, and what sex are they? The other, if it is relevant, is to make the readers aware of the details of vasectomy.

For a number of years I have gradually come round to the conclusion that, despite what we males hope, the majority of women are not interested in circumcision, and that, in general, we kid ourselves that we are cut for the benefit of women, when in fact it is to appease some hidden urge in ourselves. I suspect that, for those in favour of the cut, the reason is that it makes the penis look more 'penis-like' and ready for action even when flaccid.

Certainly, the reaction from friends, when on a recent first-time naturist holiday, supports the distinction between the sexes. Amongst a group of 6 couples from different parts of the UK who banded themselves together, it was interesting to note the reaction when, towards the end of the holiday – when we had all got on 'comfortable' together – we had a farewell meal and drinks to long in the night in one of the chalets. Late on, the topic changed to circumcision, caused by my wife warning one of the men to be careful with the scissors he was using (in trimming some rope-soled sandals he was making as his holiday project), as otherwise he would end up like me. This broke the ice, and it was amazing as to how something that had been ignored (I was the only circumcised one in the group) for the whole holiday, now was talked about by all present for the best part of an hour. What I did notice, was that the women were very direct, including some investigative 'clinical' handling (with my wife's permission). But once their questions and statements were made, that was it, whilst the men were more 'furtive', and did not want to drop the subject. Basically, the women's comments that could be treated as being favourable were, that it looked neater and was easier to keep clean; those against were that there was nothing to play with. Of the other five couples, three wives concluded that they did not mind either way, one was vehemently opposed and felt sorry that such a barbaric thing had been done to me, and the last one was in favour, but only if the surgeon could do it thoroughly enough so that masturbation could be made more difficult. She felt strongly that sex should be just that – internal – and was upset at the thought of other alternatives as they implied that she couldn't satisfy her husband. Four of the men preferred the cut look, with two of them actually thinking about the operation seriously. Amusingly, the one against was the husband of the wife who was in favour. Food for thought!

Finally I come to the other point of my letter, and that is vasectomy. I knew the theory and seen small articles, but never really in the actual sense of how is it done and how do you feel (apart from the propoganda view – I went back to the office in the afternoon. Or the joke – I was in intensive care for about three months). I would say that my pain threshold is average and my healing qualities are good. I'm reasonably fit. So what happens?

First of all you have to make the decision in your own minds. My wife wanted to come off the pill, we are in our early forties and have children (I for one feel a shudder at the thought of more sleepless nights and have no urge to return to them). We are monogamous so AIDS is not, hopefully, a worry, and I hate the sheath as I find it a real turnoff to stop and put a condom on as events get exciting. With that in mind we decided on sterilisation, and as my wife did the work with the 'kids' it was decided that I do the work with the 'snip'.

The next decision was NHS or private. From what we could see the choice was really 'you pay if you want it done tomorrow'. I made three or four enquiries and found that private prices verged from about £80 to £400, with a maximum wait of about a week. The NHS was free but the wait was 12 weeks. We went for the wait (apart from the cost it also give a breathing space for reconsideration which I feel is no bad thing).

I rang the local family planning clinic and got an appointment within the week for both my wife and myself. Personally I was disappointed with this interview as I felt it went through the motions and was just a vehicle. This may well have been purely the individuals responsible. I left with an appointment card.

On my own initiative, closer to the actual vasectomy date, I rang the centre and was luckily put through to the vasectomy nurse. From my questions I learnt things, most of which should have been explained or advised me at the interview.

1. Travelling – If you are driving yourself it's OK as long as the trip is not much more than thirty minutes, as by then the local starts to wear off.
2. Work – Unless you're a macho hero take at least one day off after the operation.
3. Shaving – Shave yourself all around your scrotum (and penis) for about a week before the operation. Your skin is stabilised better regarding irritations. Use a ladies shaving cream as it is more oily, and do the shaving whilst lying in the bath.
4. Support – Forget the line about tight underpants for support, swimming trunks are best. You really do need all the support you can get, not only for your testicles, but to keep the dressings in place (in my case two squares of dressing on each cut).

The day came. I duly arrived and was ushered into the vasectomy suite (for want of better words) by the vasectomy nurse, a nice calming middle-aged woman, not a dragon or a young slip of a girl. She asked me to remove my trousers and underpants and climb onto the table, where she arranged me lying with my legs together. She cupped my testicles and asked me to forget being vasectomised, but did I still want my testicles sterilised so that they could not make any more children. When I said I did she then gave my whole genital area a thorough antiseptic wash. For the record, as she was doing this she remarked that she saw someone had done a very thorough job circumcising me and “did it ever feel too tight, poor thing” It was then time for the surgeon. A man of very few words who got to work quickly. He injected around my scrotum and the base of my penis (the same degree of pain as the dentist’s injection), and, after pausing, he dug into my sac where it joined the groin, made a cut of about an inch and a half and fished out about 2” of my vas deferens tubing. He then clamped, tied, and cut off each end, and stitched. The only sensation was a dull pulling feeling when he was teasing out the tubes. This was repeated on the other side, and then he left, leaving the nurse to dab away the drops of blood and put a dressing over the incision on each side. Picking up the tubes that had been cut off, she remarked that the surgeon believed in doing a thorough job, and once my residue sperm had cleared out of the tubes she would be surprised if my testicles hadn’t been sterilised, which proved to be the case.

My observations are:-

1. Yes, the operation as claimed is simple, quick and relatively painless.
2. Afterwards you’ve got about three or four hours before the local fully wears off.
3. Forget about going to work the next day. Despite what’s said, you feel pretty rough.
4. For the first month or so afterwards you need a jockstrap.

C.W. – Fife

The Multi-Lingual Dictionary

Here are a few more words for the dictionary.

Finnish:- Circumcise = Ymparileikata.
Foreskin = Esinahka
Glans = Terska
Penis = Penis or Siitin
Willy = Kikkeli or Pippeli
Cock = Kyrpa or Mulkku

Swedish:- Foreskin = Forhud
Glans = Ollon (Acorn!)
Penis = Penis or Manslem (Male member)
Williy = Snopp
Cock = Kuk or Pitt

Arabic:- Circumcision = Khitan

J.H. – Helsinki

Saga (Conclusion)

The first erection was, again, on D4, but during the daytime. This again was truly alarming, but for a slightly different reason. Whereas before the whole organ was stretched to truly drumtight intensity, only the underside now was, with the result that the knob tipped over like a nodding head, so that I was looking along its top surface obliquely instead of down on to it. For a while this really was worrying, as the previous result had not been that unsatisfactory, and I hated the idea that too much had been removed. Nevertheless, by D45 the returned elasticity of the affected area almost entirely eliminated the effect. By the sixth month the tightest spot was by the dorsal vein, where the corona is pulled very slightly out of line by the shaft skin when erect – the whole glans being pulled also slightly out of shape all around the erect tissue. The frenum, despite the earlier refusal, appeared to have been almost completely eliminated, and the scarline there seemingly further back than before, possibly as a result of the release of what tension had been caused by it.

Now, nine months after my 'tailoring', I feel ready to take stock and try to give an overall impression of something I can still scarcely believe has come to pass. Many are interested in the difference before and after. Even to one retracted for more than four decades, they are still considerable, although the exposure of the glans and its desensitising, which must be the main one, are for me, back in history.

In the first few days, the first thing I noticed was the extra exposure of the corona, which caught the light in a way never before. Behind it, a thin dark groove denoted a truly circumcised state. Here, I was pleased to see that the sulcus was free of the little roll of skin, even when fully flaccid. A little later, when feeling started to return, I could feel a new sensation: of the all-round pull of the shaft on the corona about which nothing could be done, there being now no way to release the small amount of tension which caused it. Before, the tension, such as there was, was taken up by the frenum. Even when erect, the tension would gradually diminish from it around and upward, so that a slight fold of retracted foreskin at 6 o'clock (the dorsal vein area) was visible.

Later still, when walking around, I had an odd sensation as if the underside of the foreskin only had been replaced and was forward. Investigation revealed that this was caused by contact with the scrotum by the newly exposed and still slightly sensitive inner foreskin – areas of which having been given exposure because of the almost complete removal of the frenum, and resultant flattening out of the skin which before had lain in folds around it. Visually, this results in a distinct ‘undercut’ on the underside, which is very satisfying to me, although it makes the whole penis feel smaller – something which is felt every time it is pulled out for a pee, as all four fingers were normally placed along here with the thumb above in order to take a grip.

Urination was inclined to be messy until I realised that I had changed my grip from my normal first and second fingertips above and below the glans, to either side, because of a tender frenal area. The usual squeezing on completion was less effective in exhausting the last drops this way, and when I had re-learned to place my fingers above and below for the final squeeze, all was again well.

The little roll of skin mentioned earlier when fully flaccid, can obviously be the cause of difficulty in differentiating between the two states. However, with most retracts, a dark area among the folds betrays the existence there of a foreskin, being the area around the opening when forward. This can be seen in many H. & E. photographs. This roll is un-noticeable, unlike a retracted foreskin, which always gave a feeling of constriction, however slight. The effect now is of total comfort – something I had never dreamed of.

I consider myself as satisfied as possible with the present result, which has achieved the aim of keeping the corona free at all times. The only slight reservation is the slight untidiness when totally flaccid, but this could be the result from my mature age when cut.

The scarline is intriguing, as it makes a big departure on the underside from the main line at 0.6 to 0.8cm from the corona, to form a vee at 2cm to enclose most of the remainder of the frenum, much of whose sensitivity (although far from all) has now returned. The scar on the left is now neater, presumably as a result of the crushing technique used. The stitches used were at either end of the recut length, which followed the original cut line entirely, only departing near the frenum, presumably as the result of a slip. The little twinges of pain appear to be a thing of the past. When erect, the glans is pulled very slightly out of shape – a very acceptable penalty.

I have been confined to masturbation for about two years now (I consider myself as hetero as possible). I found after the first op that I had to experiment a fair amount, the second making no difference to my problems. My method had been the normal foreskin backward and forward routine, although very occasionally I would fantasise about being circumcised while just moving the shaft skin, gliding the fingertips along the whole length. And, in the shower with soap, taking a deep (but not tight) grip and sliding. Now, I tried all these, the first requiring a lot of effort and giving me an elbow ache just to barely cover the glans. (Just moving the shaft skin, circumcised or un, was never really satisfactory; the extra effort had to be made to get the skin available up on to the corona). I used this method in a horrible Asian loo with the aid of a mental picture of a particularly lovely model, to 'collect' my specimen. The method I now use without elbow ache is with the thumb loosely along the top. I find that it provides almost the same effect and satisfaction as the foreskin, as the shock of covering the corona, which is so important, is fleeting only – lasting just as long as the pressure point (the thumb) passes overhead on its way forward.

Nevertheless, it is not quite the same, and coupled with the loss of the sensitive frenum, I can easily understand and sympathise with those who didn't want the op. All the same, I find orgasms enhanced, presumably for psychological reasons.

I was confused by the term 'crushing', so one day I asked my Australian doctor friend about it. She said, "It's used for the reuniting of any fine flesh which has been severed, such as internally, or where the edges can be accurately realigned, such as the foreskin. They are clamped hard together for a few seconds, after which they stick together."

(The End)

Does Circumcision Affect Penis Sensitivity?

By Dr. C.A. Tripp (Writing in American Forum)

Yes, certainly. Circumcision causes a number of penile changes and, strangely enough, both circumcised and uncircumcised men tend to claim 'advantages' for their respective conditions.

The glans of the penis, and especially the corona, is loaded with nerve endings. When these surfaces are protected by a foreskin, that is mainly drawn back only during sexual excitement, they are sensitive.

But is that good or bad? Retention of foreskin is a clear disadvantage for the male who happens to have hair-trigger responses and who is often thrust into premature ejaculation. But other males may especially enjoy playing with this very same kind of high sensitivity – first revving themselves up with delicate stimulations, then suddenly stopping all stimuli to allow their arousal to wane, then again building up their excitement, perhaps to ever increasing peaks, and so on.

When the penis lacks a foreskin, its exposure to air and to routine friction from clothing leaves it less sensitive to small tactile stimulations – in effect, making it require more arousal before it gets started. But, as the circumcised male might be quick to point out, there is seldom any shortage of stimulation in sex.

A far more common problem in sex is painful overstimulation – especially during mouth-genital contacts, and in various other situations in which a man may not have instant control over the amount of pleasure being delivered. Here, a circumcised male's less sensitive penis surfaces may give him an advantage. Not that that debate ends anywhere near here: like sex itself, it goes on and on.

A major complaint for a great many males is a nerve-jangling, excruciating over-sensitivity of the penis immediately following orgasm. (For an especially unlucky few, this pain occurs right before and during orgasm, sometimes causing them to have to withdraw instantly and/or scream in anguish). The specific origins of this probably neurologic condition are not known.

But in its more ordinary, everyday form (an immediate post-orgasmic leave-me-alone or let-me-out-here reaction that many wives interpret as 'selfishness') the uncircumcised male may have a surprising advantage. His withdrawing penis tends to be promptly covered and thus protected by the foreskin – all the more reliably so if, as with most males, he begins to lose his erection immediately following orgasm.

Various cultures around the world have long held beliefs in favour of circumcision. For example, circumcision is said to help prevent cancer of the penis, and that it is otherwise necessary for cleanliness. In fact, the smegma that is secreted under the foreskin is largely antibiotic, and the limited kinds of bacteria that do survive there tend to be slightly itchy, forcing males in even the most unhygienic societies to keep this area most remarkably clean.

While various advantages and disadvantages can be cited for or against circumcision, they all tend to be trade-offs. In any case, it is clear that circumcision does affect the penis and alter its sensitivities.

Contact Corner

I am a 30 year-old American tattoo artist who was brought up with a foreskin, but had myself circumcised at 20. I would like to correspond with any member circumcised as an adult.

Bil Brierley
P.O.Box 26465
San Jose
California 95159-6465
U.S.A.

---

A member, who wishes to remain anonymous, would like to hear the views from other Acorn members who have recently had circumcisions, before he finally considers the cut. I will forward all letters on to him. D.A.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 3

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Morning Hard-on Explained	P.D.	Page 2
More Statuses		Page 3
Reliability	R.H.	Page 7
Reliability	A.D.	Page 7
Commonwealth Statistics	Anon	Page 8
Looking Back in Time	H.J.M.	Page 9
Vasectomy	P.D.	Page 9
Bead Implants	D.A.	Page 10
Double Willy	A.W.	Page 11
Preference	Anon	Page 12
Matriarchal Sexual Abuse	R.B.W.	Page 12
Masturbation	Dr. Ray	Page 14
Snippet		Page 16
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

My American friend Bill, who advertised in the last issue, found himself on the wrong side of the law, a very easy thing to do in California apparently. He had what is known as a 'traffic violation', and found himself in the local jail for a statutory 90 days. However, he has managed to extricate himself and got out after about 30 days. His findings in the prison were a little of a revelation to him. There were 100 men in his wing, 55 Mexican/Latino, 25 black, 15 white and 5 Asians. What bugged him was that he saw more foreskins than he had ever seen, just about only the whites being circumcised. And this, America.

Another thing that puzzled him was the fact that nearly all retracted their foreskins in the showers; he thought, to emulate the circumcised. I had to tell him that this was normal practice with foreskinned men.

I've received quite a few letters thanking goodness that 'Saga' is over at last. When I started it I had nothing to put in the newsletter even though I'd begged around the members and, once started, there was no stopping. As I've said before, I don't like cutting items around – and it was a good space filler, giving me no problems on filling all the pages accurately. May I say here that I'm always short of 'personals', and overloaded with literature from books and magazines etc. How about some 'beginnings' like what I wrote (Ernie Wise) in the last issue?

D.A.

Your Morning Hard-on Explained An article in The New Scientist sent in by P.D. – Dublin

Forget the oysters – reach for the oxygen cylinder. This, roughly interpreted, is the implication of a joint study on the common causes of impotence by researchers from the U.S. and Israel.

Irwin Goldstein of Boston University and his colleagues from Ramban Medical Centre in Israel and the University of Southern California carried out clinical and experimental studies on humans and rabbits. They say that the physiological mechanisms that promote the erection of the penis are driven by oxygen. Anything that stops the oxygen from getting to the penile tissue – high blood pressure, atherosclerosis, diabetes, smoking or physical injury – can cause impotence.

A year ago, the same research team challenged conventional wisdom by claiming that most cases of male impotence are the result of physiological, not psychological factors. They and other researchers reported that crucial to a successful erection is the local production of nitric acid – by certain nerves to the penis, and by the endothelium, or cell lining, of certain penile blood vessels. Via the autonomic dilator nerves, sexual arousal promotes the production of nitric oxide, which causes the penis's spongy tissue – corpora cavernosa – to relax and flood with blood from the penile artery. Meanwhile, the penile veins are constricted, blocking the outflow of blood, causing a sustained erection.

The new study by Goldstein and his colleagues reveals that the production of nitric oxide by penile tissues is completely dependent on a high level of oxygen. Blood in the flaccid penis has low oxygen, typical of venous blood, while blood in an erect penis is fully oxygenated like arterial blood. These findings came to light thanks to volunteers, from whom blood samples were drawn at appropriate stages of their penile activity. The researchers tested the effect of varying levels of oxygen on nitric oxide production in laboratory experiments on human and rabbit tissue. They found that a high level of oxygen stimulated nitric oxide to be made, from the amino acid L-arginine and citruline, under the activity of the enzyme nitric oxide synthase. Nitric oxide, either produced via the enzyme system or added directly, stimulated the tissue samples to relax, the first step towards erection in the intact animal. Low levels of oxygen inhibited nitric oxide synthesis.

For most of the day, the penis is in a state of low oxygen, a circumstance that allows males to go about in a state of comfort. During sleep, however, an automatic system comes into play, producing four or five erections, each lasting about 45 minutes. It would appear that the possible function of these night-time erections is to give the penis the oxygen it needs to function normally.

[A lot of long words, but I'm sure you get the drift.

D.A.]

List of Penis Statues (Continued)

World Figures With Foreskins

Spiro Agnew	US Vice Pres.	Martin Luther King
Prince Albert	of Monaco	Sir Paul Latham	Bart
John Dean III	Nixon Aide	Rod McKuen	Poet
John Gavin	U.S. Amb. to Mexico	Henry Miller	Author
Prince Harry		Ezra Pound	Author
Hugh Hefner	Playboy Mag.	Ronald Reagan	President
David Hockney	Artist	Justin Trudeau	Canada
Rev. Jesse Jackson		Harry Truman	President
Edward Kennedy's Sons		Jimmy Walker	N.Y. Mayor
Jack Kerouac	Writer	Prince William

World Figures Circumcised

Idi Amin	Uganda	Robert Kennedy	Senator
Prince Andrew		Ted Kennedy	Senator
Yasser Arafat	P.L.O.	John Maynard Keynes	Econ.

W.H.Auden	Poet	Henry Kissinger	Diplomat
Ray Bradbury	Author	Calvin Klein	Designer
Richard Burton	Explorer	D.R.Lange	N.Z.P.M.
George Bush	President	Robert Ludlum	Author
Jimmy Carter	President	Norman Mailer	Author
Prince Charles		Robert Maxwell
Eric Delvalle	Panama Pres	Prince Michael	of Kent
Prince Edward		Brian Mulroney	Canada P.M
Edward V111		Richard Nixon	President
Albert Einstein	Maths	Oliver North	U.S.Army
Sigmund Freud	Psycho.	Joe Orton	Playwright
Uri Geller	Physics	Lee Harvey Oswald	Assassin
Prince Georg	Denmark	Shimon Peres	Israel P.M
George V		Csar Peter the Great
George VI		Tsar Peter 111
Prince George	Duke Kent	Prince Phillip
J. Paul Getty Jnr.		Mark Phillips
Barry Goldwater	Senator	Ronald Reagan Jnr.
Sir Edmond Hillary		Vidal Sassoon	Hair
Sir Keith Holyoake	N.Z.P.M.	Neil Simon	Playwright
A.E.Housman	Poet	Lytton Strachey	Writer
Anthony Armstrong Jones		Gore Vidal	Author
Kadaffi	Libya	Evelyn Waugh	Writer
John F. Kennedy	President	Tennessee Williams	Author

Sportsmen With Foreskins

Mario Andretti	Car Racing	Geoff Howarth	NZ Cricket
Max Baer	Boxing	Magic Johnson	Basketball
Boris Becker	Tennis	Jean Claude Killy	Skiing
Jeff Crowe	NZ Cricket	Ivan Lendl	Tennis
John Curry	Skating	Joe Louis	Boxing
Jack Dempsey	Boxing	Diego Maradona	Football
Joe Dimaggio	Baseball	Mike Mazurki	Wrestling
Stefan Edberg	Tennis	Miloslav Mecir	Tennis
Bobby Fischer	Chess	Ilia Nastase	Tennis
Vitas Gerulaitis	Tennis	Pele	Football
Jason Goodall	Tennis	Guillermo Vilas	Tennis
Emille Griffith	Boxing	Mats Willander	Tennis
Bjorn Borg	Tennis

Sportsmen Circumcised

Muhammad Ali	Boxing	Bruce Lee	Mart. Arts
Arthur Ashe	Tennis	Sugar Ray Leonard	Boxing
Allan Border	Cricket	Carl Lewis	Athletics
Rick Carey	Swimming	Dennis Lillee	Cricket

Pat Cash	Tennis	John McEnroe	Tennis
Steve Cauthen	Jockey	Yannick Noah	Tennis
Jimmy Connors	Tennis	Ken Norton	Boxing
Peter Doohan	Tennis	Mark Spitz	Swimming
Bob Falkenberg	Tennis	Tom Watson	Golf
Tom Falkenberg	Tennis	Lew Hoad	Tennis

Entertainers With Foreskin

Benny Anderson	Abba	Tom Jones	Singer
Paul Anka	Singer	Mario Lanza	Opera
Adam Ant	Pop	John Lennon	Beatles
Dezi Arnaz Jr	Singer	Daniel Lewis	Conductor
Eddie Arnold	Singer	Jerry Lee Lewis	Pop
Baryshnikov	Ballet	Liberace	Pianist
Chuck Berry	Pop	Johnny Mathis	Singer
Sonny Bono	Bono	Don MacLean	Singer
David Bowie	Pop	Keith Moon	Pop
Glen Campbell	Singer	Bob Newhart	Comedian
Kenneth Carr	Singer	Peter Noone	Pop
Johnny Carson	US TV Host	Rudolph Nureyev	Ballet
Johnny Cash	Singer	Tony Orlando	Singer
Gower Champion	Dancer	Charlie Pride	Singer
Francis F Coppola	Director	Johnny Ray	Singer
Franco Corelli	Opera	Jerry Reed	Singer
Walter Cronkite	US TV	Steve Reeves	Mr Univ
John Denver	Singer	Cliff Richard	Singer
Anton Dolin	Ballet	Keith Richard	R Stones
Placido Domingo	Opera	Little Richard	Pop
Donovan	Pop	Ringo Starr	Beatles
Duane Eddy	Pop	Sting	Pop
Everly Bros.	Pop	Bjorn Ulvaeus	Abba
Rainer Fassbinder	Director	Sid Vicious	Pop
Bob Geldorf	Pop	Bobby Vinton	Singer
Boy George	Pop	Andy Williams	Singer
Robert Goulet	Singer	Bill Wyman	R Stones
George Harrison	Beatles	Billy Idol	Pop
Jimi Hendrix	Singer	Mick Jagger	R Stones
Julio Iglesias	Singer	Elton John	Singer

Entertainers Circumcised

Don Adams	Comedian	Marty Ingels	Comedian
Larry Adler	Harmonica	Michael Jackson	Pop
Peter Allen	Singer	Jackson Five	Pop
Herb Alpert	Musician	George Jessel	Comedian
Mory Amsterdam	Comedian	Billy Joel	Singer

Frankie Avalon	Singer	Brian Jones	R Stones
Burt Bacharach	Composer	Alan Ladd Jr	Producer
Jon Bauman	Pop	Frankie Laine	Singer
BeeGees	Pop	Steve Lawrence	Singer
Tony Bennett	Singer	Ted Lewis	Musician
Edgar Bergen	Ventrillo	Barry Manilow	Singer
Irving Berlin	Composer	Manfred Mann	Pop
Shelly Berman	Comedian	Sir Nev Marriner	Conductor
Leonard Bernstein	Conductor	Tony Martin	Singer
Joey Bishop	Comedian	Jacky Mason	Comedian
Mel Blanc	Cartoons	Paul McCartney	Beatles
Marc Bolan	Pop	Yehudi Menuhin	Violin
Victor Borge	Comedian	Arthur Miller	Playwright
Lenny Bruce	Comedian	Mitch Miller	Singer
Eddie Cantor	Comedian	Jim Morrison	Doors
Alice Cooper	Pop	Rick Nelson	Singer
Aaron Copland	Composer	Osmonds	Pop
David Copperfield	Magician	Jan Peerce	Opera
Billy Crystal	Comedian	Roman Polanski	Director
Xavier Cugat	Musician	Cole Porter	Composer
Bobby Darin	Singer	Otto Preminger	Director
Neil Diamond	Singer	Andre Previn	Conductor
Walt Disney	Cartoons	Carl Reiner	Comedian
Jason Donovan	Singer	Buddy Rich	Musician
Bob Dylan	Pop	Rubinstein	Pianist
Ziggy Elman	Musician	Tommy Sands	Singer
Brian Epstein	Beatles	Neil Sedaka	Singer
Eddie Fisher	Singer	Artie Shaw	Musician
Art Garfunkel	Singer	Dick Shawn	Comedian
George Gershwin	Composer	Stephen Sondheim	Composer
Ira Gershwin	Lyricist	Aaron Spelling	Producer
Stan Getz	Musician	Steven Spielberg	Director
Peter Green	Pop	Bruce Springsteen	Singer
George Hamilton	Singer	Isaac Stern	Violin
Marvin Hamlisch	Composer	Mick Taylor	R Stones
Lorenz Hart	Lyricist	Mike Todd	Producer
Jascha Heifetz	Violin	Mel Torme	Singer
Ernest Hemingway	Writer	Frankie Vaughan	Singer
Jerry Herman	Composer	Andy Warhol	Artist
Horowitz	Pianist	Charlie Watts	R.Stones
Houdini	Magician	Billy Wilder	Director
Eng Humperdinck	Singer

[I've left hundreds out, but they're all those that I think are well-known in America but not here, such as baseball, ice hockey, TV, and comedy stars. Now here are some comments I've already received regarding the first lists.]

Reliability

I am fascinated by the lists of famous cuts and uncuts, but what certainty is there that the information is correct. From the errors I have spotted I doubt that the lists are really reliable. For example:-

Charlie Chaplin and Johnny Weismuller were Jews and so would have been circumcised. George Maharis, when he appeared in Playgirl, although his dick was meant to be discreetly hidden, in one shot you can see a well-defined and exposed dick-head. As the photos were not meant to be full frontal I doubt he had skimmed back his foreskin for the sake of his American viewers.

Also I have seen photos of Arnold Schwarzenegger looking very much like a roundhead, unless he has such a naturally short foreskin it is permanently behind the rim.

I happen to know, but cannot without breaking a confidence say how, that Tom Selleck has a big cut dick. [The more up-to-date list that I have received does put Tom Selleck as circumcised. D.A.]

To turn to the cut list, neither of the Carradines are roundheads, nor is Kris Kristopherson; and Errol Flynn was famous for his foreskin – there is even a limerick with skin and Flynn rhyming.

On the British list, John Hamill was a bodybuilder before he became a star. I know from a friend of mine who was competing often with him, that he went off and had himself done, and thereafter was proud of showing it off 'backstage'. If you saw Caligula then you will know that Malcolm McDowall is also a member of the cut club.

So you see I am sceptical as to how accurate these lists are. To the circumcised American list you can add Don Johnson and Brad Pitt.

R.H. – London

In the list of uncut U.S. actors I was bemused to read the name of Yul Brynner. Many years ago I saw a nude full-frontal picture of the man in one of the Sunday paper magazines. It showed the young Yul sporting a full head of hair and a long thick, heavy organ with a fully exposed acorn. I am searching my files for this picture, which I know I have saved.

Just before his death, Rudolph Nureyev made a TV documentary about his art. At the end he appears nude, fully frontal, displaying a long well-formed organ with a fully exposed glans.

Possibly both men retracted their foreskins for the photo opportunity.

A.D. – Oxford

Commonwealth Statistics

The list of 'famous foreskins' made quite interesting reading, and gave rise to three observations:-

1. How on earth was this list compiled? I will admit to discreet 'cock-spotting' at the swimming baths and on the local naturist beach – does this go on in Hollywood too?

2. I think Peter Sellers was born in India, where circumcision of 'British' children was common. His fellow Goon, Spike Milligan, was born to an army family and circumcised in Poona circ. 1920. He admits to this in one of his many army autobiographies.

3. Some of the names given as American are not so. Charlie Chaplin was British and Schwarzenegger German, hence it is quite probable that they were not circumcised at birth (which they almost certainly would have been if born in the U.S.). I note that British born Bob Hope is on neither list. Many of the names seem to be south European in origin – Brando, Brazzi etc. and also Dean Martin (born Dino Crocetti). Were parents from such backgrounds less likely to have had their sons circumcised.

A pattern of this nature has certainly been seen in Canada. In 1973/74 47.4% of baby boys and in 1974/75 46.8% were neonatally circumcised (source: Medical Journal of Australia, 1977, p.760). However, whereas circumcision is very common amongst Canadian families of British origin, it is virtually unknown in French Quebec. Out of interest, members might like the Australian figures too; 49.5% and 48.6% for the years in question. The Australian figures are thought to underestimate the true numbers, as they relate only to those performed on babies whose parents had health insurance. All baby boys of uninsured parents, boys born in the public wards of public hospitals, and boys born at home, could have been circumcised, not counted in the above figures. The Journal defines neonatal as under four weeks old, thus perhaps further reducing the figures. As an advocate of neonatal circumcision (though circumcised as an adult myself), I feel that Britain has abandoned a valuable health and hygiene matter, and perhaps ought to reconsider the issue in the light of the high proportions of U.S., Canadian and Australian circumcisions.

Regarding Transform Medical Group (in the last issue). When I lived in the North I contacted them about circumcision. They wanted a recommendation from my G.P. before they would proceed. Mine was eventually done by Dr. Siffman.

Anon

[Chuck Thompson doesn't claim his lists to be infallible. In fact he asks for corrections and updates, and gets them as shown below:-

President Kennedy had been in the uncut columns until someone sent in a book called The Kennedy's: An American Drama where it noted that the future President was circumcised in 1938, while a student at Harvard. Writing to a friend at Princeton, John Kennedy wrote, "Get me a room away from all others, as I don't want you coming in for a chat and discussing how sore my cock is. As for your rather unnatural interest in my becoming circumcised, my cock has never been in better shape or doing better service."

Phil Donahue devoted one of his shows to circumcision (we get them in the middle of the night on ITV), and with the list in his hand stated that he was improperly listed, so we know that one's correct. D.A.]

Looking Back In Time

When I was 13 years old I became friendly with a boy in our street who was 3 years older than me. Instead of playing kids' games I went to the cinema, billiard halls, and roller skating etc. with him. He was a nice boy who my parents liked and knew that I wouldn't get into trouble with him.

We sometimes called in the gents' on the way home, and one day I noticed that his penis was about three times larger than mine, with about a 1.5" overhang. I told him that I wished that I had one like his, and after looking at mine, he said that I would in a couple of years, and not to worry.

We went for a walk in the country one nice summer day and sat down behind a hedge in a field for a rest. I dozed off, and when I awoke I could see Dave carressing his 'pride and joy'. It was a beautiful sight, although it was fully erect. There was about half an inch of foreskin overhang. I have never seen anything to compare since. He asked me if I would carress it for him and I was only too happy to oblige. He gave me instructions on how he wanted me to do it. It was very flexible and mobile to manipulate, as though his foreskin was made of elastic. On the downstroke, although I drew it back below the rim, the tip never became uncovered. He took over when he reached the point of no return. Incidents like this happened frequently throughout that summer until he got a job, after which I never saw him again.

I have seen many cocks in the showers, but nothing to compare with Dave's.

H.J.M. – Mid Glamorgan

Vasectomy

It was a vasectomy at the age of 28 that re-awakened my urge to be circumcised, in spite of having a permanently retracted foreskin since I had been about 21. My recollections, 22 years later, of the events are somewhat patchy, but I remember I had no interview or counselling beforehand, as the job was done in East London, and I was living and working in Ireland.

It was in December and it was miserably cold. I had shaved the day before and was still uncomfortable. The operation itself was quite fascinating and painless, and was done with my wife watching also. We travelled up to Cambridge that afternoon by train, to spend the next few days redecorating our old house in between lets. That night we made love, which was probably a mistake, as the next morning my scrotum resembled a sort of double fig, dark purple, but not so swollen as to remove the wrinkles. I continued to add insult to injury by indulging in painting the house from top to bottom in the next three days, without adequate support in the injured region. The most discomfort that I remember came from the regrowing hairs in my groin, pricking both tender scrotum and less tender thighs. We had a needed rest at our parents' homes over Christmas.

When I got back I did my own sperm count immediately (14 days after the op) and found it to be zero. Subsequent counts at one week intervals for a month confirmed this, and my wife went off the pill in February. My semen changed colour from whitish to yellowish, and the vasectomy scars disappeared within a year. I also made my first attempt at self-circumcision within that year.

P.D. – Dublin

Bead Implants

Following on from a question that we put to Dr. Ray, I recently saw an advert in the magazine Piercing World, of a piercing specialist who was offering to do 'foreskin bead implants'. As he worked very near to me I called round to see him and asked some questions. I found that the diameter of the beads were from 6mm to 10mm and they can be either pearls, glass or stainless steel, the latter being the most common. Although they can be inserted anywhere along the shaft of the penis, they are generally placed under the inner foreskin, otherwise when the foreskin is retracted for sex the beads would be down at the base of the shaft. In circumcised cocks they can be inserted anywhere. A 0.25" slit is made in the skin, the ball inserted and then either a stitch is put in, or a piece of medical cling film put over it. It then heals within a week. Removing them is the same procedure. A drawing he gave me makes it look like a wart-covered penis. A recommendation is to have a large one on the top of the shaft to keep rubbing the clitoris during each stroke in intercourse.

For more information contact Phil Barry, 201, Two Mile Hill Road, Kingswood, Bristol. Tel. (0272) 603923. He also offered to give a £5 discount on any implant or piercing on production of a copy of Acorn.

Phil also gave me a copy of an interview with a woman who lived as a mistress in the Japanese underworld, which I will paraphrase for simplicity:

The yakuza are the Japanese mafia who often have beautiful tattoos all over their bodies. Supposedly the custom originated as a means of guarding against would-be infiltrators and informers. Generally, parts of their fingers are missing because over the years they chop them off, knuckle by knuckle, for various transgressions committed. They have to do this in front of their boss, and show no pain.

Men who have been in the yakuza often go to prison for various reasons – these are the lower class that take the fall for their boss. In prison they do penile implants, taking a pearl and inserting it under the skin of their penis, one for every year they're in jail. They carve down a chopstick or toothbrush to a very sharp point, split the skin open about 1/4" wide (anywhere from about 1/2" below the knob to about 1/2" above the base), lift the skin up and away, insert the pearl, and then bandage it so that the skin heals over and the area resembles a really big wart about 1/3" in diameter. Her boyfriend had 13 in his penis, going all round the shaft.

Self-mutilation appears to be a sign of humility and sacrifice. She says they are also into shooting up 'speed', they shoot it into their finger before they cut it off.

I'm glad I'm sort of civilised, or at least an ardent coward.

D.A.

Double Willy

I thought you might like to see the enclosed snippet from the Daily Mirror of 30.11.92:-

"A man held for a sex assault was found to have two penises. Jose Lopez, 26, was born with the abnormality, say the police in Malaga, Spain. A woman aged 30 had been held in his car for four hours, and he allegedly claimed other victims."

Other instances of double penis have been recorded, but this is the only example I have seen in the popular press.

A.W. – Sussex

[I was playing Trivia in mixed company one day, One lady was asked, under a biology question, what was the meaning of the condition known as 'diphallus'. She thought for a minute, then laughed to herself and said, "No, that's ridiculous". When asked, she told us that all she could think of was that di was the prefix for two and that left phallus, but whoever heard of anyone having two penises. She was right, though! I remember thinking, “Who should be so lucky!”, but I’ve since read that there is accompanying malformation of the rest of the genital system to go with it. D.A.]

Preference

A young lady set out on a mission to find out about circumcision.

And whether that way,
it helped men to stay
Provided she gave them permission.

This saucy young girl’s name was Harrison, and so she crept into a garrison.

She wasn’t oversexed,
or jealous, or vexed,
but just wanted to make a comparison.

The first lad was a slim cavalier, who thought he had nothing to fear.

Till she forced back his skin,
before he went in,
and said, “It’s a bit smelly, my dear.”

The next was a chubby young roundhead, and in him her fears proved unfounded.

As he pushed in his knob,
it felt just the job,
and the shriek of her orgasm sounded

Anon. – Bradford

Matriarchal Sexual Abuse

I was quite moved by your account of triumph over adversity in 2/93. The fact that you managed to emerge from a background of grinding poverty so successfully, and did not give in to the pernicious neurosis of envy which drives so many weaker brethren to part with their foreskins does you considerable credit. I hope you gained as much relief from your worries in ‘baring your soul’ as I did from doing the same in Issue Q a couple of years ago. You are lucky too in having the support of a ladyfriend who takes the normal commonsense view on such matters.

My congratulations too, on restoring the balance in Acorn’s content, thereby enabling me to renew my subscription. If it’s too slanted one way or the other you stand to lose customers, and anyway, a bit of cut and thrust make the paper so much more interesting in this connection. Why is it, I wonder, that it’s only the circumcisionists who take up an intolerant and unyielding attitude [only very few. D.A.], whereas the pro-foreskins tend to be a bit hesitant and apologetic? I seem to be the only bloke who is prepared to have a go at the sort of people who decreed that I should be mutilated at birth. What about some of you others who hint at how you feel (are you listening Anthony?) telling the blighters what their ill-considered actions can lead to? A bit of well-directed good-hearted resentment cannot go amiss. Incidentally, David, I do think people should be discouraged from writing sagas. The recent one did, unfairly in my view, monopolise a large chunk of last year's output, and, although entertaining in parts, the inevitable grind down the rose-strewn path to the nirvana of circumcision was so familiar. [See editorial D.A.]

Finally, something to exercise the minds of our more extreme tendency who aspire to the wholesale circumcision of mankind. There is an interesting report in Stern magazine of Mar 25th on the subject of women who commit child abuse in Germany. Apparently, about 10% of all sexually abused German boys are molested by women, two-thirds of them their own mothers or step-mothers. Prof. Gerhard Amendt of Bremen circulated about a thousand questionnaires on the subject and came to a surprising conclusion:- about one boy in every three is sexually stimulated by his mother when, out of fear of phimosis, she makes regular checks of his foreskin, thereby provoking sexual excitement in the lad. Amendt stresses that this is not abuse, but draws a fine line between motherly care and unacceptable acts, which could easily lead to incestuous activities and confusion.

The article then goes on to describe how some mothers bathe with their adolescent sons. Treating them as infants, they soap them all over and often worry that their offspring may have phimosis (seems to be a real source of angst in Germany), causing them to manipulate and examine their foreskins, thus provoking erections and sexual excitement. Matthias Dreß explains that many mothers, particularly if there's no man in the household, thus satisfy their own needs whilst justifying it as proper maternal concern. Such mothers have no guilt feelings; they claim it is for the child's own good. Dreß goes on to recount how a lot of mothers rationalise blatant sexual acts in this way, on the grounds of defusing the boy's sex drive. He cites a social worker who progressed from checking her 13 year-old's foreskin to full manual manipulation.

Now here's a chance for all you guys imbued with the crusading spirit! Why not form a mission to spread the word among the poor ignorant unenlightened and uncircumcised people of Germany? Sock it to them by leaflet and the spoken word how circumcision not only gives immunity from AIDS, pox, clap, urinary infections, excessive wanking and ingrowing toenails, but will also stop mothers from molesting their own sons, since they won't have anything to molest. And then, if in later life they discover, like I did, that their sawn-off organs are not acceptable to the German girl in the street, they can take comfort in Acorn's statistics which show they'll be welcomed by the gay community (who form a preponderance of Acorn's membership). Can't you just see all those hard-headed sensible German Fraus skipping about with anticipatory joy as they register this message of hope and happiness, and rush to join the queue to get young Fritz's foreskin whacked off.

R.B.W. – Bedford

Masturbation — Getting It Right

Introduction

There is no doubt that masturbation is by far the commonest form of sexual release enjoyed by man. Often from long before puberty the habit is established as a regular source of deriving personal pleasure. Only 1% of adult males claim never to have experimented with masturbation, and 95% of teenagers admit to it as a regular practice. Though there is a decline in prevalence during the passage of the years, even beyond the age of retirement at 65, one respected piece of research a few years ago revealed that over 40% of men enjoyed masturbating at least once a week. In their teens and twenties, the most sexually active years, many young people toss themselves off twice, or even three times a day, though the average seems to be about three times a week.

Yet, for all its popularity, masturbation is still surrounded by totally outdated taboos and prohibitions, leading to guilt, shame, embarrassment on the part of the individual, and obsessive vigilance against its practice by the forces of law in even the most remote of 'public' places. Where a copulating heterosexual couple may be mildly admonished by a bemused constable, a lone masturbator is more than likely to be arrested for obscene behaviour, and the press will have a field day reporting the case.

But masturbation is nature's safety valve, enabling the release of sexual energy which might otherwise so easily be diverted into violence, rape, incest and other truly offensive forms of sexual behaviour. Masturbation should be interpreted as a Celebration of Male Sexuality, to be enjoyed, encouraged and developed into a sophisticated form of sexual expression in its own right.

Masturbation is 'the real thing', no more and no less than fully partnered hetero- or homo-sexual penetrative intercourse. It is not a substitute for these other sexual activities. It is a totally legitimate and potentially fully satisfying form of sexual expression in its own right. It should be fostered, nurtured and worshipped as such.

Setting the Scene

Just as extreme hunger will drive a man to snatch at any opportunity to fill his stomach, regardless of the quality of the food or the ambience of the dining room, so there are times when masturbation is an urgent necessity to release high levels of sexual arousal. In such circumstance it may be necessary to forgo the luxury of choosing the right moment and surroundings, and to enjoy a 'quick wank'. This will restore the genital discomfort, inability to concentrate and temperamental irritability which frustrated sexual desire can generate.

However, masturbation is at its most successful when careful attention is given to such factors as the availability of plenty of time, a completely relaxed state of mind, security from undesirable interruptions, and a suitable ambience to suit the mood of the practitioner. This latter may vary from the soft furnished comfort of the low-lit lounge or 'boudoir' to the alfresco freedom of open beaches, country pastures, rugged mountain wastelands, or even a lonely pitch-dark cave. And masturbation is usually at its best when the session is commenced from a state of total sexual 'non-arousal', so that the full joys of developing what we loosely call 'the urge' completely from scratch, can be savoured to the full.

Whenever possible, total nakedness is usually preferred so that all parts of the body may be readily explored and stimulated. Masturbation should always be perceived as a 'whole body' – physical and emotional – experience, not merely a genitally orientated burst of physical stimulation.

Enjoying the Action

Sexual arousal is marked by several recognised stages which together form a complete cycle. At each of these stages there are techniques available to enhance the pleasure and to facilitate progression from one stage to the next.

i) The totally quiescent state – the resting state of non-arousal

This can be uplifted at least to a pleasant state of constant vague sexual awareness by the routine wearing of cockstraps, rings, snug briefs etc.

ii) The state of preliminary awareness and triggered arousal

Gradually, after a resting period, most men develop a vague, but persistent genital awareness or fullness, coupled with a sense of general irritability, inability to concentrate, and the emergence of sexual fantasies. This 'urge consciousness' is a spontaneous natural process which builds up as a period of sexual inactivity becomes prolonged. It can be triggered to occur more rapidly by such stimulants as pornography, sexy talk, explicit correspondence, visually attractive companions or passers-by etc.

In the context of masturbation starting from the resting state, this preliminary arousal can be achieved by stripping off in the chosen surroundings, consciously fantasising, relaxing and beginning the process of self-caressing and fondling.

(to be continued)

Dr. Ray

Snippet

(From Forum Advice)

I've noticed that when I go two or three weeks without sex or masturbating, my sperm comes out as a gelatinous sponge-like substance, with a more yellowish colour than usual. This only lasts for two or three ejaculations and then my sperm returns to normal. What could cause this and is it anything to worry about?

Answer: The ejaculate is less coloured and also known to be less viscous or thick after a few ejaculations or with frequent ejaculations. Probably the ejaculated material becomes more concentrated when it remains in the body for a period of time compared with the thinning and dilution that would take place by frequent ejaculations. There is a characteristic odour that is noted with ejaculation, and is normal.

Contact Corner

Retired hetero couple, both depilated and circumcised, wish correspondence with ladies or couples having similar interests. All letters answered and confidence respected.

A.W. – Sussex

ACORN

1993 Issue No 4

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Guessing and Reading	R.B.W.	Page 2
The Lists	D.P. &amp; R.H.	Page 3
The Dictionary	H.C. &amp; N.G.	Page 4
Masturbation – Getting it Right	Dr. Ray	Page 6
Ian's Tail	Ian	Page 8
Malayan Events	H.C.	Page 10
Forward Women	P.G.W.	Page 13

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

Not much to say this time. I was hoping to get this out earlier, but a lot of personal events have held me up. I expect to be moving house shortly, so I would ask those who write to my home address to use the Box number from now on. The telephone number should remain the same.

Also, I'm not altogether happy with the balance this month. I have loads of pro-foreskin material, but very little pro-circumcision. Anyone want to rectify matters a little? Anyway, happy reading.

D.A.

Guessing And Reading

I wrote in 6/92 asking for ideas to provide a taper to my reconstructed foreskin, and am grateful to P.D. for going to the trouble of describing a D.I.Y. solution in 8/92, although I'm not sure which way the cuts should go. Even if I was, I'd still have problems because I tend to throw a wobbly at the sight of blood. And anyway, I can't even carve a roast without cocking it up. I've had one knife and fork job done on my unfortunate organ – I couldn't take another! Perhaps someone has a suggestion which doesn't require me to be surgically trained.

Incidentally I recently had an open-heart op. and found myself fitted with a urinary catheter up my pipe when I woke up. I got friendly with the nurses and, chatting to one of them, discovered that she'd been the one to insert the catheter. I pulled her leg about it, whereupon she hesitated and then said could she ask me a personal question. Apparently when the guy is under and being prepared, the girls run a book on guessing whether he is circumcised, before the covers are removed (the patients are mostly my generation so the girls have an even chance). Most of the girls guessed (rightly) that I'd been done, but had to pay up 10p each for the Xmas fund on seeing my reconstituted foreskin. But when this was pulled back to free the opening of the glans to insert the catheter, the anaesthetist noticed the unsightly remains left by the butcher who had mutilated me as a kid, and told the nurses they'd been right first time. So my nurse was dead curious. When I told her how I'd stretched it to relieve the deep distress and anger I'd felt, she was entirely sympathetic, saying she couldn't understand why they were so keen to deform little boys in those days when it was totally unnecessary – very few younger men had it done, even among the so-called educated classes, nowadays.

Now some recommended reading: If you've got a decent library you could do worse than read Albert Moravia's subtle and sexually titillating novel '1934', about a young Italian in Capri who falls in love at a distance with a neurotic German girl. She leads him on whilst gently rebuffing him, only to disappear back to Germany and be replaced a day later by her identical twin sister who is her exact opposite character-wise. Lucio, being all fired up for the first sister, is attracted to the second by her close resemblance to the first, but slightly put off by her direct sexual approach. For example, when she invites him into her changing cubicle on the beach, and strips off in front of him, he admires her nude body but declines her insistent demand that he strip off too, and goes to change in private. They then take out a boat, and the girl starts questioning him about his background, eventually asking him if he is a Jew. He takes offence and wants to know why. She replies that she would have to go back to the beach and have nothing more to do with him if he was. He really takes umbrage, and says he'll row back anyway, whereupon she gets alarmed and stops him, but insists again in knowing if he's a Jew. When he finally admits he isn't, the girl asks him why he's not prepared to prove it – the Fuhrer (who had just come to power) forbade German girls to go with Jews. Lucio is perplexed, and asked what proof the girl expected. She explained that she had invited him into her cabin to undress only to see if his penis was circumcised; and thought his reluctance to do so may have meant he was Jewish and ashamed of it. Lucio was totally gobsmacked, but when she went on demanding proof, he gave in, pulled his trunks down and revealed his pristine fully foreskinned dong.

(This struck a chord with me, since I went through a similar process in Munchen-Gladbach in 1959 – but failed the test – see Issue Q.)

When Lucio goes to pull his trunks up, she won't let him, but stares avidly at his member until he erects. She then gets so aroused at the sight of his erect uncircumcised penis that she grabs his foot by the heel and toe, places the sole over her vulva and rubs it rapidly up and down until she comes. When she recovers, she says "Again!", and repeats the operation, eventually flopping back in total satisfaction.

This goes to illustrate the strength of the revulsion felt by German women for the circumcised organ, not just during the Nazi era either! From what I've heard they still feel the same way today.

R.B.W. – Bedford

The Lists

I've just received the most recent journal, most interesting as usual, and I wanted to say a couple of things about the lists:-

a) Charlie Chaplin was not in fact Jewish, so it is quite likely that he had a foreskin.

b) Nureyev was born of Muslim Tartar parents in the late thirties or early forties (his name contains the Arab root Nur). So it is very likely that he was circumcised. Two other great dancers, Irek Mukhammedov and Faroukh Ruzimatov, are also of Muslim origin; the disgraceful Soviet attempt to stamp out religious circumcisions from the fifties onwards may mean that they are uncircumcised.

c) There is a full frontal of Stallone in this month's For Women. It's poor quality, from his early career in soft porn movies, so don't rush to buy, but check it out in the shop. A close look shows that he is quite neatly circumcised.

d) We do need someone to do a similar list for British sportsmen.

D.P. – London

Further to my recent letter about my scepticism of the lists of 'celebrities' you have printed in Issue 2/93, you can add the following 'dead certs' to your American cut list:-

Brad Davies – run the video of Midnight Express frame by frame when he is naked before the police chief.

Sam J. Jones – he was Flash Gordon in the film, and a Playgirl centrefold.

Michael Brandon – of T.V. detectives Dempsey and Makepeace, but who, in another T.V. play, was clearly cut when he turned over in a bed scene.

I suspect you can add David Niven to the English cut list. In his autobiography The Moon's a Balloon, in his story of when caught short at a regimental dinner, he wrote about his 'acorn'.

R.H. – London

The Dictionary

A Malay Vocabulary.

- |                     |   |
|---------------------|---|
| 1. Penis            | Zakar or Butuh  |
| 2. Foreskin         | Kulup   |
| 3. Testicle         | Buah Pelir  |
| 4. Scrotum          | Kandung Buah Pelir (Kandung means to carry in a sack/sac) |
| 5. Semen            | Mani  |
| 6. Masturbation     | Rancap  |
| 7. To Masturbate    | Merancap  |
| 8. Circumcision     | Khatan, Sunat   |
| 9. To Circumcise    | Mengkhatankan or Menyunatkhan                             |
| 10. Penis (obscene) | Lanchiao  |

H.C. – London

Latin

- |                              |              |
|------------------------------|--------------|
| 1. Circumcise                | Circumcidere |
| 2. Circumcision              | Circumcisio  |
| 3. Foreskin                  | Praeputium   |
| 4. Glans and Penis are latin |              |

Greek (Classical)

- |          |                                 |
|----------|---------------------------------|
| 1. Penis | Posthe (grammatically feminine) |
|----------|---------------------------------|

Olde English

- |                 |              |
|-----------------|--------------|
| 1. Circumcise   | Ymbeceorfan  |
| 2. Circumcision | Ymbeceorfnes |

Arabic

- |             |                          |
|-------------|--------------------------|
| 1. Foreskin | Qulfa-t                  |
| 2. Penis    | Zakr (pronounced thak r) |

Gaelic

- |             |                |
|-------------|----------------|
| 1. Foreskin | Roimh-chraicin |
|-------------|----------------|

Esperanto

- |               |            |
|---------------|------------|
| 1. Circumcise | Cirkumcido |
| 2. Foreskin   | Prepucio   |

One of the topics that interests me most is the permanent retraction of the foreskin. This was not an 'option' in the questionnaire as I recall; either cut or not. Amongst uncut guys, there are those who are very fond of their foreskins and keep them in the 'natural' state always. But there are those who, for various reasons, prefer to keep them retracted. There has certainly been plenty of evidence amongst the newsletter material to suggest that this is fairly common. I have compiled a further questionnaire on this topic and would be very willing to analyse the replies if you would be willing to send them on to me. It would save time and money if all replies were forwarded at the same time, so perhaps a 'cut-off' date of four weeks or so after the publication date of the next newsletter could be imposed.

N.G. – Norfolk

[A questionnaire is included with this edition, and will go to the circumcised as well as the foreskinned, just for interests sake. D.A.]

Masturbation – Getting It Right (Continued)

iii) The Stage of Active Arousal and Foreplay.

We are now moving into the 'big time' and talking of the developing erection, more positive body caressing with concentration on the erogenous areas and specific methods of genital stimulation. The erogenous areas of the body vary somewhat from individual to individual, but tend to be concentrated in certain specific parts. These include the inner aspects of the thighs, the lower back and loins, the nape of the neck, the soles of the feet, the palms of the hands, the areas surrounding any natural body orifice – eg: mouth, nostrils, ears, eye orbits, nipples, umbilicus, anus – and of course, the whole genital area of cock, balls, perineum and pubis.

The pleasure of caressing any of these areas may be enhanced by the use of a lubricant such as baby oil or lotion or, in some areas, an astringent like after-shave or, even, a heat producing balm like Ralgex or Deepheat. Those who are 'nipple sensitive' may enjoy stimulating them with a nailbrush or with 'tit-clips' or weights. Silk, velvet cloth or soft fur can be gainfully employed in body caressing activities.

Techniques of penis stimulation by hand depends to some extent upon whether or not an individual is circumcised. Those with a mobile foreskin will be able to draw this to and fro over the glans penis by establishing a fairly firm grip on the shaft of the penis. Those without a foreskin, or those who prefer to masturbate with their foreskin fully retracted, are likely to employ a looser grip on the shaft, or simply the glans, and stimulate themselves with a sort of friction rub. The hand rubs over the glans to produce the arousal. This latter technique is rather more likely to cause minor abrasions and friction burns, but the risk of these can be reduced by the use of a lubricant.

As a general rule it should be remembered that the frenulum, the fold of skin on the under surface of the glans which attaches it to the foreskin, is usually particularly sensitive.

Penile 'containment' in a tight condom or proprietary masturbating device – eg: the 'Jac Pac' or the latex 'glove' of a penile vibrator – is often a very successful aid. It should not be forgotten that, where such devices are made of rubber, a non-oily, waterbased lubricant such as KY Jelly should be used.

A simple and very effective cock-containment device can be made from hollowing out a length of thick cucumber. The sleeve thus produced provides a deliciously cool masturbating tool.

Other aids, such as cock-straps or rings around the base of the penis or scrotum, to strengthen erection, or as a collar around the neck of the scrotum above the testicles, to resist the natural inclination of the testicles to rise up as arousal advances, are often very beneficial.

Penile base straps of the sort referred to above, not only impede blood drainage from the penis, thus encouraging erection, but also, when fitted fairly tightly to the flaccid organ before the commencement of masturbation, impose a narrowing at the base of the shaft during erection. This narrowing gives the erect penis a considerable flexibility of movement at its base, facilitating, for example, the ability to pull it downwards and firmly backwards between the legs from behind. Masturbation in this position is favoured by many for enhanced sensation.

Scrotum collar straps, because they prevent the testicles from rising up as arousal advances, require that the muscles involved in this lifting process must contract more firmly in an attempt to overcome this restraint. The stronger the muscles pull, the more exciting the sensation.

Other specific physical aids – eg: butt plugs and dildoes, inserted into the rectum to stimulate the prostate through the bowel wall; anal and penile vibrators; gradually stripping out of carefully selected erotic clothing, etc – can be experimented with. The growing sense of arousal may also be improved by employing more subtle outside stimuli – eg, masturbating in front of a mirror, using porn mags or videos, dialling stimulating telephone ‘chat lines’, or choosing suitable background music (I find Ravel’s Bolero particularly exciting as it builds up to its crashing crescendo in time with a leisurely wank). The ability to fantasize can be nurtured. Some people are able to develop the imaginative process tremendously, enabling pictures in the mind to be so vivid that they can virtually achieve orgasm without any manual stimulation at all. This, of course, reflects what happens during the course of a ‘wet dream’.

Hand-grip techniques vary enormously: to each his own preference. Some will prefer a fairly light two or three-finger grip while others favour a full fist encirclement of the shaft, with the thumb either at the base or the distal end of the penis. Yet others enjoy a two-handed grip and there are also those who swear by ‘rolling’ the penis between their open palms as if they were rolling out a length of plasticine. Some masturbators place equal emphasis on the upward and downward strokes, while others prefer true stimulation in one direction only, virtually releasing their grip on the ‘recoil’ stroke.

There are those who masturbate quickly and with great energy, often utilizing short strokes, while others prefer much slower, longer strokes. Exploring the variation of stroke, timing and grip, rather than sticking to one established pattern, can be fun.

It has already been pointed out that masturbation should be a whole body experience and, during arousal, while one hand is engaged in penile stimulation, the other should be caressing and exploring the rest of the body – tweaking nipples, pinching buttocks, stroking sensitive areas, sucking on fingers, poking quite firmly into the umbilicus, ‘finger-fucking’ the anus, etc. Body writhing and pelvic thrusting add to the developing excitement. New postures can be tried – pulling the penis between the legs from behind has already been mentioned – standing up, lying down on front, back or side, squatting, bending forward, drawing up the knees, arching the back and buttocks while supporting the body on feet and shoulders, etc. all help to bring into play groups of muscles which are more than happy, if given the opportunity, to get in on the action. Even tightly curling the toes can increase the general sense of well-being and excitement. A few young and supple men, apparently about 0.05%, are actually able to fellate themselves (suck themselves off) – there's no harm in trying. Another popular trick is to grip the penis between the thighs and masturbate by rolling it between them as they are worked backwards and forwards.

For many, the most successful of all solo masturbation techniques is simply fucking a mattress or pillow (the more sophisticated may invest in a rubber inflatable doll), or even the gap between a cushion and the chair on which it is resting. Others prefer the gaps in the folds of a folded up bath towel, possibly with a condom to prevent soiling the towel. One particular friend of mine uses a hollowed out bath sponge and surrounds his cock in a damp face flannel which he has pre-warmed in the microwave oven.

I am aware at this point that I should make a reference to the use of drugs to enhance arousal. A little judicious alcoholic imbibing helps to loosen inhibitions, but excessive indulgence is a sexual depressant, not a stimulant. For a variety of reasons, into which I do not wish to be sidetracked at this juncture, I am not happy about the general use of 'poppers' (amyl and butyl nitrates), nor can I encourage cannabis or 'crack', or any of the other illegal so-called drug stimulants. They are mentioned only for the sake of completeness alongside a strong background of prejudice against their employment on my part.

(to be continued)

Dr. Ray

Ian's Tail

I was born in the north of England just before the outbreak of W.W.2, the first of my parents' two sons. Because my mother had suffered from rheumatic fever my birth was planned to take place, not in the local maternity home, but in the city hospital. Apart from being a week earlier than was expected, I gather my arrival was quite normal. On the Thursday before our discharge from hospital the midwifery sister breezed up to my mother and said that she had a fine young son and surely she would like him circumcised? My mother said that circumcision had not been considered and that she would discuss it with my father when he visited that evening. The midwife told my mother that there could be no delay as circumcisions were done once a week, on Thursday mornings. The midwife told my mother that it was a good thing to do to little boys, it made the penis easy to keep clean, it "prevented trouble later" (damning phrase!) and that I would be thankful for it when I was older and when I was married. From discussion I sense that the midwife pressured my mother into agreement. I was circumcised later that morning. On learning of the operation on visiting that evening, I am told that my father was distressed, not because he particularly wanted me to keep my foreskin, but because I needed medical intervention so early in life.

When we arrived home, our friendly family doctor arrived to see my mother and take a look at me at the same time. He was horrified at the state of my penis, at the ragged scar, and at the incomplete division of the adhesions between my penis and glans. The doctor offered to have me return to hospital to be tidied up, but my father refused his offer. In discussion it was agreed that, should my parents decide to have my tonsils and adenoids removed, or should I need to have my appendix removed, the tidying up could be done at that time. Apart from foreskin and a few teeth I still have all the bits and pieces with which I was born.

When I was at school and about ten years old I was selected to go off on a 'field study'. The accommodation was basic but sufficient for our needs, we were required to bath in pairs, and it was here that I first discovered that I was not born with an exposed knob. Trevor asked if I had arranged to bath with anyone, and if not, could we bath together. I agreed. Trevor went on to tell me that he had had an operation and didn't like the water too hot. When we went off to the bathroom and stripped off, I asked to see the evidence of his operation and, much to my surprise, he showed me his cock. It was almost like my own. Trevor then looked at my cock and told me that I too had had the operation, that we had been born with skin covering the knob, but that it had been cut off. I couldn't believe him!

I remember returning home at the end of the trip and finding my mother in the kitchen preparing the tea. She was delighted to see me and encouraged me to talk about the trip, which I was pleased to do. Eventually I told her that the boys had been required to bath in pairs, and that I had bathed with Trevor. She said that she remembered Trevor, that our birthdays must be very close as his mother had also been in the city hospital maternity unit at the time she had given birth to me. I told my mother that Trevor had said that I had had an operation on my penis to cut away the skin. She confirmed this, and said that the operation was called circumcision, and that Trevor and I were circumcised on the same day. My mother also told me that she had been waiting for the time when I would ask questions about my penis so that she could explain to me why my penis was different from that of most boys. This was the first of several conversations I had with my parents about circumcision, my own and the subject generally. I believe that such openness between parents and their son is unusual.

I was untroubled by the appearance of my cock until I was selected for secondary education, and found myself in a school where there were three sessions of P.E. and games each week and, yes, showers were compulsory. It was here that I found that there were cocks with hoods (about 75%), some hoods being long and twirly at the tip, others shorter and open. There were cocks without hoods, and then there was my cock. By this time the ragged scar had subsided and was less visible, but the bridge of skin had not. This bridge of skin started at the circumcision scar line, about a third of the way down the shaft measuring from glans rim to belly, half encircled the shaft, and tapered to about half an inch at the glans where it was firmly attached beside the urethral opening. The bridge was adherent only at the two ends, and I had been taught by my father to keep it clean by passing a soapy finger behind it each day when I bathed.

There was, however, another problem. I suffered from those irrepressible and aching erections that plague adolescent boys. When this occurred, the bridge of skin, which had not grown as much as my cock, pulled the glans firmly to one side. This was uncomfortable. Indeed, on a real 'boner', it was painful, but never painful enough to diminish my erection.

As a young adult I went through a stage of regretting, indeed, bitterly regretting, what had happened to my cock. I wished all manner of ill to befall the midwifery sister who had persuaded my mother to have my penis circumcised, and on the doctor who made such an unsatisfactory job of it. Having said this, I would defend the right of parents to take the decision to have their sons circumcised, but, incumbent upon parents electing for circumcision must be the commitment to tell their son that he is circumcised, and why that choice was made.

I did have a tidying up procedure, but that is another story.

Ian

Malayan Events

A further experience of my Malay chauffeur, Rahbi, recounted by him in great detail, is perhaps worth a mention. The following I know to be true, as I later met, through Rahbi himself, two participants of this tale, who corroborated the evidence. To begin:

My previous essay 'Malaysian Experience', issue Z, Dec. 1990, revealed that Rahbi was circumcised in early boyhood by an English doctor who, to win his patient's trust and to forge a personal link, had stripped himself naked to perform the operation. In current parlance, the term is 'bonding'. For convenience I shall call this doctor, Dr. Smith -

Thenceforth, Rahbi became a regular patient of Dr. Smith. During visits for treatment, if they were alone in the surgery, some mutual fondling and horseplay took place, though not always reaching orgasm. Thus the doctor became a friend and a sexual confidante of sorts. When Rhabi married, Dr.

Smith treated his wife, dispensed sexual advice, and delivered his two babies. But to go back earlier:-

Dr. Smith was somewhat appalled that a large number of pre-pubescent Malay Muslim boys who came to him for circumcision, knew very little about sex. And they knew still less about the purposes and effects of circumcision, except that it was an inevitable religious ceremony. They were often nervous and shy, frightened at the prospect of being 'cut', and sometimes so embarrassed they even vehemently refused to reveal their cocks.

Due to the reluctance in Muslim families to discuss sex, most of them had never seen an adult cock, still less a circumcised one, despite the fact that their fathers, brothers, and uncles were all 'cut'.

So Dr. Smith decided to approach the Imam of the Metropolis (Imam = a religious teacher or leader, greatly respected in Islamic society) with a proposal. The Imam happened to be one of his patients and possessed great clout among the locals.

As a large proportion of candidates for circumcision came from outlying villages, where peasant parents were too unsophisticated to give their young a sex talk, Dr. Smith proposed to visit as many villages as possible and lecture to groups of boys on sex and circumcision. When their time approached, they would be prepared to lose their foreskins without fear, and look forward to a good sex life. The Imam agreed to this.

Each month, Dr. Smith would travel to two villages, usually by car, but if very remote, by army helicopter. For this project Dr. Smith needed the help of a companion and chauffeur, and he approached Rahbi with the offer. The job was periodic, entailing 4 or 5 days away each month. But it was well paid and promised adventure, so Rahbi agreed.

Weeks before they arrived, the sub-Imam of the village would be notified and board and lodging would be provided, and a schoolroom for the lecture prepared. The boys who were to attend had also been selected. Dr. Smith and Rahbi found nothing wanting, despite the primitive conditions. To maintain a friendly, personal and intimate atmosphere, numbers were kept low – each lecture not exceeding 15 boys. If there were more boys, separate lectures were given. Dr. Smith spoke Malay fluently through long residence in the country and close contact with the locals.

The first lecture, given to about 10 boys, went smoothly enough, though at the end of it the doctor had felt an inexplicable frustration. Inundated with questions, he had been unable to convey the 'look and feel' of a circumcised penis, despite some chalk diagrams and one or two illustrations from his medical books. This had somehow offset the joy he desired from having got the project off the ground.

That night, the doctor was restless, and towards dawn he shook Rahbi awake with a sudden inspiration. Would Rahbi be willing to let his naked body be used as a medical specimen and illustration? Rahbi's dark brown body (and his enormous black glans) was a fine example of a mature Malay male. Moreover, as all the boys were Malay and of similar complexion, their own cock-heads, when eventually circumcised, would probably have the same dark hue and texture as Rahbi's. This appealed to Rahbi's exhibitionism and he readily agreed.

At the next lecture, having explained 'the birds and bees', the doctor told the boys that he would now like to show them the naked body of a mature Malay male, and his circumcised cock. At this juncture, Rahbi stood up, removed his three items of clothes, and stood naked before them with his enormous black glans bobbing like a large jellyfish between his legs. He then moved slowly around the room, stopping close-up to each boy for several minutes to offer them a detailed scrutiny. Now and then he massaged his glans to demonstrate that it had become desensitised, or lifted his penis to show his small scrotal sac. That first time, he quickly became erect, and remained hard throughout the lecture.

The atmosphere was electric, and questions came thick and fast. Rahbi answered each question frankly, not shying away from marital details either. He added that as a good Muslim he shaved his cock and armpits, and exhorted the boys to do likewise if their pubic growth had already begun. Dr. Smith finally told the boys that the body was an object of pride and not of shame. With Rahbi's naked body in front of them, the boys had become more forthcoming about themselves. Some admitted already experiencing erections, pubic growth, masturbation and wet dreams. Others were still awaiting puberty. Penis size, foreskins and glans were all freely discussed. So Dr. Smith realised he had at last found the successful lecture formula.

The village sub-Imam was always invited to attend, but told beforehand what to expect. Objections were never raised for various reasons:-

- 1) He had to defer to the central Imam's authority.
- 2) It was in the interest of (sex) education.
- 3) Village life was so boring anyway, who would not welcome a free show – especially a free cock-show?
- 4) Anyone who had ever met Rahbi was always struck by his strong aura of sexuality, and a chance to see his cock was not to be missed. Also the Malays are a fairly bi-sexual people, and curiosity of one man over another man's cock was not uncommon. And indeed, not infrequently, the village sub-Imam would seek Rahbi out when he had some moments alone and make sexual offers. Dr. Smith had predicted this as a likely consequence, but left Rahbi to deal with it as he saw fit. He usually acquiesced.

This enjoyable job lasted for more than 10 years, from his late adolescence into his marriage, and beyond his fatherhood. It terminated just before he came to work for our family – in his early thirties. In a strict Islamic society where sex and nudity were anathema, Rahbi became the proud possessor of the country's most well-known cock. A whole generation of rural Malay youths had reason to be grateful, for, without his cock, they would never have been initiated so smoothly into the secrets of manhood and circumcision, and directed onto the path of a good sex life.

H.C. – London

Forward Women

Britain in the mid-seventies was the pits, with the economy in free fall and a dead-beat government in charge (seems familiar, doesn't it?). So I accepted the chance of an overseas post and found myself in the Middle East. The expatriate British community covered the spectrum from hopeless drunks to real characters, and it's about this last category that I'm writing today.

Sadie was an outrageous lady by any standards. She was terribly well-connected with a cut-glass accent, and was blessed with a luscious body of which she and her many admirers were constantly aware. She was in her mid-thirties, had two young children (known to Sadie as the brats), and a rather precious artist husband (that great poofter) who she said tended to skip when walking. She worked for an Arab trading company and so impressed her millionaire Arab boss, that he showed his appreciation of her talents by giving her the use of an expensive and sexy sports car.

Sadie particularly distinguished herself on the expatriate beach by wearing a thoroughly obscene chamois leather bikini. When wet, not only did her nipples show through in stark relief, but she always seemed unable to prevent a fold of the material getting trapped between her lower lips. As you can imagine, this intriguing sight created considerable emotion among those who had the privilege of looking at her; in particular a bunch of rampant army colonels (known as "Sadie's junta") who used to gather round her like flies on a jampot, vainly trying to hide their erections.

I got friendly with Sadie and managed at times to tear her away from her junta – although flattered by hanging tongues and standing cocks, she said military types bored her – and took her up-country in my company Range-Rover for the odd desert picnic. One day I went with her and her friend, a lady schoolteacher called Joan, who seemed her exact opposite, being quiet, thin and generally mousey, on a trip up the Wadi Ghawaref into the mountains. This was a spectacular run which left the desert behind, and entered a world of steep stony gullies, sudden rainfall, and consequently, deep pools of cool water surrounded by oleander bushes – the Arab version of paradise in one of the hottest regions in the world.

Coming upon one of these pools in a remote and isolated spot after a hot, tiring drive, we didn't hesitate, but jumped right in. The girls went in in their blouses and shorts – light clothing dries in minutes in that heat – while I stripped down to my Y-fronts. After a glorious half-hour in the pool we got out, demolished the smoked salmon and champagne, and laid down on a blanket to relax. We got talking and I regaled them with a little story about my Arabic classes. I told them how I'd turned my elegant Egyptian lady teacher into an incoherent and near-incontinent jelly by translating the phrase, "the English here are all stupid", but instead of using the word "mughaffalin", meaning stupid, I'd used the word "mughallafin", meaning uncircumcised! This tickled the girls no end and they were nearly as creased up as my teacher.

This story fired Sadie up to tell a rather questionable joke which one normally wouldn't expect to hear from a sophisticated well-brought-up lady, but which certainly helped secure her outrageous reputation: "A sergeant-major, addressing his platoon, told the men that they were due for a short-arm inspection, but since the M.O. was a total wimp who got the vapours at the use of rough language, he said he'd do the whole thing by numbers. "On the command 1, undo your flies and get your cock out. On the command 2, pull your foreskin back. On the command 3, pull it forward again. And on the command 4, put your cock away, do your flies up and dismiss". The M.O. turned up, the sergeant-major went through the routine, and after the men did themselves up and dismissed, he was about to follow them when he discovered the platoon idiot, Private Berk, standing behind a pillar with a red face and glazed eyes going "2-3, 2-3, 2-3".

This time it was my turn to fall about laughing, and so did Joan of course, but Sadie wasn't finished yet. She went on to tell us how she had gone to dinner with her Arab boss and another group of western women who took his fancy, and the highlight of the evening came when he summoned the cook to present the guests with a steaming platter of goat and rice, seemingly unaware that his dhoti had come loose, showing him to be woefully devoid of underpants, since his enormous cock was rolling and swinging about in full view. The girls threw hysterics on the spot, but not before eagle-eyed Sadie had noticed that the gentleman was uncircumcised. Being the girl she was, she didn't hesitate to ask bossikins (as she called him) how his cock happened to have a foreskin in a staunch Muslim country, and was told that he was Hindu. (What she wasn't told was that such a sight was considered by the local Muslims to be a deadly insult to a woman, but since they looked upon all western women as honorary whores anyway, it didn't count.)

She then went on to talk about her husband who, besides ignoring her in favour of small boys, was circumcised, as was her male 'brat'. She said that all men-folks of her acquaintance had been circumcised, and that the Hindu cook's foreskin came as a divine revelation. There was a pause before she asked the question I'd been dreading – "What about you, Paul. Are you circumcised?" I tried to fend her off by telling her she'd have to get to know me a bit better before I'd discuss such a personal thing, but if she played her cards right she might stand a chance. But she turned the charm on and got Joan, who hadn't said a word up to then, to join in. Eventually I admitted that my parts were the same as they were when I was born. That was a big mistake, because then the wheedling started again. "Come on Paul, be a sport and let us have a look. I only got a little glimpse of the cook's cock and I'm dying to see what a normal cock really looks like."

You might think it odd of me to even hesitate in what seems to be the sort of sexual scene that most men would give their eye teeth to respond to, but I have to admit that any urge I had was overshadowed by anxiety and inhibition. I am not overgifted with sexual confidence and I just couldn't cope with being browbeaten on an embarrassingly personal subject by two women (nowadays you could probably take them to court and get a few million for sexual harrassment). I continued to refuse, whereupon Sadie accused me of being a hopeless wet and had a quick whispered conversation with Joan. She then knelt at my head, whipped her blouse and bra off, and, holding my arms firmly, let her large shapely tits flop over my face completely, blocking my vision and nearly cutting off my air supply. Meanwhile Joan grabbed my waistband and pulled my Y-fronts off, leaving me wondering what had hit me. I looked down to see my willy shrinking even further under its skin cover before their inquisitive gaze.

"For heaven's sake stop looking so horrified," said Sadie. "We're only having a look at it. I think it looks quite sweet, don't you, Joan?" Joan just giggled, but Sadie went on, "It's much more streamlined than my husband's and looks like those statues in the Louvre." Joan replied, "I reckon it looks like a great fat worm crawling down his leg", and both girls collapsed with laughter whilst I just lay there red-faced and embarrassed. Sadie took her sunglasses off and used the arm to poke at my prick, flipping it up to lay along my stomach. She then got down close to examine it, fascinated by the seam which extended from the root right down to the floppy tip of my foreskin. "Mummy says foreskins are dirty", she said. "Is yours dirty, Paul?" Joan answered for me. "Soon find out", she said, and taking my cock in her hand, pulled my foreskin right back. Since I'm very particular about personal standards I had no fears on that one, but, snapping out of my inhibition, I started responding in the time honoured way to female handling and started to get a massive horn on.

I'd like to be able to say that this was followed by a fantastic sex scene with both girls taking it in turns to sample my unaccustomed wares so as to be able to deliver a verdict, but sadly my erection signalled the end to what had, for the girls, been purely a bit of fun. After commenting that she could find nothing dirty about my uncovered glans and drawn foreskin, Sadie realised from my burgeoning erection that things were getting more serious than she had intended, and both girls dropped the subject, seemingly losing interest in my rampant organ, whilst I hurriedly covered up and got dressed. I would dearly like to have been able to report that Sadie had carried out the 2-3, 2-3, routine on me, but sadly this was not the case – not this time anyway.

On the drive back, Joan admitted that her boyfriend back in UK had been uncircumcised, and so nothing I had came as a surprise. Sadie, despite her strong sexuality, was surprisingly ignorant about such matters, and was very curious about the whole circumcision scene, wondering why some people considered it necessary, since, as far as she could see, there was no cleanliness problem and very little difference in fact when erect. I said I could see no reason for it either, but thought that the compulsion to cut bits off the sexual organs was very widespread: the locals not only circumcised their boys, but their girls got 'done' too, so as to destroy all sexual feeling and keep them 'pure'. Both women were horrified, declared the whole business unspeakable, and changed the subject.

I could write a book about my life as an expatriate, and the episode with Sadie and Joan was merely one in a whole number of experiences which just don't seem to happen back home. The subject matter covers too wide a spectrum though to be of interest to Acorn.

P.G.W. – Chesham

P.S. You ask to be told if stories are fantasy. This one is absolutely true, although the names have been changed.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 5

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Knobs in Art	R.H.	Page 2
Discovery Time	Anon	Page 3
Interview	D.A.	Page 5
Another Bit of Ian's Tail	Ian	Page 7
Masturbation – Continued	Dr. Ray	Page 9
Some Requests	B.H.	Page 12
For R.B.W. – ‘Recollections’	Anthony	Page 14
Ageing	Anon	Page 15
Funnies	Anthony	Page 16
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

A while back Brian of the West Country and I inserted an advertisement in Forum for anyone interested in circumcision or foreskins. There was a response and we now have about a dozen new members. We wish them welcome and hope that they find a lot to interest them in the group. If there are any questions they want to ask, please feel free, and any contributions to the newsletter would be welcome. Don't worry if you think that what you want to say might have been said before, there are always new angles to everything.

D.A.

Knobs In Art

In issue 1/93, G. of Birmingham raised the most interesting subject of 'Circumcision in Art'. I have always been puzzled as to why there are so few cut cocks in western art. There are only a very few representations of the circumcised infant Christ in early Italian painting, which is extraordinary since His is such a well-documented circumcision. I suspect it has something to do with the Catholic Church wanting to claim Christ as their own and not admit that he was first and foremost a Jew. In all the thousands of western European paintings of biblical subjects with nude males, one never sees, despite all Jews being so, circumcised cocks. In sculpture it is most strange, as it must be a great deal easier to carve a roundhead than a wrinkly bit of dangly skin. Maybe that is the reason – ie, it shows more skill, and obviously, one slip of the chisel and the guy would end up cut anyway!

Until the twentieth century, and except for primitive peoples and the circumcising religions, artists must have seen very few circumcised models or individuals. Perhaps readers could start sending in details of cut cocks in art that they have spotted?

I have noted in particular the following:-

A nude man holding a rope (probably a sailor, and of the East India Company who insisted their employees were circumcised if they could not draw back their foreskins) by Christen Kooke, the nineteenth century Danish artist, in a Copenhagen museum.

A bronze sculpture by Vincenzo Gemito 1852-1929 of a fisherboy, in the Bargello Museum in Florence. Although his net is discreetly covering the shaft, peeking out below is a most obviously circumcised cock.

The statue of 'Hercules and Diomedes Fighting', in the Palazzo Vecchio, Florence, where Diomedes has hold of Hercules' cock, the head of which is popping out, probably because the cock is being squeezed, rather than Hercules actually being cut, which I have seen in a bronze of Hercules by Gian Bologna in a London auction sale.

There are, of course, many representations of males circumcised in 20th. century art – eg, Munch, Hockney, Freud etc.

R.H. – London

Discovery Time

I saw my first circumcised penis around the age of four. Together with a couple of friends I was playing in the back garden where we had been joined by two brothers from across the road. At the same time we all decided that we wanted a pee, and gathered around the grate outside our kitchen window. As we all hoisted up a leg of our shorts in the approved manner, I noticed straightaway that the newcomers had bullet-heads on their cocks and peed with a fine accurate jet, unlike the spray that issued from our wrinkled rosettes. I was immediately impressed and asked why they were so different. They told me in a disinterested way that the doctor had “put them new ones on”. No more information was forthcoming; thus began my consuming interest in the topic. How could I get one of those superior pricks? Ask Santa Claus perhaps?

Through school I observed that numbers were almost equally divided into two sorts of cocks. Nobody seemed to know why, but I gleaned that some sort of surgery was done at an early age and that was that for life! (as indeed it is). I certainly didn't realise that it could be done to older boys and adults, and thought that if you'd 'missed the bus' you were stuck with what you had. Strange thought when the reverse is the case!

Around the age of eight I was admitted to the Children's Ward of the local hospital suffering from pneumonia. After the crisis passed, the prescribed treatment was complete bed-rest for some weeks. Around twice a week the nurses came round and gave us bed baths – a sort of sponge down whilst placed naked on a blanket. On the first occasion, the nurse asked me to pull my foreskin back for washing, and as I had never done this before I tried somewhat gingerly but could only expose the eye. In a moment of impatience she grasped my willy and gave a short, sharp jerk downwards as per technique used for removing elastoplast. To my astonishment, a bright purple plum popped into view – something I never knew I possessed! It was speckled with spots of white smegma which she quickly washed away before flipping back the cover. As soon as I had some privacy I tried this for myself under the bedclothes. Two things were observed: the glans was so sensitive that I couldn't bear the sheets touching it, and the foreskin wouldn't stay back, as I would have liked to try it, for more than a minute or two.

At all subsequent bedbaths I was required to retract and wash my foreskin myself. Everything seemed to be in perfect working order, which made what happened a week or two later something of a surprise. I was suddenly wheeled into a next-door treatment room, lifted onto a table and had my pyjamas removed. A senior nurse examined my penis, retracted my foreskin a time or two, then leaned forward and said, "We're going to make it easier for you to keep this little soldier clean." I now surmise she was probably a midwife. She floated between maternity and a small glass-walled side room on our ward where I saw her tend newborn babies. They were seemingly brought there for a day's observation (or circumcision?). Could it be that she was the chief sniper (or snippess)?

Whatever, she did the job on me. I have to say the nursing staff were very good; friendly but firm. They had helped me to bear penicillin injections and lung drainage. I was laid back, a nurse held my hand for comfort, and another swabbed my loins with something icy cold. I was told that there would be a sharp pain and then it would all be over. And so it was – something akin to a bee sting; painful but bearable, as, unseen by me, she presumably drew over my surplus skin and cut it off with scissors. I say scissors, because, probably due to the crushing effect, there was very little bleeding and I have a very neat, almost scarless result, with none of the puckered and stitched effect of which some complain. This now poses the point; isn't it better to let females shape our ends? Many of us are cut because our mothers, or in some cases our partners, wanted it. Although not possessors of penises, they have a vested interest in its appearance and performance. Women are generally better at needle and scissor skills, and my operator certainly took a pride in her work.

Another matter of interest is the questionable use of anaesthetic. Other than preventing a possible disaster if the patient moved at a critical moment (surmountable with a physical restraint?), there are risks with general, and as we have read from 'Saga', complications from a local. The pain is over in a split second, and aftermath pain has to be borne anyway, once anaesthetics have worn off.

From what I remember, recovery was swift. I didn't see my penis until the bandage padding was soaked off after a day or two. When it was revealed, with a swollen collar of red skin around the glans, I didn't at first realise fully what had happened to me, and thought, naively, that my foreskin was just temporarily retracted. However, as the swelling rapidly subsided and I found it impossible to push the skin forward over the rim, it dawned with slight shock, that my new state was permanent – a fact confirmed when I questioned the nurse, who said, "It's better for you like that." "Why?" "Because it gets washed every time you have a bath." Another remarked, "You're a gentleman now." "Why?" "You'll learn when you get older."

All this began a process of deep intrigue which is still within me today. I sensed that something significant had happened to me but, not being sexually aware, wasn't sure what. Like a girl starting her periods, a 'rite of passage' unexplained. My parents made no comment when I returned home, though mother doubtless observed me at bathtime. Somehow I was aware that it was not a subject for question or discussion with them. To this day I don't know whether my parents requested my circumcision, or the nursing staff used their initiative and followed the fashion of the day. Looking back I think the latter, because they gave off vibes of satisfaction over the result.

One immediate change I noted was that I became more cock conscious. The constant rubbing of the sensitive exposed tip caused more frequent erections. Every time you pulled it out for a pee or stripped off, it was there to remind you that you had been cut (a feeling that still persists today, and is heightened even more during sexual activity). Whilst now I had the knob I'd always wanted, my pleasure was slightly tempered by the perverse thought that I'd had no choice in the matter. Someone else (a female!) had, in a few minutes, determined how my penis would look and the sexual sensations I and my partner would experience; – as a parental advice book on the subject is titled, 'Circumcision is for Life'.

Luckily, apart from a wistful curiosity as to how foreplay and sex would feel with a foreskin, I don't mind being circumcised and on balance much prefer it, but I can well understand the sense of loss in those who think otherwise.

My main legacy from the procedure has been a strange feeling of apprehension as to how women react to circumcision. But that will be the subject of another letter, another time.

Anon

Interview

If you remember I interviewed a lady friend a while back on her views on cocks. Now I have a very different interview. It's a young man of 25 who, I think, is a little out of the ordinary. Although white himself, his penis is jet-black. His dimensions are:

Flaccid:

Length 6.5"

Corona Circumference 4"

Base circumference 5.5"

Hard:

Length 8.5"

Corona Circumference 6"

Base circumference 6.5"

These measurements don't take into account his foreskin, which overhangs the glans by about an inch when flaccid and 0.25" when hard. It is also tight, and won't retract when hard.

- Q. As a little boy, do you ever remember your mother retracting your foreskin at bathtime?
- A. No
- Q. Can you remember any foreskin adherence round the knob rim?
- A. No.
- Q. Was your foreskin longer before puberty than it is now?
- A. I can't remember.
- Q. When young, did you ever consider that you were different from other boys?
- A. No.
- Q. Do you consider yourself lucky to be well-endowed.
- A. Women show a great interest at first.
- Q. If you retract your foreskin when soft, and then get hard, does it feel as if your knob is strangled?
- A. No, it can't stay back when hard, it comes forward as it gets hard.
- Q. Then does it hurt at all if you have a dry or tight vagina, which tends to force your foreskin back?
- A. No, it goes back a little.
- Q. How often do you masturbate?
- A. Three or four times a week.
- Q. What is the most sensitive part, that brings you to orgasm when masturbating?
- A. The glans rim through the foreskin.
- Q. Does your frenum play any sensitive part during sex or masturbation?
- A. No.
- Q. Is your foreskin itself sensitive?
- A. Sometimes.
- Q. Are you curious to know how other men feel about themselves?
- A. No, not really.
- Q. What did you think when you saw your very first circumcised penis?
- A. I wouldn't like to have been like it.
- Q. Are you happy with everything about your penis?
- A. Yes, completely happy.

Sadly, as might be seen from the answers, he has no get up and go, no self-confidence sexually or otherwise, no curiosity. He wants sex badly, but cannot initiate it himself. How many thousands of us would like to own a tool like that, get it into our own idea of good working order, and sally forth confidently into the world?

D.A.

Another Bit Of Ian's Tail

The time came when I had to make decisions about a career. I should like to have read Medicine, but a predisposing interest in Arts had landed me with the wrong O-levels, and staying on at school was not an available opportunity. Eventually I made the decision to train as a nurse.

I can recall only two circumcisions in the three years I spent as a student nurse. One was my thirty-five year old maths master with whom there was some mutual embarrassment when I shaved him prior to surgery. He dispelled this by taxing me with mental arithmetic questions:- "Filled to the brim the bath in your house holds 63.275 gallons of water. When you withdraw the plug it discharges 5.725 gallons a minute, and there is a leak which lets out 0.275 gallons a minute. Giving your answer in minutes and seconds, how long is it before the bath is empty?" And all this whilst I was removing the hair from his most treasured possession! The second adult circumcision was on an 18 year old boy who had spilled petrol on the front of his overalls which ignited when he lit a cigarette. He was severely burned, but the damage to his genitals was limited to his foreskin which had healed with some deformity, formed scar tissue and could not be retracted. I remember he told me that he didn't mind having to be circumcised, as lots of men were. I agreed, but to my shame I did not tell him of my own circumcised state.

At the end of my training I was sent to work in the outpatient department where I found that up to six boys were listed for circumcision on the first and third Monday mornings in the month. These were boys from one to five years of age, boys of five and above being admitted to the children's ward for circumcision, and stayed at least one night in hospital.

For outpatient circumcision, the boys were brought to the hospital by a parent for 8 o'clock in the morning, parents being required to give an assurance that the child had not taken food nor drink after midnight, as every child received a general anaesthetic. At this stage, my role was to weigh the child, calculate and administer the pre-anaesthetic medication, to ensure that a cot was available for the recovery of each child, and to reassure the parents when they signed the consent form. When this was done I laid up the instrument trolleys and called the Surgical Registrar to tell him we were ready to proceed. I scrubbed up with the surgeon to assist him.

The detail of the surgical technique used depended on the Senior Registrar or Registrar available. Clamps were not used – I doubt that Plastibells had arrived in England at that time. Usually the technique involved two pairs of artery forceps applied to the tip of the upper surface of the foreskin, a dorsal slit with scissors down to the rim of the glans, the turning back of the foreskin flaps, followed by the dissection of any adhesions. When this was done the outer foreskin was cut away following the outline of the glans rim, the inner foreskin was removed 2 or 3 mm from the glans rim, the frenum not usually being removed. Bleeding, if any, was usually slight (boys with ginger hair being the exception). The outer foreskin was sutured to the remnants of the inner foreskin at regular intervals, 4 to 8 sutures being the minimum and maximum. The material used for sutures was absorbent, therefore removal was not required. When the operation was completed, the penis was bandaged with ribbon gauze soaked in Tinc. Benz. Co. (commonly known as Friar's Balsam). Parents were instructed to leave the dressing in place for 5 days, then put the child in the bath to soak it off. There were small variations in technique, some surgeons not following the line of the glans when cutting away the outer foreskin. One left behind more than 2 to 3 mm of inner foreskin, another left most of the inner foreskin behind, giving a finished appearance of the glans nestling in a cup.

I had become quite familiar with this procedure when both the Senior Registrar and the Registrar left the hospital, one replacement being a bright, breezy and brash young Australian. At our first meeting he said, "Jesus Christ! Why are we circ'ing these kids now. It should be done at birth. That's when we do it at home." On looking at the sterilised instruments, he said, "Hell's bells, what are all that bloody lot for? Get me a pair of straight rib shears from the theatre." This technique was different – and swift. When requested I took the tip of the foreskin between finger and thumb and pulled it firmly forward. The surgeon felt for the glans, making sure that it was behind the tips of his thumb and finger. The blades of the shears were applied straight across (east to west) and the handles grasped firmly together. We counted three minutes by the clock, then a scalpel was used to cut off the foreskin beside the blades of the rib shears. When the shears were removed, the skin of the penis retreated down the shaft, the glans was fully exposed, and the frenum untouched. The remains of the inner and outer foreskin were bonded together by the earlier pressure of the rib shears at the level of the incision, which was usually some distance behind the glans. No sutures were used, but the usual dressing applied.

It was whilst our Australian colleague was in post that a most unusual event took place. Twin boys were brought for circumcision by their father. The man, older than most fathers of three-year-olds, was easily identified by his dress as a 'Deputy' in a coalmine. He carried a straight walking cane, wore a grubby trench coat, and a felt hat which he declined to remove. When I went to weigh the boys he asked if I was the doctor. When I said that I was a nurse he asked to see the doctor that would be "cutting my boys". I told my Australian colleague and, as there were mothers around clearly intrigued by the presence of a father asking to speak to the doctor, sent them off into a vacant consulting room for a private chat. When my colleague returned he was smiling and said that the boys had a brother – 12 years older, that he had been circumcised and, “Had a spot of bother because not enough had been removed – just wanted to make sure they’d be properly cut.”

Writing this for Acorn, so many years after the event, has raised two particular questions in my mind. I can understand why the greater part of childcare is in the hands of women, but why is the circumcision decision, this important aspect of masculinity, so often left to the mother. I believe, from listening to the mothers who brought their boys in for circumcision, that some fathers would be unaware of what was to happen to their son on that day. Perhaps the scene has changed and, with the advent of compassionate leave schemes in most work places, fathers are now more involved in childcare, and indeed, may take their son to be circumcised. I sincerely hope that fathers of today’s youngsters inform and educate their sons about circumcision. The second question is, why does the patient (client or customer) so seldom seek information from the surgeon about the outcome of his surgery. Starting from the premise that all uncircumcised cocks do not look alike, all circumcised cocks cannot look alike. But surely, men having circumcision have an idea about the outcome they would prefer, for themselves or their boys, if only in the terms of complete or partial exposure of the glans. Yet in my experience, neither parents nor mature men express an opinion or seek information about the cosmetic outcome of this surgical procedure.

Ian

Masturbation — Getting It Right

iv) The Plateau Stage

Gradually the build-up of sexual arousal reaches the ‘plateau stage’ – a sort of top level of excitement just short of orgasm and ejaculation. If this plateau can be protracted, then the overall period of the masturbatory cycle from start to finish can be substantially prolonged. It is difficult to offer much advice about this stage, since it mainly involves learning to control arousal by a series of stops and starts in the stimulatory activities as the imminence of orgasm either approaches or recedes.

The well-known sexologists, Masters and Johnson, have described the ‘squeeze technique’ to defuse sensation when orgasm might otherwise be inevitable. This involves very tightly squeezing the glans penis between finger and thumb at the level of the frenulum underneath, and the corona (rim of the glans) on the top until the acute sense of ejaculation dies away. This is a useful delaying technique to those who learn the knack, but from personal experience it is very hit or miss.

Mental concentration is also very helpful at this stage. The psychological determination either to 'cum' or not to 'cum' at a given point in time substantially influences the occurrence of orgasm. The conscious mental act of relaxing the whole body, and thinking of other things, such as solving a complex sum by mental arithmetic, can manifestly delay orgasm.

During the plateau phase, all the techniques already described to encourage arousal should, of course, continue to be employed to maintain a controlled level of excitement. Often the simple expedient of suddenly changing from one particular form of physical stimulation of the genitals to another, may be nothing more than altering the handgrip, will be sufficient to postpone an imminent orgasm.

The plateau stage is often characterised by the emission of a few drops of 'pre-cum' fluid or 'love-juice'. This crystal clear sticky liquid is produced as a natural lubricant by glands in the urethra – the tube along the penis. It is not to be confused with semen as such, although, sometimes, early spurts of genuine spunk may occur in advance of any true sense of orgasm. The 'pre-cum' fluid can be smeared into the penis in order to perform its lubricating function as physical stimulation of the organ builds up in the moments leading to orgasm. This fluid is completely tasteless and, for those who may subsequently wish to imbibe their own semen at the time of ejaculation, licking droplets of it from a finger on which they have been collected is a useful mood stimulator and inhibition breaker.

V) The Stage of Orgasm.

The term orgasm is usually synonymous with ejaculation, but this is not always so. Obviously the pre-pubertal masturbator has no semen to ejaculate, and, similarly, older men may often fail to ejaculate at the time of orgasm. It is a very unusual phenomenon in healthy young men, but it does sometimes occur, and medical advice should be sought in such circumstances with a view to trying to resolve the problem. Prostatectomy (removal of the prostate gland) is usually associated with subsequent inability to ejaculate, though orgasm is not impaired, because it is the prostate gland at the neck of the bladder which is responsible for producing some 95% of the total seminal liquid volume.

Orgasm involves an intensely violent series of contractions of the reproductive system muscles, which result in the squirting out of a series of spurts of semen. Pleasure will be enhanced if these muscular contractions can be exaggerated. This can be achieved voluntarily simply by 'putting a bit of extra effort into it' and also artificially, by forcing the muscles to contract against restrictions – eg. by squeezing the penis shaft, or by leaving a tight cock-strap or ring in place. The primitive 'Coitus Saxonicus' method of birth control can be employed. This consists of finding the 'bulb' of the urethra in the deep-base under-surface of the penis by pushing the testicles to either side and pressing almost into the perineum. Very powerful finger pressure here will compress the urethra and prevent the emission of semen during orgasm. Muscular contractions will be intensified which should heighten the feeling of orgasm. Truly successful 'Saxonicus' actually results in the semen being forced backwards through the muscle sphincter which closes the bladder. Inside the bladder the semen is mixed and diluted with the urine, and will then be passed to the exterior completely without the knowledge of the individual when next he has a pee. However, finding the right spot by trial and error at which to apply the pressure, may mean that early attempts will simply delay emission only until the pressure is released. It will then dribble out without sensation.

Orgasm, like arousal, once again calls to the fore the concept of whole body experience. The more generally convulsive it can be contrived to be, and the more muscle groups which can be brought into action, the more fully satisfying is the overall effect. Just as 'arousal' in some postures is more interesting than others, so some will find it more exciting to 'cum' while lying face down or face up or stooping or squatting or pressing into a pillow or ejaculating into a condom etc., etc. Of course, during orgasm, the whole range of sex aids to which reference has already been made in earlier stages can still be employed – from vibrators to videos, and from poking the prostate to watching pornography. Many like to vocalise their feelings, shouting out erotic phrases often associated with their fantasies, like "Fuck me hard, now, now, now." They may violently overbreathe or moan and groan. Quite a few people close their eyes at orgasm.

The duration of orgasm, usually barely half a minute, can be prolonged by the intensely exciting – almost painful – process of continuing to stimulate the penis quite violently throughout the period of the climax. Quite a number of people find this virtually impossible to do by themselves simply because the sensation is too intense.

Having emphasised the total body convulsive/explosive technique for orgasm, an occasional alternative idea is to try lying completely still, discouraging any form of heightened muscular tension whatsoever, and concentrating on keeping breathing at a low and regular level. In short, doing nothing beyond allowing the semen to emerge in as innocuous a way as possible. Strangely, this can sometimes be remarkably satisfying.

A fascinating trick, well worth cultivating, but not easy to perform, and frequently needing a long period of repeated trial and error, is to learn the knack of having a full orgasm while at the same time consciously preventing ejaculation from occurring by refusing to allow the muscles of ejaculation to contract. In any orgasm it is usually possible to voluntarily delay inevitable ejaculation for a few seconds by concentrated mental effort. With repeated practice it may eventually become possible to train oneself to experience the full sensation of orgasm while completely holding back on the emission of semen.

This is not the same as stopping just short of orgasm in the plateau stage and letting the sensation die away. This is mind over matter, involving a complete withholding of ejaculation at the time of orgasm. The main advantages of this technique are no mess, and repeated orgasms can be achieved with the same erection. There is no resting period and re-arousal is possible as soon as the sensation of orgasm has finished. Multiple orgasms achieved in this way are a bonus, but the technique is hard to learn.

Somewhat related to the above is incomplete orgasm. When this occurs, usually as the result of holding back at the crucial moment, after a fairly long plateau phase, and not being totally successful, a sort of semi-orgasm occurs. It is virtually impossible to control this. There is quite a strong orgasmic sensation and a partial ejaculation, but the erection does not subside, and, after a few minutes, re-stimulation will result in a second climax and completion of the ejaculation.

True repeated orgasms following upon the same arousal and plateau phases, and off the same erection, unless voluntary withholding of ejaculation has occurred, probably never occur. Orgasm is normally followed by detumescence and a refractory period, both of which are described in the next section. These phases may be very brief, but they serve to distinctly separate one incident of sexual arousal and climax from another, so that, in fact, two separate cycles have occurred.

A final word on orgasm concerns wipe-up arrangements. Preparation for the wipe-up operation should always be made beforehand. The ready availability of a damp flannel and a few paper tissues can eliminate many a pleasure-disrupting panic dash to the bathroom at a crucial moment.

(to be continued)

Dr. Ray

Some Requests

I was going through some old newsletters and came across the list of particulars. After reading it I became aware that there was an interesting point that needed to be explored. Twelve of the circumcised respondents have a scarline that is from 1" up to one with a scarline of 2" behind the glans. It would be most interesting to find out, as they were done as adults, what method was used. Did they have any say in the matter of the location of the scarline? Were any done with the adult version of the Hollister Plastibell? Is their skin now taut and, I think it unlikely, did they have the frenulum removed?

[Would those referred to mind giving the information? D.A.]

Do we have any correspondents who are from ethnic groups; ie. West Indian, Indian, Chinese, Malayan, African?

[H.C. – London (Chinese) is the only one I know, from whom we have had some very informative articles. Any others? D.A.]

Another point made at the end of the statistics was the split between hetero, bi, and gay members. I think it would be nice if an indication was made against the reference who is what. This would allow a little more freedom in writing to other members without assuming they are one or the other. The anonymity would still be preserved as they are only known by initials and town.

[I pondered over this a lot at the time, but a few members asked that this be left confidential – in two cases they had been introduced to Acorn by friends who didn't know they were gay, and felt that it might harm the friendship. So I thought that if a few were left out that alone would let the cat out of the bag. Thus I left it all out, giving a sure indication that confidentiality would not be betrayed even implicitly. Anonymity is everything to a lot of members, as witnessed by the lack of names at the bottom of the letters in this issue. D.A.]

It should also be pointed out to members that if you ask for correspondence for any reason, you should in all fairness reply to the correspondent who has taken time and trouble to write to you, even if only to say thank you. I personally find it irritating when I am in this situation.

[I probably should have apologised for this before, which I do now. The fact is that my time is limited (I already correspond regularly with a few members), and it would cost me about a hundred pounds a year, which I haven't to spare. What I can say is that over 90% of what is sent for publishing eventually finds its way into the newsletter, unless it reiterates too much on what has already been said (in the interests of freshness). It just might take a little time as I have to try to make a balance of the material. If anyone feels that I should note in the newsletter the correspondence not yet used, please let me know and I will do it. D.A.]

Lastly, another name of a group doing circumcisions. It was in the Evening Standard:

'Harley Street Consultants' Tel. 0296 641543

B.H. – Leeds

For R.B.W.
'Recollections'

1. While standing in the shower
I peered down at my feet, and glimpsed the shrivelled power
so sadly incomplete.
2. I spent ten years not knowing of what the knife had done, while others went on showing sleek organs in the sun.
3. My loss I never figured,
I finally got wised –
'twas when a schoolmate sniggered,
"Ah, you've been circumcised!"
4. Beside the neatly covered, mine seemed a ragged tool.
That time I first discovered that I'd been 'cut' _ at school.
5. Now what had I been missing?
Sensations never known...
The warmth of urine passing?
Retraction's cooler zone?
6. I rose and pee'd, grimacing,
I shook it to and fro,
as with the hood's replacing,
the last uncertain flow.
7. Then came a sudden issue.
Forgetting I was shorn,
I thought I bore all tissue,
with which I had been born.
8. False hopes had not intruded reality so far.
My roundhead stood denuded,
set high upon a scar.
9. My mother thought it 'nicer',
'Far easier to clean'.
"You'd seen the circumciser, a surgeon dressed in green!"

10. Her manner then was snappy.
But there's no need to care,
in heaven she'd be happy.
There are no foreskins there.
11. My wishful hope restraining, uncovered, in disdain
the scar ringed shaft remaining a naked severed shame.

Not only did I take your comments seriously, Mr. R.B.W. of Bedford, I thought I'd reply in simple verse. That way feelings can be more effectively expressed.

Anthony – North Devon

Ageing

I've found that ageing takes its toll in many ways, not the least being bits and pieces of my favourite hobby, wanking. It works on both the physical side and the mental side, but that's not to say that it's all bad.

On the physical side the most noticeable things are that the squirts of come that used to be are now just oozes – and not much at that, and balls tend to hang much lower and swing around during the beginning of the action until the head of steam arrives, getting hurt as they bang against legs and things.

On the mental side the problem is the effort to get and hold fantasy pictures in the mind, so necessary for reaching the vinegar stroke. I don't mean that I've done everything there is to do so there's nothing left to fantasise about, more that the mind wanders a bit in the middle of it and starts thinking about mundane things, like feeding the cat. This results in a wank lasting anything up to two hours. There really isn't any grumble about that, because every minute is pleasurable in itself. What happens is that the shaft skin, but mostly the foreskin, which in my case is loose and long, thickens very quickly within an hour of finishing, and ends up with my cock more than twice its usual thickness. My knob, which is generally quite prominent, is lost inside this great big sausage. Again, no grumble, because with a slightly numb sensation as well, it keeps making its presence felt, which is no bad thing, and it goes down within a day. It certainly doesn't hurt at all, and no lasting ill effects are evident, as it first happened to me over 50 years ago when I used to experiment with how many times I could wank on the trot before I got fed up and didn't feel like it any more, or at other times to see how many times it took to run out of come. For the curious, it would generally be four to run out of come, and eight to get fed up. All in less time than it takes me to come once now. That's ageing.

I'd like to know if anyone else has experienced having a big sausage-cock through doing that.

I've also got another question. At the start of a wank there is the loveliest sensation in the world as the foreskin is pulled back off the glans for about the first twenty times. This is caused by the slight stickiness between the inner foreskin and the knob. It's exquisite! Then it dries and the sensation stops. It would be nice if the foreskin caused some sort of abrasive action on the knob, but it doesn't. I've tried various sticky substances (jam, honey, syrup, etc.) but they all seem to turn to liquid – the warmth I suppose. Forgetting the Loctite glues etc. has anyone got any ideas?

Anon

[I admire a man who sticks with his hobby, through thick and thin. Sorry - I just couldn't resist that. D.A.]

Funnies

Did you ever come across the girl who liked tight foreskins?
— She was never at a loose end!

Rampant randy roundhead to his girl:

“I guess I carry my brains in my cock!”

Girl: “Perhaps that's why people say you're not all there!”

When did smegma first appear?

The garden of Edam!!

A straight youth to a gay friend:

“I thought coming out was when you developed a redundant prepuce.”

“No, it's when you grow to love Sonny and Share!”

Anthony – N. Devon

Contact Corner

Depilated and circumcised male would like to correspond with Depilated lady interested in circumcision and depilation. All letters answered with the utmost discretion. 100% secrecy assured. Photos are also available to interested persons. Must be genuine. Contact through Acorn in first instance.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 6

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Radio Phone-in	Brian	Page 4
Different Ends	Anon	Page 8
Masturbation – Finale	Dr. Ray	Page 10
More Female Preferences	Anon	Page 13
Foreskin Retraction Analysis	N.G.	Page 14
Contact Corner		Page 15

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

It's not often that our favourite subject gets a large airing in the media, so I make no apologies for the amount of space that I'm giving to the latest facet that's been under debate

On August 3rd. The Independent gave a large spread in the Health Section to an article on uncircumcising. My thanks go to the several members who sent me a copy of the article. The interest arose from a book just published in America by a doctor (psychology) on methods of regrowing a foreskin. He had been circumcised as a baby and resented it and was determined to put himself right in his eyes. I won't print the entire article but will paraphrase it as best I can. The article was entitled 'They took my foreskin, and I want it back'.

Like many other middle-aged American men, Jim Bigelow was circumcised at birth but was never happy about it. "I often prayed that God would give my foreskin back to me," he recalls. "As I got older I tried to convince myself it was for the best. But the feelings of loss and violation never went away."

Now 60, four years ago he began hopefully to redevelop a foreskin. He started to stretch the skin of the penile shaft over the glans, keeping it in place with surgical adhesive tape, cut in such a way that he could still pee. When it fell off he replaced it with some more. After four years he has a foreskin that, when flaccid, permanently covers more than three-quarters of the glans. He hopes to cover completely in another 18 months. He says the foreskin has made the head of his penis more sensitive, and the glans has changed in texture from toughened skin to become more like mucous tissue. It has also given him a psychological sense of wholeness which was missing.

His book has sold over 5,000 copies so far and has engendered much interest such as this article and radio items. His programme may sound unlikely, but it is based on tissue expansion, by which existing skin is progressively stretched, a technique common in plastic and reconstructive surgery. He has had to be very persistent as he had a very tight circumcision, but some of his 'patients' have been able to fool their doctors into believing them uncircumcised, within a space of two years.

Some doctors now accept that without the foreskin the glans becomes less sensitive and tough skinned, a process taking place called keratinisation. The greater the exposure to abrasion, pressure and use, the thicker the layer of keratin, a fibrous protein that is the main constituent of the outer layer of skin. This toughening process continues throughout life. In the uncircumcised, the glans and the inner covering of foreskin resemble the mucous tissue of the inside of the lip, which offers "exceedingly intense" sensations by the mutual stimulation as the foreskin slides back and forth over the glans during foreplay and intercourse. A Canadian doctor states that the foreskin's inner surface contains a "tightly pleated zone that is more endowed with specialised nerve endings than the glans itself".

One disadvantage, they state, of the restored foreskin is its “unruliness”; it doesn’t always stay in place over the glans, since it doesn’t narrow at the tip like a natural foreskin. If this is really troublesome, minor surgery may be used to reduce the opening of the new foreskin.

The Method of Foreskin Re-creation

Stage 1. The skin of the penile shaft is pulled forward over the glans and kept in place with a two-to-three-inch strip of adhesive tape, which runs from both sides of the penis and over the glans. The tape is worn virtually 24 hours a day. Another square of tape is stuck, sticky side to sticky side, in the centre of the first piece so that the tape does not stick to the glans.

A small weighted device (two-ounce lead fishing weight) can be attached to the middle of the tape to provide further pull.

Stage 2. Once enough new skin has developed for it to be stretched over and beyond the glans, a strip of tape  $\frac{7}{8}$ ” long is wrapped around the tip of the skin to form a ring. Again, a small weight can be attached to the tape to add further tension.

Stage 3. Expansion devices are used to allow for further skin expansion. A foam-rubber cone (which comes in various sizes) is fitted over the glans to give extra length, and the foreskin is taped over it.

A few days after the article I sent the following letter to the writer, a lady called Cherrill Hicks.

Dear Cherrill,

I read with great interest your article on uncircumcision.

Although it deals mainly with the feelings of some Americans on the subject of circumcision, it is also a very emotive problem for many men in this country. It is not generally broadcast as it is a very private matter and there is the very real risk of being derided for having deep feelings about what is considered a petty subject (“You’ve got it, now learn to live with it”). G.P’s, psychologists, urologists, therapists, wives, partners etc. all think it’s too trivial to bother with. Even the Samaritans would, I think, tend to bracket this subject as a sex pest call and discourage it. In fact there are very few places for men to turn to with sensitive sexual emotional problems.

A group called Acorn (for obvious reasons) was set up about 5 years ago so that, through a regular newsletter, those who have deep and traumatic feelings on the subjects of foreskins and circumcisions could, with total confidentiality, confide their feelings with like-minded people and find that they aren’t alone. Members all say how wonderful it is to be able to disclose their innermost feelings and not only find that they are taken seriously, but also find others who feel exactly the same feelings.

Of course, over 5 years, the subject matter has inevitably widened to encompass all manners of associated subjects, and the six-weekly, 16 page newsletter is never short of material, 90% of which are members letters.

To write an open letter to The Independent would probably bring responses from undesirable sources, so I thought I would ask you if you wouldn't mind putting anyone who responds to your article, and you feel they would benefit, in touch with us.

Your co-operation in this would be greatly appreciated, and we would be much obliged if you would convey our thanks to the Health Editor of The Independent for the number of articles on the subject of circumcision which he has sanctioned over the past year or so, which has so helped this formerly forbidden subject to become more commonplace.

I received a reply from her saying that she would indeed pass on any information about Acorn to anyone who might be interested. I have since had one inquiry from an interested person who I feel will soon join us.

I have been sent a cutting from the October issue of Playgirl in which a question is asked about the restoration of a foreskin, and their answer is to quote some passages from the above mentioned book.

D.A.

Radio Phone-In On The Above Subject

A day or so after the article appeared in The Independent a discussion was held on Mike Deakin's early evening phone-in on London Talkback Radio on 1152 AM and the following is a resume of most of the contributions, taped and transcribed.

Mike Deakin was clearly attempting to follow the lead from the article, to agree that infant circumcision was an unnecessary (in most cases) mutilation, and callers were invited to comment/express their views and experiences.

The first caller I heard was Alan who agreed it was a mutilation which was unnecessary and could be avoided in most cases. Religious reasons were acceptable but hygienic reasons were not valid, and he felt that the sensitivity of the knob was lost if it was permanently exposed (he was not circumcised!) and stated you didn't need to be sans foreskin to be hygienic.

Sarah had a three-and-a-half year old boy whose foreskin was extremely tight and which was forever causing infections which had to be treated with antibiotics. The boy's doctor said circumcision was the only answer and, while she was not keen on him being done, felt it was better to be done now than later. A Jewish friend of hers had refused to have her son circumcised and had been 'cut off' (excuse the pun) by the rest of the family for not following Jewish tradition.

John had been done at the age of 44 and found the operation an extremely painful process, despite the fact that it solved the even more painful tight foreskin he'd had. His G.P. had referred him to a consultant as he was always very sore after intercourse. He wondered how many men actually needed the operation but didn't go through with what they needed.

Eva felt that if the operation was carried out on children over the age of about three it could have dire psychological effects, particularly as it made the child different from other boys. Her husband had had their son done when 8 days old and he had haemorrhaged badly. She felt that the operation was not explained very well, to those done. Mike Deakin said he had no idea whether most boys were done or not. (Can people really go round not noticing all their lives?)

Julian agreed that it was mutilation at birth, but had his son done at aged 2 because of phimosis, and stated that the child still had a problem about it now, a year later. He however said that there was nothing wrong with it being performed later in life, but at an early age it was barbaric.

Mike Deakin in referring once again to the article, said there was little justification in the 20th Century for following old customs – the child should decide.

Tom referred to an article he had read in a French magazine which stated that circumcision could help to stop the spread of AIDS, and also assisted in stopping sexually transmitted diseases. The article alleged that there was a higher incidence of AIDS amongst the uncircumcised. A Canadian study of various regions of Africa showed fewer cases of AIDS and sexually transmitted diseases amongst the circumcised. Mike Deakin made little of the magazine report, but there was no doubt that he was in favour of circumcision.

Molly said she was beginning to feel guilty about her 4 sons, 3 of whom she and her husband had had circumcised. The first son had problems and was done at 14 months, the second son being done at an earlier age some 13 months later to avoid problems previously encountered with the eldest. The third boy had not been done and she couldn't remember why, but the 4th lad was again circumcised. She wondered whether they'd done something awful, but as the doctor had advised it at least for the first son, and it was clearly in the 40s/early 50s when the operation was more widespread, no one ever questioned why. (I bet the one not done felt different however!) Molly had never discussed the matter with her sons but would now, though she did say that all were long since grown up and healthy.

Yvonne worked for a medical firm who perform circumcisions at their clinic, it being the most popular operation. An enormous number of men wish to be circumcised, some for phimosis, but mainly for cosmetic reasons in their's or their partner's eyes. She stated it helps prevent cervical cancer in the man's partner and research had been carried out in the USA on that very point. The operation was carried out on a day case basis using a local anaesthetic, taking about 20 minutes, she said. A dressing was applied for 48 hours, a course of antibiotics was prescribed to avoid infections and all should be healed in 3 weeks. Cost £400. She reiterated that it was the most popular operation performed and said it was all ages between 19 and 65, some being referred by their G.P., others being strictly private patients. Mike Deakin asked her which she preferred aesthetically but she said that she'd only known roundheads (a term not mentioned during the phone-in!).

Hilary stated that it was the quality of the gent that was important, not the apparatus, and she referred to female circumcision being a mutilation, not male.

The next gentleman didn't give his name but said that with an exposed glans, which was prone to being rubbed by clothes etc. a man was more able to control himself, and a circumcised penis was a hell of a lot cleaner and prettier looking.

Freda had recently accompanied her daughter and grandson to a London hospital for his circumcision. She stated that the operation on the baby took hardly any time at all and the baby didn't even cry. She felt we were listening to "an awful lot of guff". She was Jewish and felt that it was healthier, and helped to lessen the risk of cancer. A non-Jewish friend of hers had her 8-year-old son done recently and he'd had a lot of pain. She thought that it was better to be done early in life.

Joan knew a doctor in Chelsea in the early 60s who had told her that a survey had shown that unmarried ladies and Jewish ladies had a much lesser risk of cervical cancer. If there is such evidence shouldn't all males be done? Mike Deakin interjected and stated that there was no proof of this.

Then followed a discussion with Marilyn Milos of NOCIRC who stated that the operation started on the West Coast of Africa, and the Egyptians, Jews and Moslems all circumcise. In the English-speaking world it came into fashion in the late 1800's to prevent self-abuse. She stated that excuses given for the operation – cleaner, more hygienic, infections less likely, had all been discredited, and that it was a quarter billion dollar industry in the USA. The media in the US refuses to address the situation. Marilyn Milos admitted to having three sons circumcised, as she was told by the doctor at the time that it didn't hurt. But when she became a nurse in 1979 she saw what actually happened to her sons. She stated that it was excruciatingly painful and caused both physical and psychological scars. The resistance to her campaign in the US is amazing, and she was fired from her job. She is amazed at how deeply ingrained this unnecessary surgery has become (her words, not mine!). No one wants to talk about it over there. She stated that the incidence in Canada is about 25%, Australia 20%, and in Great Britain less than  $\frac{1}{2}\%$ . The operation on the NHS is now only performed for serious medical reasons, following Dr. Douglas Gairdner's exposé of 1949. In the USA, parents didn't want to listen to her, and she felt the operation was tantamount to sexual child abuse. The glans was supposed to be an internal organ, and once the foreskin was removed it became abraded and makes a callus to protect itself. Marilyn Milos stated that there were thousands of men wanting to follow Dr. Bigelow and reconstitute their foreskins. Most said that the sensations returned in two to three weeks once they had re-covered their knob.

Peter referred to the circumcision of his son who had had problems with a tightening foreskin, and was done at the age of 12. His G.P. stated that the method used by the NHS under a general anaesthetic was extremely painful, but he offered an alternative method which would cost £40. The operation was carried out under a local anaesthetic and Peter watched it. A small incision was made in the foreskin, a collar was put over the glans, and a ligature applied on top of the foreskin which was on top of the collar. It took 20 minutes, and 3 hours later he and his son were in McDonalds having a hamburger. There was no pain at all when the anaesthetic wore off and Peter said that this was quite clearly the way to perform circumcisions.

Richard was done on the kitchen table when aged 3 in 1922, and stated that it hadn't affected him or his sex life in any way. Both his brothers were also done. He was cut off in his prime, so to speak, by Mike Deakin, who stated that the discussion was about circumcision and not Richard's sex life.

Caroline stated that her husband had been done when he converted to Judaism, and he therefore had sexual experience before and after the operation, and there was no doubt in his mind that it was best after the circumcision. She referred to the Jewish origins when Abraham was told to circumcise Isaac, and stated that it was a mark of one's Jewishness. Mike Deakin wanted to know who was going to know, and Caroline stated that it was traditional and personal.

Mark referred to his twin brother who was done at the age of 28 for medical reasons, and apparently stated that he was worse off afterwards. Mark, not having been done, couldn't say himself, but wondered why his brother had waited 27 years. (It didn't sound as if the subject had been discussed between him and his brother).

The final caller I heard was Cyril, who was circumcised. It hadn't made any difference to his sex life, and most of his friends who are circumcised agree. Apparently he had seen in his doctor's surgery an article saying that it was definitely more hygienic to be circumcised, for without the secretions of the sulcus there was much less risk to partners in respect of causing an aggravating disease of the cervix, and also a rare tumour of the penis could remain undetected if covered by the foreskin.

Mike Deakin again backed up Marilyn Milos, saying that these studies had been utterly discredited, but it was acknowledged that there were more than just one medical opinion to listen to.

After listening to the tape for most of the programme, I felt Mike Deakin to be a rather arrogant individual who browbeat those who didn't say what he wanted to hear, and that really seemed to be that. He agreed with everything that Marilyn Milos said, despite what was being said by a large number of callers. I leave readers to make their minds up. Is infant circumcision a mutilation? One thing is certain – there needs to be more information on the subject more readily available to the populace.

Brian Of The West Country

Different Ends

There has been an abundance of correspondence, remarked on by the Editor, in favour of letting foreskins remain as natural. To redress the balance, and perhaps infer a warning, may I tell you about an incident which occurred when I was at school.

Just before the last war, the campaign by the medical profession against routine circumcision had only just begun, and some doctors had already started to refuse to circumcise unless the condition necessitated it. I was one of the early victims and although my parents wished me to be circumcised, their doctor considered it unnecessary, as he had done in my brothers' cases. However, our mother was an ardent defender of having her boys bare their ends. She had been a nurse in Canada before marriage, and, in lonely districts, had been the only medical person available to deal with cuts, maternity, breaks and small operations – stitching, making-good abrasions and so on. Although she never admitted to it, when asked why we had not been 'done', answered that, because the doctor refused to cut our foreskins, we had been 'snipped' – the loose tassel of foreskin had been cut off. Now, how she had persuaded the doctor to do this in view of his anti-circumcision stand, or whether she had used her own skills and applied the remedy herself, we were never to know. The fact is that we grew up with shortish foreskins which just exposed the end of the glans and had a wide aperture.

In early years when bath time was supervised by parents, we were told to wash under the skin, which meant pushing it back as far as it would go. Mine seemed to be adherent to the glans and would only retract so far. Despite instructions to "keep pushing – it should go further back", it was some years later, around age 6 or 7, that, one morning I had been playing with my willy, pulling and stretching it, when suddenly the skin came right back. The adhesions had parted and the purple helmet, wet and shiny, came into the daylight. I remember rushing into my parents' bedroom and holding it out for inspection. They complimented me on it and recognising that it would be tender, put vaseline on it, but told me to keep pushing it back. Each bath time afterwards, we were all told to keep the skin back in the bath, and, as each of us became older, mother explained that, "Big boys should keep their foreskin behind the 'bump', because it would otherwise become wet and smelly underneath." Bedtime was the usual series of questions, "Have you washed behind ears, cleaned teeth, fingernails, skin pushed back?" So we grew up believing that everyone else kept their foreskins peeled off. Not until I started to come into contact with other boys at school did I discover that there were all shapes of willies, which were when the questions to parents were prompted.

When I was about 12 or 13, like many small boys, I became very involved with a group of similarly aged boys who looked for birds' nests, made fires in the woods, and on wet days went into the nearest barn, sat on the hay and had 'cock shows', comparing ourselves and exhibiting our wares. Of my group, about half were circumcised, 3 or 4 boys. The rest of us, apart from one, had either retracted or loose skins which were worn 'back', most of them permanently. Mine was very permanently back, since it had either shrunk or somehow become used to being behind the ridge, and would not stay over without being held. Another boy, Roly, had a very loose skin which would never stay where it was put, sliding on and off so loosely and easily that we could never decide whether he was circumcised or not. The exception to the rule was Ivor, an evacuee, who lived in the village with an old couple. Ivor had a long and slender penis, but such a tight foreskin that he couldn't push it back, no matter how he tried. The blue end of his glans was only just exposed as he manfully struggled to get it back further. He squeezed, nipped, rolled, but to no avail – until one day. He was extremely determined to be like us, since on these occasions we would all expose the retracted penis as a sort of ritual. Ivor concentrated, he grimaced, he squeezed. We watched as the blue of the exposed end of the glans turned purple and the tightness of his foreskin became white, a constricting band that threatened to bisect his shiny helmet. As still he pushed, fraction of an inch by fraction, it started to move further than it had ever done before. Finally, when almost all had been exposed, he made one last valiant attempt, it came back, right behind the ridge of his glans. He looked round, possibly expecting a cheer, but we all sat mesmerised by the resulting phenomenon. His penis, which had been smooth and tubular in external shape, now had taken on the shape of a wasp's thorax with head, attached by the slimmest of connections. In fact, his foreskin was constricting the shaft so tightly that it had sunk deep into the flesh of his penis. After a few minutes of triumph, Ivor decided that it was getting a bit sore and that he should revert it to normal. He did as he had seen some of us do so many times before, holding the shaft between finger and thumb and pushing forward. Nothing happened, just a slight movement of the shaft skin, the tight band staying where it was. He tried different techniques, squeezing the glans, using his handkerchief to get a better grip, and spitting on it for lubrication. Slowly the fact dawned on him that it wasn't going to go. The knob was getting bluer and distended, by the skin biting into his cock. Still his efforts achieved nothing, and we were all becoming frightened that he had done some sort of permanent injury to himself, perhaps even that it would drop off.

The time came to go home, with Ivor still in his 'condition'. It would be a lonely homecoming for him. Although his evacuee digs were homely, and the people kind, it was just not the sort of thing one could do – walk in with a penis in one hand and explain that it had 'got broken'. So he spent a worrying night alone whilst his swollen penis gradually subsided, and the sheer discomfort of having a sensitive bared glans for the first time uncovered became a reality. I suppose it was then that he decided that he had best make the transition from a cavalier to a roundhead a matter for joy rather than concern. He arrived at school the next day. We cornered him, asking if it had dropped off? had he got over it yet? was it still sore? Ivor manfully parried the questions, becoming braver as the days passed. He found that the initial difficulty of peeing with his 'new' cock had not continued so acutely, and that he could now pee like the rest of us, in a sharp straight jet.

For so long as he remained at our school, Ivor never showed his penis with the skin drawn forward, and I guess he remained with the skin behind the glans ever after. He did however manage to achieve one spectacular display. If his penis was erect, he could coax the tight band of prepuce further down the shaft of his penis, where it would remain, dividing his penis into two halves by a wasp-waist, which to us seemed as though it could be totally bisected and severed by a careless movement. His glans remained smallish, but became whitish-pink in time. He could masturbate by moving the looseness of skin up and down the shaft. He eventually managed to masturbate like some of us, by spitting on his glans and massaging the saliva into the bared end. Meanwhile, Roly happily watched whilst using his prehensile tunnel of rather pointless skin by amalgamating all the techniques of us bare ends, and the long skins amongst us, with or without saliva.

Anon

Masturbation — Getting It Right

vi) The Stage of Detumescence

Immediately following orgasm/ejaculation there is a marked drop in blood pressure and a gradual slowing of the heart rate, both of which become raised as arousal progresses and orgasm occurs. The heavy, and often rapid, breathing which accompanies a sexual climax also subsides. At this time the penis gradually loses its erection, and the testicles, which have been drawn up close to the body, sink lower to their normal resting position. Although the penis may lose its erection quite swiftly, its total volume may take quite a little while to return to the fully relaxed state. Thus the flaccid state to which it initially returns may be somewhat larger than usual for an hour or more. Similarly the testicles will also have increased in volume during arousal by as much as 50%, and even after they have resumed their normal low-slung position in the scrotum, it can be an hour or two before they fully return to their resting state.

It is during detumescence that any feelings of repressed guilt, shame or anxiety are usually experienced. I have known some young people to become suicidal in this stage and record with long-harboured distress an occasion from my student days well over 30 years ago, when a 16-year-old boy died having hacked off his penis with a sheath knife in a fit of extreme post-orgasmic depression.

It is most important therefore, that the period of detumescence be recognised for what it potentially can be – the most wonderfully relaxing and satisfying period of the whole sexual cycle. It is a time for lying back and thinking sweet thoughts while continuing to caress oneself, gently fondling one's genitals, and making sure one is warm and comfortable. It is important to allow plenty of time for this phase, since it may well be as long as 20 minutes before one really feels ready to get up and resume ordinary living. This is the romantic stage of masturbation and should not be thrown away lightly in the hasty desire to 'get up and go'. For this reason, 'in bed' wankers may find that night time masturbation is more satisfactory than early morning just before getting up time. The late night wanker can drift off into a restful doze or even a full night's sleep while detumescence is occurring. However, others may prefer the option of a morning masturbation on the strength of the ready-made erection which a full bladder of urine collected overnight usually provides.

vii) The Refractory Stage

The stages of detumescence and refraction are often considered as being virtually one and the same, since, during detumescence the individual is already in a refractory state. The refractory period is that period after orgasm when no amount of continued or re-commenced physical stimulation can produce re-arousal. The length of the combined detumescence/refractory period can vary very markedly from individual to individual, or even in the same individual from one day to the next. A lot depends on the intensity of the immediately preceding period of arousal leading to climax. Where this has been very high, the individual may be left with substantial levels of sex hormones still circulating in the blood. This can lead to a very brief period of detumescence/refraction. In fact, on some occasions, re-arousal may be possible after only two or three minutes. In healthy, virile young men, re-arousal within 15 minutes of a previous orgasm is not uncommon. However, in many men, particularly as age advances, the refractory state may persist for many hours. During this time the return to the ordinary quiescent resting stage is a gradual one. Towards the end of the refractory stage, in such circumstances, re-arousal may be possible but the effort involved is considerable. This actually provides a potential for masturbatory enjoyment, since forced masturbation while the refractory stage is still incomplete may lead to a long but intensely enjoyable cycle of arousal, plateau, and orgasm, often culminating in a climax of quite violent and mind-blowing proportions. However, only a small amount of semen is likely to be produced. The older, twice-a-day masturbator (myself included) often finds himself in this happy state. It sometimes involves considerable determination to initiate a wanking session in defiance of a general mood of disinclination, but the ultimate result more than justifies the initial effort.

Finale

Mention should be made here of the condition known as 'Orchitis Amorosa Rosacea' or bachelor's balls ache. Many regular masturbators are content to bring themselves to the plateau stage and then, after maintaining themselves at this point for some considerable time, cease stimulation and break off the action without proceeding to orgasm. The advantage of this action is that they usually experience quite a prolonged period of enjoyable sexual urge. However, detumescence doesn't occur in the normal way because the climax has been aborted. The testicles remain swollen and engorged, and the penis too sometimes remains semi-erect and swollen. After an hour or two, if the situation isn't resolved, the testicles – indeed the whole genital area – begin to ache and become very tender to touch. There is a reddening of the skin because of blood engorgement, and the individual suffers growing discomfort and distress. This can persist for several hours, and when I was a casualty officer, I was more than once called in the middle of the night to very unhappy young men walking with their legs wide apart and an agonised expression on their faces. The story was usually that they had spent an aroused half-hour saying good night to their girlfriend on the doorstep, but had not been invited in to relieve themselves through intercourse. The masturbator who frustrates his climax can be in the same position.

No account of masturbation can ever be complete, new ideas for experiment always emerging. And what some of us like doing can be totally alien to another. A typical example of this could be the swallowing of semen. Semen has a distinctive and acquired taste. Sexual oralists often derive intense pleasure from imbibing their own semen – catching it on their hand and licking it off at the time of ejaculation. However, many masturbators would be quite appalled at the notion and take offence at the suggestion that the practice is an acceptable one. Essentially, for all that may be written about it, masturbation must be seen as a personal technique, very special to the individual himself. It isn't something that can be learnt from books. An account of this kind merely consolidates some existing ideas and perhaps provides a few ideas for experimentation in the future.

Dr. Ray Hamble

More Female Preferences

An item in the last Acorn refers to one printed in Issue Q, and both have a common theme: German girls prefer their men uncircumcised. I wish to recount this true story of one whose preferences were quite different.

I spent almost a month of the Summer of 1986 at a youth hostel near Arcachon on the French Atlantic Coast. The dormitories were mixed, the showers both communal and mixed, and a short walk away was a naturist beach. Almost everybody's swimming trunks, bikinis and night things never left their rucksacks, and naked bliss became the norm. The hostellers divided into two language based groups: German and English. However, few of the latter were in fact English. One man and two women were accompanied by a Welshman (me), two Americans and a Brazilian (all men), a Norwegian couple, two Swedish girls and one young German woman. Four of the six men had been circumcised, Wales and Norway providing the only foreskins. I do not recall seeing even one of the much larger German-speaking group being circumcised. Hygiene, as I recall, was poor. A potent mixture of sweat, sand and suntan oil (not to forget the inevitable smegma) collected under the foreskin. Whilst I have seen few men retract to wash the glans in communal showers at the local pool – certainly no-one was going to do so when those showers were shared with several nubile naked women. (My own 'trick' was to head for the loo after the shower and clean out with my still damp sponge).

From the furtive glances the women were making, it soon became apparent that the circumcised cocks were getting more than their fair share of attention. Admiring glances developed into long hard stares and, in the case of one woman, outright fascination. This woman was the solitary German girl who had joined us. She admitted quite candidly that she had deliberately left her 'volk' after having shared a shower with the two Americans and noticed their cut form. After a few days she increased her acquaintance with circumcision by making love to the Englishman. This woman can have known no shame. Not only had she bared her body, but later opened her soul to state an unequivocal preference for a cut cock in her cunt and in her mouth. After a week or so, they left together, apparently to walk in the foothills of the Pyrenees and no doubt for her to gain further appreciation of the bared glans.

Other readers' experiences suggest that not all German women feel this way; my own observation contradicts this. I'm not saying that they are wrong and I am right – just that we are all (whether German girls or not) individuals. One further thought came to me as I was writing this letter. Was that young woman seduced by the fact that his cock was certainly showered clean on a daily basis, whilst others were not? Perhaps. It mattered nothing to one of the Swedes though – for in her cunt and mouth she happily took my foreskinned member regularly that summer.

Anon

Foreskin Retraction Questionnaire — Results

Thanks to those who replied to my questionnaire, and herewith the answers analysed. For the first four questions it seemed more sense to give the range with an average, and to make lists for the others. In the case of questions 8 to 11, many respondents gave several answers. The interesting thing is that all but one have eventually had themselves circumcised; obviously permanent retraction is more common outside Acorn than in it.

It is obviously a minority interest, but one worth pursuing all the same. I should particularly like feedback on the 'further comments' section – especially, as I wrote a few weeks ago, about the practise being common in the Far East. Also in the Army according to this letter to Zipper some years back:-

"In Issue 85 you have a lot of guys writing to say they like to see the head of a man's cock shown with the foreskin back, and John (Southall) asks if it's common for the skin to slip back from the head. I was in the Army for a few years and they'd look at our cocks regularly to see if we were clean. We'd have to stand in a line and drop our trousers and pants. Most of the blokes were uncut, but I remember most kept their knobs uncovered in their pants." The writer then goes on to describe the rest of the inspection – anal, etc.

N.G. – Norfolk

1. Age now: range from 33 to 78.
2. a) Age at which retraction first made: range from 6 to 22.
b) Age of final retraction: usually within 3 years of 2a.
3. Penis length flaccid: 4" to 2.5" (mean 2.9").
4. a) Circumference of corona: 4.9" to 1.75" (mean 4").
b) Circumference of shaft: 4.3" to 1.5" (mean 3.5").
5. Foreskin a) longer – 3.
b) shorter – 3.
c) as long as – 1.

All 3 who answered b) had foreskins that retracted naturally behind the glans.

6. Has the glans or corona increased in size? Yes: 5; No: 0; Not sure: 2.
7. a) Easy to keep back – 5
b) Needed training – 2
8. Methods used in training: a) Repeated retraction – 2.
b) Piercing through foreskin – 1.

9. Problems encountered:

None – 1

Sensitivity of glans (pleasant) – 1.

Sensitivity of glans (unpleasant) – 3.

Tightness of retracted foreskin – 2.

Trapped pubic hair – 3.

Embarrassing question from G.P. about it – 1.

10. Reasons for initial retraction:

To be different from other boys – 1.

Stimulating feeling – 2

To prevent irritation – 2.

Parental directive – 1. (Father & brother also retracted)

Exposed glans looks better – 2.

Desire to look circumcised – 2.

To prevent tightness of foreskin – 1.

Foreskin naturally retracted itself – 1.

11. Current reason (if different from 10):

Prefer exposed glans – 3

Feels better – 2.

Hygiene – 1.

Dislike of foreskin – 2.

Contact Corner

Very-well endowed, 38 year-old bi-guy, circumcised as a late teenager at own request, seeks correspondence/meetings with other circumcised guys – Beds/Bucks, anywhere. All letters answered, photo appreciated.

P.H. – Milton Keynes

Because I've been temporarily very busy in the last few weeks this issue is a little overdue, but there'll still be two more issues by the end of the year.

D.A.

ACORN

1993 Issue No 7

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Ian's Tail – In America	Ian	Page 2
Tatler		Page 5
Newspapers	Anon	Page 6
Naturally Cut	Anon	Page 7
A Kinder Cut		Page 8
Female Circumcision	K.J.	Page 8
P(r)ick of the Week	D.A.	Page 10
From America	C.E.	Page 11
Trapped Tip	H.J.M.	Page 12
Satisfied Customer	I.T.	Page 13
'Rabbit at Rest'	R.B.W.	Page 15

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

I have been asked to inquire if there are any cavaliers considering being circumcised, and if so, the reason for wanting it, and what are their concerns regarding having it done.

It could only happen in America. A urologist has found himself famous for an outlandish reason. A young wife decided that her husband had raped her, so while he was asleep she hacked off his penis with a kitchen knife. She then called the police to say that she had thrown the organ out of the car window. A police search found it lying on a grass verge. When this doctor got to the hospital he found “an oddly calm patient and eight cops sitting around with their knees crossed.” The doctor and a plastic surgeon took more than 9 hours to reattach it, using a microscope to reconnect minuscule nerves and blood vessels, and were totally successful.

The word got out during the operation and afterwards the doctor found himself discussing the operation on radio and TV. The victim's wife was charged with malicious wounding and the husband with marital rape. They have both hired entertainment lawyers to handle their cases and to organise book, TV, and film rights. Meanwhile the doctor and his family are trying to learn how to deal with fame.

My thanks to the member who sent in the newspaper article covering the story.

There having been no comments forthcoming regarding the letter two issues ago asking for a sticky solution, I, never backward with experimentation, had a go myself. Discarding one by one the various gluey substances through fear of damage, I inevitably came back to the sugar based foods. I found that they did indeed liquefy, but not stopping there I found that after a little while the water part evaporated (I used marmalade), and left it very sticky. So much so that it threatened to keep stuck, but with a tiny drop of saliva applied with the finger now and again it worked beautifully, and the resulting sensation was great.

D.A.

Ian's Tail — Ian Goes To America

After working in hospitals in England for some years, I determined to rid myself of the travel bug which had been gnawing away at me for some time. A few weeks after making the decision I found myself at Kennedy International Airport in New York, clutching my passport and immigration visa. The Immigration Officer surveyed my one year work permit and said that he hoped I would have “an interesting time.” It was certainly that. It was a year which allowed me to increase my professional knowledge, and to develop my interest and understanding of circumcision.

The day I took up my duties at the hospital, I was sent off for a routine staff medical examination. The receptionist told me to remove my clothes, put on a robe, and go through into the examination room. The doctor was an elderly man, large, smiling and friendly, and very keen to tell me of the wonderful time he had as a U.S. Air Force doctor working in London during W.W.2. I was examined from head to foot. I thought he had finished, but then he told me to get up on the couch where he proceeded to examine my abdomen and then each of my testicles in turn. He then gently took hold of my penis which promptly erected. He examined it thoughtfully, then said, "No trouble there I see, you're a fine upstanding young man, but, my God, when they circumcised you they didn't do too well, did they? If that happened here we'd likely be sued for malpractice. Still, it sure looks fully functional." He smiled quizzically, then said, "OK, you're fit, you can get dressed and go." Scarlet faced I got down from the couch and left.

I was assigned a locker in the staff changing room. I was surprised when I found it was customary for the younger men to strip completely, and to don only a thin, short-sleeved shirt and the slightly thicker, drawstring, pyjama-style trousers to work in. After a few days I joined the crowd and left my traditional Y-fronts in my locker. It was here that I experienced a great revelation. Circumcision was most definitely 'in'; indeed you had to look really hard to find a foreskin. In my immediate group of thirty or so, there were two. One on a doctor, the other on a Spanish-speaking aide who had immigrated from Puerto Rico. After duty almost every man took to the showers, walking there naked and returning naked to his locker, carrying with him a towel taken from the stack in the shower area. Nudity was not paraded, you just took off all your street clothes and put on others to work. After work you stripped off, tossed your soiled clothes into the laundry basket, went off for a shower, returned to your locker space, dried off and dressed. In the doing of this I'm sure that every man had a look at the penis of his colleagues. I was no exception. It was probably at this time that I became sure that, for me, the circumcised cock, with its completely exposed knob, was a thing of beauty, and proclaims masculinity in a way that a knob, peeking out from, or covered by, a foreskin does not.

I had been there about a month when I completed a shift at the same time as an intern from Vermont, who I had worked with on a number of occasions. His ancestors had immigrated from Lancashire in the late 19th. century and he was very interested in life in England. We stripped off, went to the showers, where after a few minutes he said, quietly, "Do many of you guys get circumcised in England?" He came over to me, looked, and said, "Gee, what did they do to you?" He gently took hold of my cock and looked more closely. I pushed his hand away and told him that I knew my circumcision was a mess, and that I hated it. His attitude was one of professional interest, firm but understanding. He apologised for embarrassing me and said that I appeared to have "a bit of a hang-up" about it and that he thought we should "talk it out", and asked me to go to his apartment for supper. Over supper I told

Art my story. Afterwards he suggested that he contact a particular doctor on my behalf who, he was sure, would make a surgical revision for me. I declined this offer through a mixture of embarrassment, fear, and uncertainty about my ability to pay the fees. The next three months, the last of his internship, was a significant time for me. I learnt that Art (Arthur) knew a great deal about circumcision in America. He had performed circumcisions regularly during his time in obstetrics, and as a Medical Officer in the U.S. Army. He could and would talk about it freely without embarrassment, which enabled me to do the same. What I had been able to consider professionally I was now able to discuss personally, openly, and with a detail that would have embarrassed my parents.

Art was not circumcised as a baby, and in talking to me it became clear that, as a boy, Art was as unhappy with his cock as I was with mine, but for rather different reasons. In school he had been the odd man out, teased by his peers, and asked when he was going to get his skin cut like a 'real guy.' High school and college were an improvement in that there were more men with foreskins, but still a significant minority. After medical school, Art was called up for service in Vietnam, where, in his words, thoughts about the state of your cock were obscured by "trying not to piss your pants when the shells dropped, pressure of work, and trying to stay alive." Art's last months of military service were spent back in the U.S. where, he told me, he circumcised a number of new recruits. There was no policy on circumcision, but enlisted men with foreskins were made aware that circumcision was available. In his words, the uncircumcised were "usually born at home in rural areas, Hispanic or Hilly-Billy mountain boys." A number accepted the invitation to be cut, some because they had developed a personal preference, others to 'join the ranks', and some because it was free of charge. At his pre-discharge medical, Art requested to be circumcised, which was done a week before discharge, under general anaesthetic, and was in hospital for three days.

From Art I learned that, at that time in the U.S., more than 80% of the boys were circumcised when they were two or three days old, early in the morning, and without anaesthetic. Freehand circumcision (or cut-and-trim) was almost unknown – "we have a whole range of clamps ... and there's always the Plastibell ... we get a good cosmetic result." I was, from my observations, aware of the cosmetic result, and I had noticed that, apart from the fully exposed knob, some boys showed no sign of surgery. Other boys had a dark ring surrounding their penis, sited anywhere from immediately behind the knob to halfway back along the shaft. Art explained that, aiming for as little bloodshed as possible, compression clamps, applied after the dorsal slit and before the foreskin was cut off, were favoured. These left the dark circling that I had seen, particularly the Plastibell, as that device remained on the penis until it sloughed off, generally between five and ten days after the operation.

Before I left America I assisted in the circumcision procedures on a couple of mornings. We started at 7am and circumcised however many boys were listed in one session, usually three or four. The babies were deprived of the 6am feed, cried because they were hungry, cried also because they were strapped on a hard moulded plastic board called a circumstraint, their limbs held by velcro straps, and, yes, I am sure that the procedure was painful for a little while. I remember that the doctor talked quietly to the boys during the procedure, saying such things as, "OK little fella ... soon be over ... all for the best ... you'll be fine later." After their circumcision, the boys were fed and quickly settled down. In response to my questions I found that almost all parents elected to have their boys circumcised. The nurse in attendance on the first day had four sons, all circumcised at birth. I was told that general anaesthetic was not advisable for the newly born, and that effective local anaesthetic required multiple injections which were thought to be equally painful and took as long as the circumcision itself. In addition, infiltration of fluid into the penis distorted the tissue, which could result in a less than cosmetic outcome. I was also told that the boys quickly settled down and that they didn't recall the experience. If the boys in who's circumcision I participated develop like the men with whom I shared a locker room they will have nothing to complain about in their circumcision.

At the end of my year I was happy to return to England where circumcision without anaesthetic had been discontinued except for the religious rite. This I find reassuring. I believe that the penis with a ragged circumcision scar, skin tags, or bridges, is more likely to be found on a man circumcised as a child without anaesthetic.

Ian

Tatler

This is an article by A.A. Gill from The Tatler sent in by A.K. London.

We are born perfect and complete. Nature and natural selection have spent 10 million years getting us right and nothing about the human body is an optional extra. But in Britain thousands of perfect babies are 'improved' at birth every year, and they are all male. In the pursuit of bettering nature they leave a little bit of themselves behind; they have the tops of their penises docked like spaniels' tails.

Circumcision is a primitive ritual that started as a right of passage for boys at puberty. The pain, blood, and the flaying of the penis by older members of the tribe was an initiation into manhood, the pre-bespoke equivalent of your first pair of long trousers.

The Newspapers

Two items which I am sure will be of interest for Acorn. Both are from today's Guardian. One is on infant circumcision (see below), and came from the health section. The other is on penis size, and from the women's section (!) circumcision got another mention too; the case of a drowned Scot who, because of his dark complexion and circumcised member, was presumed to be a Turkish sailor lost overboard.

The Guardian seems to be trying to catch up with The Independent in its coverage of our favourite topic. Last week life's luxuries were stated to have been until recently, atheism, breast feeding and circumcision. Incidentally I scored nought out of three – obviously a deprived child! (Since then things have changed. Sundays are spent on the local naturist beach, my partner's nipples are gently nibbled, and I was circumcised nearly a year ago.) Of much more interest was the subsequent statement that all three have now become necessities. Reading this, several questions came to mind. Is neonatal circumcision now in fashion amongst Guardian readers? Are we to assume that the educated, liberal, upper-middle-classes, at whom the paper is aimed, favour the operation? Is there any link between The Guardian's Manchester roots and that city's large Jewish population? That Salford has more mohels than any British city (other than London) must be a welcome fact to any Mancunian parents (of any or no religious faith) who wish to have a son circumcised.

I do not regard circumcision as a luxury – indeed essential for those with balanitis, phimosis etc. It is most certainly luxurious; a naked glans against the duvet, to soap in my morning shower or, best of all, in or against my partner. I now can truly enjoy her wet cunt rather than my foreskin. Oral sex is now given more frequently and without reluctance, and nestling up against her bare buttocks or her pubic hair is quite blissful (no pyjamas or nighties in this household). I would not go so far as to state that circumcision is a necessity. I firmly believe in parental choice and furthermore, that parents should be allowed to exercise that choice. In this day and age a parent has to be really determined if a son is to be circumcised. A doctor or mohel has to be found, private arrangements will be made, and money will change hands. A better way forward would, I am convinced, be for the health service to adopt the practice of certain private hospitals and to offer all parents the choice of whether or not a baby son should be circumcised. Just as the mother-to-be is offered a long or short stay in hospital option, so the parents should be offered a circumcision or not option. In this way the luxury or necessity debate ceases to be of importance. More babies would, I am sure, be circumcised and hence the whole issue would be less fraught (and perhaps groups like Acorn would cease to exist – after all, I initially joined only to find the name of someone who would circumcise me!)

Anon

[Personally I wouldn't have liked Acorn to have never existed. Think of all the good friends I would have never known. D.A.]

Naturally 'Cut'

My brother is two years older than me and was circumcised around the age of five. Mother began to try to retract his foreskin at this age, and after achieving only partial success whipped him down to the doctor's where he was cut that day. He later told me it hurt like hell and he was very upset about it.

My turn for inspection came at around the age of four, but mother succeeded in exposing my glans after a few tries on successive bath nights. She used to make me keep the skin back all during the bath and for some time after until she'd dried and dressed me. Even then she said, "Leave it as it is, it's better back." Because it felt uncomfortable I usually pulled it forward again when she'd disappeared.

Not long afterwards, following the usual bath and retraction routine, she spoke to me more seriously, and said I was old enough to keep my skin back all the time like a man. "Keep it back and keep it clean" was her motto. My father was circumcised and had he been otherwise, and had my mother not been a nurse, I might have argued. She is a loving but determined mother, and puts on her professional no-nonsense voice at such times. On this occasion she made sure that my foreskin was carefully tucked in behind the rim, and followed this with a warning that if I released it she would have me cut like my brother.

As I'd had all the gory details from him, I braved the initial discomfort through fear of worse. Our penises now looked alike and it wasn't long afterwards that I tried unsuccessfully to return mine to 'normal' and found my retraction permanent; the glans having grown and the foreskin shrivelled.

In adulthood I saw no reason to undergo an operation to achieve what had already happened. My wife, who is pro-foreskin, was disappointed as she discovered my permanent 'nakedness'. When she heard that I was uncircumcised she thought at first that she might be able to restore things, but after a few vain tries said in sad resignation, "You've had it!"

Frankly, having read much on the argument, I don't mind.

Anon

A Kinder Cut

An article by Randi Epstein in The Guardian.

Surely, no grown man would submit to a surgical snip of his penis without a hefty dose of painkillers. Then why not newborns, too? For centuries, doctors, and religious officials have performed circumcisions on newborn males without a care in the world about the infants' pain. Until recently most scientists assumed that the pain pathways in infants were too premature to detect pain. We now know better. Even the speediest nick of the foreskin must hurt fiercely.

But there is good news. Researchers have shown that newborns who get a pat of anaesthetic seem to suffer less than those who get nothing at all. Recent circumcision studies have tested an anaesthetic cream called EMLA: a mix of two commonly used painkillers, lidocaine and prilocaine. An American investigator says, "The current practice is circumcision without the benefit of anaesthesia or analgesia. The inattention to pain from unanaesthetised circumcision might suggest that it is not regarded as painful, but mounting evidence shows the discomfort lasts longer than the procedure."

Reporting in The Journal of the American Medical Association, her team described how the infants, about two or three days old, were given either cream or placebo. Doctors recorded the babies' heart rates, videotaped their expressions, and recorded their crying. Compared with 13 boys dabbed with the placebo, the 14 treated with EMLA had much lower heart rates, by about 25 beats per minute, and fewer facial signs of distress.

In tests of 81 newborns, University of Alberta researchers also found that treated boys cried less, had lower heart rates, and had less sweat on their palms.

"These studies confirm that neonates undergoing circumcision have behavioural and physiological stress responses that can be diminished by dorsal pedal blocks or EMLA", said a paediatrician at Harvard University. He said several hospitals in the U.S. now do circumcisions using a local anaesthetic.

Female Circumcision

At the risk of stepping outside the boundary of Acorn interests, and after reading some letters from subscribers regarding female interest in male circumcision, it occurred to me that you may be interested in female interest in female circumcision.

For many years until about 10 years ago, I was involved in various types of body art, tattooing, body piercing, and wrote some reviews for national magazines. I have also carried out body piercings, mostly for women who saw beauty and attraction in having this distinctive form of body enhancement. In my activities I met women who were circumcised or appeared to be. Altogether, I knew 6 women who had decided to have their clitoris hood removed.

A dentist, aged about 35, living in North London, asked me to visit her to discuss a piercing in her labia. It is necessary to check the configuration of the area before advising on the possibilities, and I asked her to show me her vulva. She did so by raising her dress to waist height and holding the pubic area tightly upwards, which had the effect of retracting her clitoral hood and exposing a well-developed clitoris. In fact, so prominent was her clitoris that I asked her if she had had the hood removed. I was told not, but we entered a discussion on the possibility of having it removed. The result was that I gave her the name of a doctor friend who carried out male circumcisions, and some time later she wrote saying that she had been circumcised and was very pleased with the result, as was her husband.

Visiting a lady in the Preston area to discuss piercing, I was asked to wait while she prepared herself for examination. She had been wearing jeans when I called but she appeared some minutes later in a bathrobe, and when asked, opened it to show her piercing requirements. Reaching over to check, I was asked, "Please be gentle, I'm circumcised." Enquiring, I was told that she had been persuaded by her boyfriend, who was himself circumcised, to allow him to make a vertical incision through the clitoral hood, leaving it as two 'flaps' with the exposed clitoris between, and had at some later time removed the 'flaps' to tidy her up. She was fully exposed, no vestige of hood remaining. She too was very happy with her new condition, and had no regrets.

I had corresponded with a couple in Southern England the husband being partly circumcised, but unhappy that he was not completely uncovered. I gave him the address of my doctor friend, and later he wrote to tell me that he had had the remaining loose skin removed to form a radical circumcision. And also that, during the visit, his wife had asked the doctor whether it was possible for a woman to have her clitoris fully exposed, since she enjoyed having her hood retracted for greater sensation. No sooner said than done, and she too had her foreskin removed. As they were naturists, she told me that she took much pleasure in sitting in such a way that her vulva was open to view, showing her hoodless clitoris, and that had obviously been noticed by curious fellow naturists, but not remarked on to her.

A letter in Forum from a lady who said that she believed herself to be one of the very few English women to be circumcised, prompted me to contact her through the editor. I discovered that she was a wife and mother who had been dissatisfied because her foreskin would not remain retracted during sex because it was rather long and thick. Her husband carried out the operation, which she said was painless and quick, and now she felt liberated and free. Her circumcised clitoris had been noted by one of the doctors when she was in hospital having a baby, but he had not discussed it with her.

Following an article which I wrote for a magazine, I received a letter from an Australian lady, who told me that she had been circumcised by a local doctor after complaining about insensitivity. He concluded that she was 'hooded', which was his term for a clitoris which could not be retracted, possibly due to adhesions or malfunction of the glans and hood. Because she considered it vital to be able to correct her problem, she asked him to correct the accessibility of her clitoris, and he removed her foreskin completely. She was so delighted by the effect that she told her daughter, presumably teenage or older, and discussed the advantages with her.

Finally, a couple who had spent their lives in the Army overseas, now retired and settled in London, where they took up voluntary work for charities to fill in the time. They were referred to me because the wife had numerous body piercings and wished to find a jewellery maker. When in London I visited them and was invited to stay overnight. After dinner, during which the wife wore a long dress, we chatted, and she allowed the dress to fall open, revealing her body decorations. I was fascinated by the number and size of these and bent forward to see more closely. As she opened her thighs I was surprised to see that she had a very large clitoris which was totally uncovered by foreskin, and that she seemed to be happy for it to be seen. We discussed her history of sensual ornamentation, and finally I asked her when she had been circumcised. She simply said that many people had asked her about that, that it was a long story, and had happened a long time ago. I was told no more, but clearly she had had the hood totally and skilfully removed at some time, leaving a very prominent glans which she had no hesitation in touching, and which was obviously a feature of which she was proud.

During researching for articles, I have discovered a much wider interest in female circumcision than is commonly known. An American feature writer carried out investigations into female circumcision, a more frequent operation there than in Europe, perhaps as a counterpoint to American frequency of male circumcision. She met and talked to circumcised women, and because the general view of those done seemed to be very much in favour, she had herself circumcised, the better to understand the effect. She commented very favourably on the better sensation and contact that the bare glans offered.

Perhaps if the subject was aired in Acorn, other readers, possibly even female readers, might provide useful comments.

K.J.

P(r)ick Of The Week

A member has sent me another part of the uncircumcising subject. This time it was on the Radio 4 programme 'Pick of the Week', presented by John Peel, an aged-looking disc jockey. I won't go over the transcript of the broadcast again; suffice it to say that the interviewees were all unsatisfied customers of the medical profession.

What did come to light though, was John Peel's last remark. "You probably don't care to know this, but I am an uncircumcised person. I never thought of my circumcised school chums (I went to a boarding school in North Wales where we greeted each day with a cold plunge, so I knew which ones they were) as having been hurt or violated. Roundheads and cavaliers we called each other, laughing boyishly as we did. But looking back, I imagine that the roundheads felt some sense of loss at puberty and beyond."

Not only is that an addition to the status tables, but also shows again how all boys at school are interested in what the others have got.

D.A.

From America

I wrote the following piece a year or so ago for the magazine Sexyg, the human sexuality special interest group of American MENSA.

Recent accounts in Sexyg by men circumcised as adults appear to include an element of fantasy, played out, or possibly imagined ... eg. "a reflector was positioned so I could watch the procedure" – how did he get the doctor to agree to that? My own experience aged 21 was different. I thought I was in love for life with Sarah, a Jewish girl, who said that she could not agree to having sex because I was not circumcised. So I visited the university medical clinic, complained of a tight foreskin, and after a brief examination was offered and accepted circumcision, which was done the same day under a general anaesthetic. The recovery period of a couple of weeks was painful and certainly not erotic.

I now believe that Sarah had raised the subject as an easy way to postpone agreeing to sex, and was overwhelmed by the magnitude of what she had initiated. To her credit she never showed this, and in due course she did have sex with me. Unfortunately our relationship only lasted another 6 months or so. The experience left me with an above average (unhealthy?) interest in the subject. At school in England (where the above occurred), boys in the showers classified themselves as Roundheads and Cavaliers after the two sides in the Civil War. As far as I remember there were equal numbers.

The practice has declined in England, and when my son was born there, medical opinion advised firmly against. We didn't. Here in the U.S. it is apparently more common (75% of men in the Sexyg survey have had it done, and it is routinely offered to parents of newborn sons) despite the real if slight risk of injury. The Uncircumcised Society of America sent me a news item on a recent case of damage to the penis settled for 22 million dollars, and on TV 'L.A. Law' featured a similar case a while back. In a recent autobiography, the British politician Quentin Hogg describes how at the age of 7 he was taken to the doctor and, without warning or anaesthetic, subjected to surgical correction of a circumcision apparently inadequately performed at birth. However, this was 60 years ago. It reminded me of a boy at school who was circumcised (for the first time) when his mother got remarried to a Muslim man, who insisted on it during a vacation trip to visit relatives in Pakistan. He was about 14.

As a man who has experienced life both before and after, I don't think it makes a lot of difference to any activity, sexual or otherwise. If you are into mutilation as a sexual stimulus it is probably one of the few socially acceptable possibilities, apart from pierced ears, but this is obviously no reason to do either of them to infants. The medical grounds seem open to dispute. The one physical change I have detected is a noticeable reduction in the sensitivity of the glans (but would this have happened anyway as one gets older?). The base of the glans, which is more protected from abrasion by clothing, is now much more sensitive than the tip. My urologist told me recently that this is, "quite common, nothing to worry about". (A matter of opinion.) Interestingly he also said that the most common age for circumcision, after birth, is in the early twenties. I wonder why?

On balance, given the chance over again, I would not have had it done, but I probably wouldn't have had it done then if they'd given me more time to think about it.

C.E. – Georgia

[Quentin Hogg being another addition to the list.

D.A.]

Trapped Tip

Guys under 30 who have long beautiful foreskins and want to keep them that way should watch out for the 'trapped tip'. This happens when the foreskin is retracted over the glans when urinating or for some other reason. When it is rolled forward again the weighted tip may fold under the foreskin as it is rolled forward over the glans, often leaving the meatus exposed. This is the start of a short foreskin, and if not attended to will get shorter as time goes on.

The remedy is with the thumb and index finger. A slight tug at the bottom lip of the foreskin is generally adequate to bring the tip out to its natural pointed position. A lot of men do this, and that is why you see some men with foreskins as nature intended them to be, and others with the skin covering none,  $\frac{1}{4}$ ,  $\frac{1}{2}$ , or  $\frac{3}{4}$  of the glans.

If anyone would like to write to me on this subject I promise to answer.

I was reading in Bud Berkeley's book Foreskin – A Closer Look which is on sale over here now, that it said 'docking' is the 'in' thing in America at the present time.

It brings together the natural and the cut guys, where the uncircumcised can share his foreskin by docking it over the bare glans of the cut guy. This must give the circumcised a lot of pleasure and knowledge of what a foreskin feels like. It advises to uncouple before either ejaculates.

There is quite a lot about foreskin reconstruction in the book, a subject also written about in the last issue of Acorn.

H.J.M. – Mid-Glamorgan.

[Perhaps, H.J., you could let us know where to obtain the book.

D.A.]

Satisfied Customer

I first discovered circumcision when I was 7 years old, staying at a school friend's house for the weekend. Tony was the same age as myself and had a younger brother of 6. As kids will do, we decided to play in the garden. A canal ran at the bottom of his garden and of course we ended up getting very wet and dirty. We went back into the house and his mother immediately said that we were to have a bath to wash ourselves. When the bath had been drawn we were told to get in together, which we did. It was then that I noticed that Tony's penis was very different to mine. I asked him what had happened to it and he replied that he had been 'cut' the previous year. He said that he was very pleased to have been done and that, in fact, his brother Peter had only been cut earlier that week, and if we were demanding enough he would show it to me.

I was fascinated by this since I had always wanted to be like my father who was also cut. After much bullying of Peter he dropped his shorts to show us his newly circumcised penis. It looked very sore, but the most interesting thing was that he had had a really radical circumcision. The skin was incredibly tight. Tony then got his out to compare it with Peter's, and the difference was very marked, his being much looser and had a slight overhang left. Tony said that he wished he'd been cut the same way as Peter, as he was still finding that bits of dirt collected in the creases left.

I went to a public school in 1970 and it was there that I discovered that I was, in fact, in the minority who still had their foreskins, over 80% having been circumcised by the time that they went to the school (age around 10). Over the next ten years or so I tried everything to keep my foreskin trained back, but to no avail. I left in 1980 and it was then that I got my first job, and the spending power to get myself circumcised. However I didn't know how or where to start! My doctor said that he felt that there was no way that he could recommend me to the NHS, and would not tell me about any other ways that I could get it done.

In 1990 I was on holiday in Canada when I found in the local Yellow Pages an advert for cosmetic surgery. I rang the number and asked them if they were able to perform circumcisions on adult males. They said yes, at a cost of $350. I immediately made an appointment to go and see the surgeon. I went in and met the man who was to do the operation, and had what I can only describe as the most detailed discussion on what I wanted. I said that I wanted to have a very radical circumcision done and the frenum removed. He agreed to do this and asked me where I wanted the resulting scar to be on the shaft. He explained that the position of this altered the way things looked afterwards, the lower down the shaft the less tighter the result, and the greater likelihood that I would have crinkles on the shaft. I said that I would like it about one inch beneath the rim, but he said that he would prefer to place it closer. I therefore decided that I would leave it to him to decide.

The day came and I arrived at the clinic at 9am. I was told to strip and lie on the operating table. The surgeon came in and went through the requirements again to make sure that I hadn't changed my mind. He then injected the area and whilst it was taking effect he drew out the lines where he was going to make the cut. He said that I could watch him doing it if I wished, to which I readily agreed, and got into a sitting position. He first pulled my foreskin forward and clamped it. After a couple of minutes he simply cut the overhanging skin away with a knife. He then released the clamp and gently pushed the skin back over the glans. He then decided that not enough had been removed, got out a pen and marked out where he would cut again, this time by hand. He asked me if things looked tight enough for me. I was so keen to be cut as tight as possible that I said no, could he make things even tighter? He said he would but decided that to get everything right it would be necessary to reclamp it. This of course was quite difficult, but he eventually succeeded. Again, a simple slice came off and the returning of the skin to position behind the glans.

Time had arrived to remove the frenum. This was remarkably simple and he removed it completely, no bits left at all. I was then stitched back together and bandaged up. I was told not to remove it for two days and then to soak it off in a warm bath which had a quantity of Savlon in it. The stitches would be removed in 10 days.

The two days passed without any great discomfort and I took the long awaited bath. I was very disturbed by what was revealed, my penis bruised and swollen beyond all recognition. However, after a week it had recovered to the point where I could start to judge the end result. I was truly thrilled. I had the exact result that I had asked for. Needless to say I couldn't wait to try and see if everything was still in good working order. The first erection is one which I will never forget, the feelings of tightness being fantastic, and yes, everything did work. I went back to the clinic and had the stitches out two days before I left for home, the surgeon very pleased that everything had healed so well. He told me that he had never done such a tight circumcision before, but he felt that the result was so good that he would try to make it his standard practise in future.

Well, that's my story. I am still delighted with the result, the shaft still very smooth and tight, whilst the glans has expanded greatly in width. All in all, I don't think that I could have asked or got a better job done.

I.T. – Gwent

'Rabbit At Rest'

A book worth reading, which is a positive compendium of comment on the penile condition, is 'Rabbit at Rest' by John Updike.

Rabbit is the old nickname of Harry Angstrom, a Swedish-American with the full range of penile accessories, and some of the points bear out recent thinking in the States. The first inkling you get of Harry's status is when he explains that, in middle age now, he usually pees sitting down, because at night his foreskin tends to get folded over and his directional delivery becomes as uncertain as a woman's. Is this likely? I'd have thought that a simple thumbing back would avoid the inconvenience of the ignominious female crouch.

Later, Harry sees that his young grandson is circumcised and wonders how he would feel about it if he himself were circumcised. He remembers reports in newspapers saying that the foreskin provides protection like the eyelid: when it is removed the glans becomes less sensitive, more thick skinned and dull. A guy circumcised in mid-life found that his sexual pleasure and responsiveness went so far down that his "circumcised life was no longer worth living". Harry wonders whether he himself would have been a more dependable human being if he had been less sexually responsive and not so crazy to have his 'eye' opened down there: "getting a hard-on you can feel the foreskin gently tug back like freezing cream lifting the paper cap on an old-time milk bottle". From the numb look of his penis, his grandson will be a solid citizen.

Harry's lady love is the wife of a circumcised 'friend', and one of the things she loves about Harry is his uncircumcised penis. She teases him about his 'bonnet' and insists on seeing it when Harry has to go away because it looks so cute with its 'bonnet' on – so different from her husband's.

So John Updike makes it plain that he does not approve of circumcision, although nowhere does he or any of his characters say so. You are left wondering if he has been done himself or if he takes his descriptions from personal experience. As one who has regrettably spent his life 'preputially challenged', I am in no position to say. Perhaps someone who is fully equipped can hazard an opinion?

R.B.W. – Bedford

[R.B. also sent in a letter on uncircumcising which was covered in the last issue, but he does make the point that, with all the furore and excitement engendered by the book, he finds it a real comfort to know that he's not in the tiny eccentric minority that some people would believe him to be. D.A.]

ACORN

1993 Issue No 8

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Posthumous Circumcision		Page 2
An Odd Muslim	Al-Sayyad	Page 3
Genital Hygiene	E.S.	Page 4
Yes and No	M.E.	Page 7
More Penis-state Disagreements	R.H.	Page 8
Mother's Story	Sue	Page 9
And the Opposite View	Doris	Page 11
Advert – Treat Yourself	B.G.	Page 13
Members' Meeting	Brian	Page 13
Contact Corner	R.W.	Page 14
A Christmas Message	R.B.W.	Page 14

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1993 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

See last page.

D.A.

Posthumous Circumcision

Item in The Independent, 17/8/93 sent in by R.B.W. – Bedford.

In one of the more macabre issues dividing religious and secular Jews in Israel, a dispute has arisen over the circumcision of Jewish corpses.

Strictly observant Jews will not permit tampering with deceased bodies. The ultra-Orthodox forbid autopsies and the transplant of organs from the dead. But rabbis generally agree that removal of the foreskin may be performed even on a corpse. The newspaper, Ha'aretz, reported that a number of corpses of recently arrived Soviet Jews had been circumcised. Jews in the former Soviet Union were rarely able to fulfil Jewish ritual practises such as circumcision – normally carried out on the 8th day after birth – for fear of persecution. 90% of recent Russian male immigrants are uncircumcised and are under pressure to prove their 'Jewishness' by going under the knife. But many have declined – not least because of the pain. (No anaesthetic?)

Under Jewish law – Halacha – all Jews must be circumcised or, after death, "their soul will not enter the garden of Eden", as a former chief rabbi put it yesterday. "We only want to assure the corpse has no cause for shame at the time of his death. Even the British Royal family carries out circumcision..."

As increasing numbers of new Russian immigrants die in Israel, the question of whether to circumcise the corpse has become urgent. The job has been carried out by religious Jews charged with the ritual preparation of bodies for burial according to a reporter from Ha'aretz, citing sources at the Haifa burial society and the Religious Affairs Ministry.

His report has caused uproar. Ran Cohen, a member of parliament for the left-wing secular party Meretz has called for an inquiry by the Attorney-General. "It is a filthy practice. I am utterly ashamed that anyone in my country has done this kind of thing. It is against human rights. It is against the dignity of the dead person. It is an insult to the new immigrants from the former Soviet Union," he said.

But Rabbi Shlomo Goren also a former chief rabbi attacked Mr. Cohen as a 'leftist' and a 'spy'.

[And we worry about what goes on in our parliament.

D.A.]

An Odd Muslim

As a Sayyad (direct descendent of the Prophet) my Islamic credentials are not in question. But they would be if anyone could see inside my underpants! I am one of the very rare cases of a Muslim evading the requirement of circumcision, and I feel that your readers might benefit from knowing how it came about and how it has affected my life.

An adult Muslim who remains uncircumcised is in a state of 'aib' (shame) and according to the Hadith (but not the Koran) should be circumcised at the first opportunity, forcibly if need be. Since I don't relish being waylaid by a bunch of hairy fundamentalists, circumcised with a penknife and left to bleed to death in an alley, you'll forgive me if I give a false name and address.

I was born to immigrant parents but the doctor, who was British, refused my parents' request for circumcision. Since it is quite in order for Muslim boys to be done later in life, the in-laws accepted my parents' promise to have me circumcised before puberty. In the meantime I was happy, proud even, to have a foreskin like my classmates, and to avoid the taunting meted out to the two other Muslim boys in the school, who had been circumcised at birth. They got their own back by reminding me that my turn would come, and the older you were the more it hurt. So as I approached my eleventh year, still in possession of a long Asiatic foreskin, I was in fear and dread of the mutahhir's knife, which I knew would be applied without prior warning so as to avoid anxiety.

As luck would have it, both sets of in-laws moved abroad, and my father got a posting to an area with a nil Muslim population. My parents (and I!) breathed a sigh of relief, the in-laws were told that the deed had been done, I was allowed to keep my foreskin, and my parents conveniently forgot about it.

The only action from me was one of relief at not having to suffer the searing pain of an operation most of my fellow Britons shun in this day and age. As far as the religious side was concerned boys of eleven don't think too much about religious ordinances, especially if there's no Koranis school to go to.

The next hurdle was marriage. Most Muslim girls would run screaming to mother if they found their new husband was uncircumcised (as chronicled in Alf Laila wa Laila – The Thousand and One Nights). But girls in this country have been exposed to lax and easy Western ways, so that, despite the rigid chastity laws for females, some even go to the marriage bed de-virginated, many of them having gone out and had sex with uncircumcised boys. This is another status of shame which concerns the Muslim community very greatly. The number of Asian girls who pose for nude magazines or become strippers, is a pointer to the sort of temptation which a lot of girls find irresistible, and is also a particular cause for concern. This is why so many are sent back to the country of origin to marry a local, and to keep them out of temptation's way.

I was lucky. I found a Muslim girl who was thoroughly Westernised, shared my Western values, but who was still a staunch Muslim and a virgin. However, she had secretly had a couple of boyfriends at school whose uncircumcised penises she had explored and handled whilst steadfastly preserving her virginity. She consequently knew all about foreskins, and when I anxiously admitted my uncircumcised condition to her, she was amused rather than horrified. I warned her not to mention it to her parents, and so we embarked on matrimony in a state of sublime, sinful uncircumcision, and no one was the wiser.

Circumcision to a Muslim means a state of purity (Tahur), but that applies to religious purity rather than cleanliness, which most Muslims are fussy about anyway (I wash my parts every time I use them). The fact that it is not mentioned in the Koran can be, and has been, quoted as a reason for not being too serious about it: for instance, it is rumoured that a group of high ranking Saudis who, because of prior rigid upbringing and deprivation tend to prize sexual pleasure and sensuality above all things, have secretly avoided the practice of circumcision so as to increase sexual response! They apparently square this with themselves by being prepared to submit to the mutahhir if rumbled, claiming a parental oversight, but hoping to get away with it for as long as possible.

I have come to accept my foreskin as an integral part of my body, and my wife, if anything, is quite keen that I should remain uncircumcised. The problem now is what to do about our son who is coming up to three and is also uncircumcised. Ruqiya has a large circle of Western friends who all have uncircumcised children, and we see no reason not to conform. Therefore we would both be happy to see our son keep his foreskin and explain to him when he is old enough that he may have to lose it if he doesn't keep it to himself. After all these years I've come to the conclusion that circumcision is easily avoidable for a Muslim who wants to keep his foreskin whilst otherwise adhering to Islam, provided he makes the necessary adjustment to his religious principles, stays in the West, and keeps only discreet – and appreciative – female company.

Al-Sayyad Abdul-Razzaq Muhammad

Genital Hygiene

One of the main issues which arises in the circumcision controversy is genital hygiene, and to my knowledge the matter has yet to be discussed in depth. The point that needs to be made is that until recently it was a subject which received little attention from either sex. Male hygiene was singled out as being attainable by circumcision, but nothing much was said about the much greater problems presented by the female genital system, with its intricate folds of skin through which urine has to pass from a urethra buried deep within them. Moreover, the female's urine, which is expelled with considerably more force than the male's due to a shorter passage from the bladder, contaminates the whole of her outer genital area including the inner lips, clitoris tip and outer lips, by which it is often deflected so that it emerges in more than one stream or a haphazard spray which more often than not wets her thighs as well. The male's urethra on the other hand is either exposed so that no part of the external genitals is wetted or else the urine passes through a few millimetres of uncomplicated skin tubing, with the area to the rear of the urethra only getting wetted if a back pressure is created by a tight foreskin or by pinching the tip.

It was a convention that female hygiene was a far too delicate subject to talk about, and besides, girls automatically take more trouble than boys in such matters. This may be true to a large extent, but it's by no means a rule you can rely on, and if lack of genital hygiene is considered serious enough to warrant a surgical operation for a boy, we must be prepared to discuss it in women, distasteful though it may be.

It's quite easy of course for a girl to effect some degree of hygiene by the careful use of toilet paper every time she takes a pee, but how many actually do? Men who grew up with sisters big or small will know that little girls don't bother, and there can be no doubt that some of your less fussy ones become adults without finding it necessary to acquire the habit of mopping up after a slash. This reminds me of the contrast of those American films bold enough to portray a lady sitting on a loo taking a leak (I've seen two so far) where she invariably uses toilet paper afterwards, with the British film 'A Letter to Brezhnev', in which you get an overhead view of the girls' cubicle where they take it in turns to have a pee. Each girl raises her skirt, does what is necessary and then gets up drops her clothes and walks out. The comment on this contrast is that the Yanks are known to be obsessed by 'hygiene' whereas the British girls (who hailed from Liverpool) not only couldn't care less about it but didn't wear knickers either! The question is, so what? Is obsession with hygiene justified from the medical point of view, or any other?

Before I answer it, perhaps I'd better explain how I acquired all this know-how about feminine functions. As a student in the sixties I spent a term in digs, and the landlady was a delightful but eccentric middle-aged woman. She was a bohemian who made all her own clothes, mostly long dresses gypsy fashion or patchwork quilts, wore flowers and headbands, and took art lessons. She admitted to be 'between husbands' but had lots of men friends whom she entertained in her room with loud music. She was a cheerful sunny person and once you got over her health fads and obsession with nature, she was basically a nice individual. She was also totally uninhibited and didn't hesitate to come into the bathroom whilst I was having a bath if she needed a leak. With a merry shout of, "No peeking, mind!", she lifted her long dress and petticoats up around her waist to reveal an enormous rug of pubic hair (she didn't believe in knickers), before adopting a semi-crouch, knees slightly bent, and releasing an astounding cascade of urine into the pan, grinning disarmingly at me throughout. From my full-frontal vantage point I remember being enthralled – and disgusted – at how untidily the torrent emerged from her nether lips, quite a lot of it being deflected to run off the cheek of her backside or splashing her thigh. When she'd finished she merely stepped forward and dropped her skirt, saying, "I needed that. You didn't mind, did you?", and walking out without a reply.

She had a powerful sexuality too, because when she and I occasionally spent the evening in without visitors, she would always turn the subject round to sex and ask me embarrassing questions about my sex life. She also wheedled me into posing for her still life contribution, and asked me if I minded stripping off. I agreed with enthusiasm, whereupon she asked, "You're not circumcised, are you?" I shook my head dumbly, whereupon she had me take up a pose on the couch. She drew with rapid strokes, encouraging me with flattering remarks about my build, and explaining that her art mistress preferred uncircumcised models for the 'classical nude'. As I laid there I could feel her eyes on my penis, and to my horror it started twitching itself up into an erection. Her eyes lit up and she immediately packed in her first drawing and started doing another for her 'private collection'. When this was finished she gave me a wrap and joined me on the couch for a drink. She commented on my erection and asked me if I was feeling randy. "What do you think?" I asked and she said that she felt a bit that way too. She then opened up my wrap and started handling my penis to test its rigidity. When satisfied that it was up to standard she lifted her long dress to reveal her bare groin, and put my hand over her vulva with the comment that "a little wank would be nice – helps you sleep."

This mutual exchange of pleasuring became a frequent occurrence, although she never permitted it to progress to the full sex act. But to return to the genital hygiene business. In the days of the weekly bath and no showers, it was very noticeable that her personal perfume grew stronger as the week progressed. It was also noticeable that if our mutual manipulation took place immediately after she'd taken a pee the top of her thighs as well as the whole of her genital region was soaking wet right from the start, not to be confused with the moisture of arousal. This is not to say I found it distasteful – on the contrary I found it highly exciting, but I'm not sure if I'd relished the idea of oral sex with her. In those days though, it was still considered a character defect even among the most liberated of young people.

Which brings me to the point of this story – does genital hygiene matter? My view is that medically it doesn't matter a damn, although now that oral sex has become acceptable, probably under the impulse of porno videos which seem to get their message across on a heavy diet of fellatio and cunnilingus, there's an obvious gain in acceptability from frequent washing. I was not too fussy myself as a younger man and rarely washed under my foreskin more than once a week, although I did use spit to ensure that it didn't get offensive in between times. I never suffered any problems and was never criticised by my numerous girlfriends – who largely shared my own standards. I think the benefits of genital hygiene should not be over-emphasised.

E.S. – Kent

Yes And No

I've been fascinated by circumcision ever since schooldays. Although at junior school I recall a fellow pupil telling me that he was going to be circumcised, I was rather puzzled by the term, and had no real idea of what it might mean. It wasn't until secondary school that I remember catching my first, intriguing, glimpses of 'cut' lads in the showers – and afterwards taking every opportunity to see more of that mysterious difference. My impression is that roundheads were definitely in the minority: I can recall only about half a dozen amongst the 30 or so boys who made up my year-group in games.

Time went on, and – with one very good college friend who was radically cut, and who expressed extreme disdain for foreskins in general ("Nasty, smelly things!") – my admiration for the circumcised guy increased.

Now, in my early thirties, I find myself at last with the wherewithal to get the job done on myself. Joining Acorn has certainly helped me to clarify my thoughts about the Big Difference. For me, questions of hygiene and cleanliness are secondary. As far as I'm concerned it all comes down to appearance: I much prefer the look of a nicely circumcised dick – it seems neater and tidier. I also think there's something much more mature about the appearance of the cut organ: for me, somehow, foreskins are things that boys have: real men are roundheads. I think the enlarged glans, enjoyed by men circumcised in early life, is a real plus point, and I suppose there's a sense, too, of the rite-of-passage involved in becoming circumcised – in becoming a member of that select group of men who have had their cocks cut.

All of which might lead you to believe that I'm about to become a fully-paid-up ex-foreskin possessor myself. I'm not and the nub of the problem is wanking. The one (the only?) advantage of a foreskin, it seems to me, is that wanking becomes a very straightforward operation. I realise that, for someone who's been cut all their life, a decent wank is probably just as simple: it's all just a question of what you're used to. But that, really is my point: if I lost my foreskin now I'd have to learn an entirely unfamiliar way of tossing myself off. Having experimented, I find I can in fact wank with a retracted foreskin, manipulating the shaft of the penis alone, with reduced stimulation of the glans, and produce an orgasm. But I tend to find – again purely from a personal point of view that the climax is less satisfactory – I get less sensation in these circumstances than with the foreskin forward. This poses rather a dilemma: I find the thought of circumcision and being circumcised extremely stimulating – but, if I were to be done myself, I might well find myself in less of a position to enjoy the results than I'd been before. I suppose this is one argument in favour of circumcision at birth – or at least before adolescence – since, in my case, I'd at least have grown up fully used to the position. As it is, I don't know what the answer is...

M.E. – London

More Penis-state Disagreements

Further to my first letter on the subject of the reliability of the list of famous (issue 3/93) and the new lists in issue 4, I have the following comments to add:

David Hockney is circumcised as anyone who saw him undress and get into the shower in his film 'A Bigger Splash' will know. It seems unlikely, if President Kennedy was cut as an adult, that his two younger brothers are also cut. Were they, too, done as adults? Ringo Starr I have always understood to have been Jewish, so wouldn't have a foreskin: and Little Richard has recently become a Muslim, so must be cut now if he wasn't already so.

Putting in well-known Jews into the cut category is really rather pointless, and how on earth do people find out about the state of these celebs. when it is hardly a fact people reveal on chat shows, and male nudity is shunned amongst the famous. [According to the compiler the information is gained mostly from schoolmates, showers in sports and fitness centres, blow-ups of clips of films, nude magazines and gay relationships. – D.A.]

I recently visited the nudist beach at Studland in Dorset. It was a first for me as a naturist, and after initial trepidation I am now a convert and enthusiast. One thing I noticed as I walked the beach and dunes was that the ratio of circumcised was very much higher than one is lead to believe by this magazine, nationally. At least 3 to 1, I would say, and that was not falling for the always very obvious foreskin pulled back chaps. It was so in all generations except sadly amongst small children, which doesn't bode well for the future. It was particularly prevalent in the age group 18-30. Would I be right in suggesting this is so because naturists, being so body conscious, get themselves cut in adulthood. From the many foreskins pulled back, being a roundhead is obviously desirable with naturists. A young man lying near me in the dunes had clearly been recently cut, as there were the tell-tale nicks and bumps where the stitches had been tied. With all the sand about, I for one was glad I had had myself done, as I well remember that even with swimming trunks sand and foreskins don't get along – just as the Jews and the Arabs recognised all those thousands of years ago.

R.H. – London

Mother's Story

I grew up quite unaware of circumcision. As it was the family custom for all of us to walk round naked upstairs, I saw my father's and brothers' foreskinned penises from an early age, but never saw them retracted. As they matched the willies I saw in nude paintings and on nude statues, I had no reason to think that men could look otherwise.

By the time I was twenty I had experienced several penises, and learned that their foreskins could be pulled back (in some cases with difficulty), to reveal a sensitive, sticky and often smelly bud underneath. Intercourse had proved a disappointment too, because my partners always seemed to spurt within a few seconds of entering, leaving me frustrated.

Then I met Steve, an American serviceman stationed over here. I was really keen on him and after our second date asked him home 'for coffee'. Of course I had an ulterior motive – and a stroke of good luck, as the rest of the family were abroad on holiday leaving the house to me.

As I'd hoped, we were soon laid out in a clinch on the settee and I felt his hand working into my panties, so took my cue to unzip him and explore inside his jockeys. At first, when I touched him, I thought the cheeky chappie had anticipated my plan and rolled his foreskin back in readiness, but as I searched further I found that there was no foreskin! Overall, his penis was no larger than others I'd encountered, but the big mushroom head certainly felt very different. It was sort of silky smooth with a very pronounced rim at the base and no connecting strap of skin in the groove underneath. Before I could investigate this, he was at the point where he was wanting to enter me and I was quite eager to let him.

What a fabulous sensation I received! – quite unlike anything I'd had before. I could distinctly feel the contour of his helmet inside me, and even more so when from time to time he pulled out and ran it up and down my crease. Best of all, he lasted ages, and I must have had three or four orgasms before he let go.

Afterwards I suggested we take a shower together, and during that I knelt down and gave him a 'blowjob'. This afforded me a close-up on this mysterious new penis and I saw evidence of scarring and stitching, making me realise he'd had some sort of operation. I was too shy and polite to mention it, and also I didn't want to spoil the mood of the moment which was quite thrilling. Whatever had happened to his willy seemed to be for the better!

A few days later I met cousin Carole. She's around my age and we've always been close and discussed some of our intimate sexual experiences, so I told her about my latest. As she is also a nurse, I thought she might be able to offer some information about what may have been done to Steve's knob. She giggled and then gave me chapter and verse on circumcision! How strange such information had bypassed me. I felt I'd led a sheltered life.

Fortunately I fell in love with Steve as well as what was left of his willy, and a couple of years later we were married, expecting our first child, and living in the U.S. Our son was born in the base hospital where circumcision seemed to be routine. Those of us with male babies were given consent forms but they seemed to be a formality. None in my group considered opting out, and those I asked had circumcised partners and thought it odd that I should question it. Accordingly, I followed the herd, and our babies were duly Plastibelled just before we were discharged.

The device fell off as advertised, leaving a lovely neat result reminiscent of his dad – what more could I ask? A few weeks later my mother flew out to see her new grandson and quite naturally wanted to bath him. I'll never forget the expression on her face when she removed his diaper. "What on earth has happened to his little winkle?" she asked. I told her about the Plastibell, whereupon she reprimanded me for agreeing to such a thing, and said that I'd ruined him for life and spoiled his future partner's fun too! It didn't go down too well when I told her about Steve being done and my preference for it thereby admitting my earlier promiscuity. In the end she had to agree to differ and the subject has remained off limits for discussion between us ever since.

Shortly after, Steve completed his service contract and joined an American computer firm who, following initial training, sent him to England as a technical troubleshooter, and we've been settled here these last three years.

Our second son was delivered in a city NHS hospital. It seemed best that he should be circumcised to match his brother, but when I requested it I was sharply rebuffed and told that it should never be done without medical need. Our paediatrician was no more helpful either, so we decided to have him done on our next visit to the States. In the event, this kept being postponed and I became anxious that my baby would reach an age when he would be more aware and find it painful.

I confided in cousin Carole again and, through her hospital contacts, she provided the name of a doctor who did home circumcisions privately at £150. Unfortunately when the appointment came around Steve was away on a course and I had to cope alone as assistant to the doctor. Perhaps it was just as well, because Steve is quite squeamish about such things! I enlisted the aid of a friend to come and mind my eldest child and answer the door or phone bells, then stood anxiously by as the doctor set out his stall on the kitchen table.

I confess to only half watching the procedure as I held my child. It was all terribly swift, but the event did give me two pangs of half regret. The first came as my baby screamed the moment he was cut and I knew the deed was done with no going back. Then afterwards, when the doctor had dressed the wound, left care instructions and departed, I cleared up and came across the discarded foreskin. As I picked it up I gazed sadly at it and reflected that I'd just altered irreversibly the life experience of my son and any of his future partners.

All went well in the healing process, but he took longer to do so and settle down than his Plastibelled elder brother had. Unlike their father, both boys seem to have most of the frenum remaining, and both show a very small collar of skin behind the rim. Their acorns are fully exposed however, and neither collar will push forward at all.

I've gathered that, outside of the Jewish and Muslim communities, my sons are something of a rarity in Britain today, but as we may one day return to live in the U.S., I'm glad they're circ'd.

Their 'status' does seem to be spotted quickly by other women here. I've taken them to a mother and toddler group since last summer, where they were allowed to splash around naked in an inflatable paddling pool with the other kids. I felt proud when I saw how cute their penises looked compared with those on their contemporaries. Several mums passed favourable comment, some asking for details of how and why I'd had them done. Although I told them, I don't know if any of them have gone ahead on their own sons.

Sue

And The Opposite View

I was very depressed when my husband died a few years ago and was sure that I'd never enjoy another relationship. I don't suppose I would, either, if it hadn't been for my friend Beryl who works in the same typing pool. She's a big outspoken blonde lady and in her forties like me, but has an earthy sense of humour and always has a string of men friends on the go. Last summer she got me to join her at a holiday camp, and the highlight was when we went to the male stripper show. I've never been to anything like it before and was rather nervous, but Beryl said it was terrific fun and I'd really enjoy it. I wasn't so sure, but anyway, after sinking several lager and limes, I felt ready for anything, but it still came as a shock to see this well-built young fellow cavorting about as he stripped to a tiny well-filled jockstrap with sequins all over it.

I was shocked, to put it mildly, when the ladies all round me, quite a lot of them my age or older, started shouting "Gerremoff" and chanting, "We want winkle". I never thought for a moment that he really would, but the lights all went out except for a spotlight while he pranced about, hooking his thumbs through his G-string, before finally taking it off with a flourish and shaking his great fat willy at us. The ladies all screamed their approval, but some of the comments were quite awful. There's no doubt that British womanhood is in a class of its own at a do like this. Some of them were standing on their chairs, and a couple of the younger girls at the front took their knickers off and threw them at him. What a scream though! Beryl was one of the worst, making rude remarks about cucumbers and bananas, but then bellowed out, "Look at the foreskin on him, Doris. Makes you realise what you were missing with your old man, doesn't it?"

I should have been shocked, but as Beryl said, I knew he'd made a pass at some of the women in the office, and they all had a laugh about it. What shook me though, was that he'd been successful enough for the girls to find out that he'd been circumcised. Anyway, by now I was feeling in the mood, and couldn't have cared less about my husband's little games. I thought about what Beryl had said, and told her I'd never seen a foreskin on a grown man before. She hooted with laughter and shouted, "Never seen a foreskin? You haven't lived till you've peeled a man's banana for him! Never mind, you never know your luck." She was dead right, because a little while later, the male stripper, still nude with his willy wagging about all over the place, was now at the next table doing unspeakable things like dangling it in one lady's liebfraumilch, and then coming up behind another and flopping it over her shoulder. We were all screaming with joy at such rude behaviour.

Then he came to our table and stood over Beryl, slowly swinging his huge organ in front of her face, and grinning lecherously at us. I had a feeling Beryl was going to do something awful and I wasn't disappointed! She suddenly leaned forward, grabbing his balls in her left hand to keep him still, whilst with her right she pulled the skin on his penis right back to expose his big red policeman's helmet. The guy's smile didn't waver, but as the spotlight hastily moved away, he hissed through his teeth, "Leave it out you silly cow! You'll get me arrested."

Afterwards I was talking to Beryl and asked her about foreskins, since I'd only seen them on small boys, and had no experience otherwise. I was ever so curious because I'd remembered overhearing two girls talking in the loo, and one of them was saying how much she enjoyed making her boyfriend tremble by pulling his skin down. Beryl was rather impatient though, and said it was time I found out for myself.

A short time ago she introduced me to a nice man, several years my junior, but we seemed to hit it off. The next day she asked me if I'd found out all I wanted to know about foreskins yet! I hadn't then, but very soon did. In comparison with my husband who'd been very tightly clipped, my new man seems to have a tremendous amount of surplus movable skin covering his whole penis. When it's forward, and all sleek and smooth, I think it looks very nice. I prefer not to have the knob on show all the time, and I find it is a pleasure to handle. As far as performance is concerned, I've heard people say that the foreskin serves no useful purpose in this day and age. I can't really agree. All that movable skin is tailor-made for a fellow (or his girlfriend) to move up and down, and giving a wank is so much more rewarding. I'm sure that's the real reason for men having foreskins. Whereas my circumcised husband disliked manual sex, my new man says he started wanking as far back as he can remember, and he really gets off on it. His aunt once told his mum that he ought to be circumcised to stop him masturbating. Nowadays wanking is not considered harmful, so perhaps that's why they've stopped circumcising little boys.

Doris – Kent

Treat Yourself To An Unusual Present

Circumcision Videos and Videos On Acorn Related Topics, Together with Books, Articles and Other Interesting Material — Now Available.

Books include the newly published 'Foreskin – A Closer Look' by Bud Berkeley. This book, which is always fascinating, explains how circumcision has been carried out for many reasons over the centuries in various parts of the world, and also explores some medical and aesthetic considerations/observations etc.....A veritable goldmine.

You will not regret your decision!!

Send for further details with large S.A.E. included to:-

Barry Griffiths
582A, Lordship Lane
Wood Green
London
N22 5BY

Male Acorn Members' Meeting 1994

There will be a get-together in Bournemouth at the end of March 1994. We have exclusive use of a hotel for the night of Saturday, March 26th., when Acorn related topics can be discussed without the worry of 'flapping ears' and/or 'odd looks'. What would you like to discuss?

So far the following people are going to be there: myself, P.H. of Milton Keynes, V.Q. of London, B.G. of London, I.W. of Wimborne, J.B.T. of Westcliffe-on-Sea, and David Acorn.

For more details write to me, Brian of the West Country, care of Acorn. All definite bookings will require a £10 deposit towards the hotel bill, which members will be expected to settle themselves. B & B is £15.50, so with an evening meal the bill should be less than £25.

Brian

Contact Corner

New member, partly circumcised at 24, fully done at 44, would like to correspond with other members on the subject particularly with women.

R.W. – Surrey

Christmas Message

The leaves have all gone, the nights are drawing in, and it's time to wish all Acorn readers a Happy Christmas – across the spectrum – in order of priority though.

To those lucky bastards with foreskins, who write in to crow about them, my message is – I should be so lucky! Any inference that they should go boil their heads is pure sour grapes and really, I rejoice in their good fortune.

To those who, like me, detest the whole concept of circumcision and deplore the wrong that was done them – buy Jim Bigelow's book, 'The Joy of Uncircumcising'. The message is one of sympathy, but expressing anger helps.

To those roundheads who couldn't care less either way I ask, really? No curiosity about what you're missing? Totally happy that others should carve bits off you without permission? Are you then a sexually aware person? Good luck to you anyway. You're probably better off than those who eat their hearts out.

Now we come to the 'Wannabees'. If you've got a functioning foreskin and think you'd like to be a roundhead, first disconnect your prejudices, put your mind into gear, and think again. If you still want to be circumcised, save a few bob, find the right circumciser (courtesy of Acorn), and Bob's your uncle – problem solved. But spare a thought for those who didn't have the choice.

For those of you who've had the chop and want a bit more off, the same applies. I suppose some people will never be satisfied!

Finally, those who crow about having their unfortunate children done and prescribe universal mutilation for all kids in general – my message is – go find a millstone and do what the good book says.

It now remains to thank David for doing a fine job, with a few comments, as I think that feedback is essential.

Firstly, my regret that the ladies didn't take up the invitation from 'Anon' to write in with their views on circumcision. I do find the continual expression of opinion as incontrovertible fact, and the dreary narratives and 'personal experiences' ending in the all-too predictable outcome, by men of both persuasions, deadily in the extreme.

As others have said, the ladies seem to take a more objective view, and I for one find their contributions entertaining, whichever cause they support. Hope they don't give up altogether.

A slight whinge, but worth mentioning. Having decided to drop sagas, we then get page after page, in issue after issue, devoted to.....wanking! Although it's more difficult for the preputially deprived, most people learn spontaneously as they hit puberty, and then give it up when they discover girls. I'm sure our learned contributor could find a more inspiring subject.

So that's it – a good year, but let us guard against tedious introspection. I enjoyed the newspaper cuttings you published, and outsiders' views are always refreshing. Anyone interested in attending a circumcision seminar in California next spring? I can get the details from my contacts over there if necessary. A report on that should provide at least one side of the divide with a lot of satisfaction.

Congratulations to Anthony the Devonian on his verse. The present Poet Laureate is a dreadful dud so they tell me. Anthony should stick his name down.

So a Happy Christmas to David, Tony and all. May your aspirations be fulfilled if at all possible, and your next year be a happy one. I'm just happy to be alive after my heart condition was caught in the nick of time – and if my remarks are a bit caustic, it's not without reason.

R.B.W. – Bedford

Whew!! Follow that. Well, first of all, many thanks for the kind remarks – and that applies to all who send in appreciation of my efforts. As I've said before, I thought at the beginning that the whole concept would die out after two years or so, and here we are, still going strong, into our seventh.

I'd better now answer the few criticisms. Firstly, the questionnaires weren't put out just for idle curiosity. Notice has been taken of the favourite subjects of the majority. One of those happens to be 'masturbation techniques', so I thought that Dr. Ray's thesis would be enjoyed. Exactly the same answer can be given for the "I first found out about foreskins or circumcision" type contributions. As for the expressions of opinion as being incontrovertible, doesn't nearly everyone feel that their opinions are the definitive? I might say here that all new or prospective new members get sent the questionnaire so that we can keep abreast of things and add to our statistics.

That leaves me nothing more but to thank all those who've contributed in the past year, and offer you all the compliments of the Season from Tony and myself and to add that, although I've still got several contributions to publish (don't worry if you are waiting to see yours), we always need more. So don't belittle yourself, put your thoughts down on paper.

A Merry Xmas and a Happy New Year

David Acorn

ACORN

1994 Issue No 1

Editor
David Acorn

Contents

Editorial	D.A.	Page 2
Bare Ends	K.J.	Page 2
Girls Peeing Positions	K.J.	Page 4
Keeping it Back	Anon	Page 5
Do It Yourself	W.W.	Page 6
Sticky Solution	P.U.	Page 7
Anecdotes	Anthony	Page 8
European Woman's View	Anne-Marie	Page 8
Anaesthetic	Anthony	Page 9
Spike Milligan		Page 10
Boyhood Games	J.R.	Page 11
Female Circumcision	Bill	Page 12
Get Stretching	H.J.M.	Page 13
American Trial		Page 13
Wife's Feedback	Anon	Page 14
'David' - The Uncut Jew	Ray	Page 15
Contact Corner		Page 16

---

Newsletter Contributions,
Letters for Forwarding

to:- DAVID ACORN

Membership, Fees, Advice,
Personal Matters

to:- TONY ACORN

P.O. Box 113, WESTON-SUPER-MARE, AVON, BS23 2ED

---

© 1994 Acorn & Contributors

Printed & Published in England by Acorn

Editorial

The start of a new year for Acorn and with it a time for changes and upheavals. By the time this is through your letter box Tony will have taken up abode in Bergen in Norway in a new post as part of his job. He expects that it will be for at least four months. In the meantime I will deal with membership etc., but I will still send to him any letters for advice on circumcisions, and he will try to help through his normal contacts.

The distribution of the newsletters will be undertaken by Brian of the West Country. Any queries about distribution should be sent to me however, as too many names on the letters to the P.O. Box makes the GPO wonder whether we are in the distribution of mail trade ourselves.

On top of this we now have a computer expert member who will turn my efforts into a more acceptable form for a magazine. Not a glossy, mind you, with coloured pictures, but...well, you've got it in your hand, haven't you! I hope you like it. We've been trying to do this for quite some time with another member but have had compatibility problems with computers. Also, due to different formats, the content might not make the whole 16 pages. Don't worry, you get a full 16 pages of mine.

Brian has asked me to remind everyone, and tell new members, of which we have a few, of the meeting he has organised for the weekend March 26th and 27th in Bournemouth, the full cost of which is about £25, of which he would like an initial payment of £10 to book. There are 18 members at the moment going, and he hopes that we can have the hotel to ourselves so that there will be an atmosphere of privacy.

D.A.

Bare Ends

The letter from R.H. of London in issue 8/93 interested me because it helps to provide some numerical evaluation of the extent of the practice of baring the glans, either by circumcision or retraction. He referred to naturist activities and to his experience of sighting both cut and retracted males, both of whom far outnumber the 'skin over' wearers.

I was recently in hospital for a longish time and shared a ward with male patients, most of whom had had abdominal operations necessitating dressing of their wounds. This gave me an opportunity to note their penile state since they were frequently left in a state of undress with curtains part open or unclosed. There were five near neighbours. Of these, one was in his late seventies, one was mid-sixties, two were around forty, and one was much younger, around the mid-twenties. The oldest had a very neatly circumcised penis, which was surprisingly well-developed for such an oldish person, showing no evidence of scar, but totally smooth and unwrinkled for the whole length. One of the middle aged was also circumcised, but not so neatly. with wrinkling and a distinct scar. The other one in his forties and the mid-sixties both appeared to have retracted foreskins, both with well acclimatised dry skin on the glans. I did find it difficult to satisfy myself that they were, in fact, retracted and not cut, and I suspect that R.H. must have had the same difficulty, because the distinction becomes blurred after lengthy retraction as the loose skin shrinks slightly behind the corona. The youngest, who was with us for only a short time, also had a partly exposed glans, but whether from having had a partly removed skin or as a result of wearing it partly covered could not be judged. Lastly, myself, circumcised with a scar half an inch behind the corona.

I appreciate that the statistical norm for bared or covered glans is much more likely to show the latter in the majority, particularly so since the removal of foreskins routinely becomes rarer. However, the above experience does tie in with other observations made over past years when opportunity occurs in public loos. Whilst making observations directly is not very acceptable, we all know that there are wide variations in the way that males try to keep the penis from sight by 'backhand' screening, and that many make no attempt to be unnoticed. It is possible to gain sufficient checks to form some sort of proportioning.

Sufficiently more bared glans are to be seen this way. It is agreed that even the uncircumcised will frequently retract the foreskin to pee, making it more difficult to separate them from the 'permanently back' wearers, and frequently the act of retracting and re-covering can be seen. There are, however, those who remove an already uncovered glans from their fly, pee, and return it in an uncovered state before zipping. A minority of these can be seen to push the skin forward to clear the drops, then retract it again and leave it so on return. Circumcised individuals often push the remaining skin forwards towards the glans to remove drops, but are obviously without enough 'loose' to cover over. It is impossible to differentiate those with cut from those retracted foreskins, but relatively easier to identify the fully bared glans owners of both persuasions, and without doubt, around half of the males appear to have an uncovered glans before and during peeing.

I am sure that observations by medical people will be available and that these will show precisely what proportion of men are bared, and possibly identify the circumcised as a separate group, but I have not seen nor been able to find or use these for verification. Some years ago I saw a table summarising the trend between age groups of males and this suggested that, of those not circumcised, a very small percentage of children was born with no foreskin or only a rudimentary and inadequate skin. As males become older, the proportion with retracted foreskins increased to between 15% and 20% at age 20-30, up to 40% in the 40-50 age group, either due to natural shortening or to a conscious decision to retract. I would also consider that the older males born when circumcision was more common, tended to retract their foreskin to match the state of their contemporaries who were circumcised at birth. This was so common as to be the norm at public schools.

The observations suggest that, although there are 'completely skin over' enthusiasts who offer their views in Acorn, there are still many of us left who, by choice or by design, find our bared state to be acceptable and most desirable, and who comprise a sizeable proportion of penis owners.

K.J. – N. England

Girls Peeing Positions

Issue 8/93 contained a letter referring to the problems which women have in peeing without splashing themselves or their clothes in the process.

A lady well-known to me was with me in the car a few years ago when I just had to 'go to the loo'. We were on a fairly busy road at the time, but traffic was intermittent, so I felt that I might just finish before another car came along. My companion jumped out of the car as well and, whilst I was peeing, raised her skirt in front of her, pulled the crotch of her pants aside, and issued a strong, direct and accurate stream of urine into the grass in front of her. During this, a car passed, and it occurred to me that the occupants would have been amazed to see both a man and a woman peeing in the same position. Because her dress hung down behind her, she was modestly covered, and only someone who stood in front of her would have seen her bareness.

She explained to me that she had been brought up on a farm, and when younger, had worked with men in the fields. Without any way exposing themselves, the other workers had simply turned to the nearest hedge or cover and peed as the need arose. During harvest, other women worked alongside the men, and as they too needed to pee, would simply go to the hedge, raise skirts, and stand with knicker crotch pulled aside to pee. She, my friend, had learned to do this since early age. The effect was quite spectacular, since the stream was much stronger and forceful than a man's. On other occasions she repeated the event and, in other circumstances, showed me that she could equally well pee from a standing position into the toilet. This had, she explained, distinct advantages when she used ladies public toilets, which were often less than pristine.

The achievement requires some manipulation of the genitals so that the loose flaps of skin don't get in the way. But a simple holding of the sides apart and a slight pushing forward of the hips will ensure that no splashes or interruptions disturb the stream.

K.J. – N. England

Keeping It Back

A friend has passed Issue 7 to me and referred to your request on Page 2 – Cavaliers considering circumcision.

For about two years I have become accustomed to 'wearing' my foreskin back, and have recently considered having it removed. I discussed this with my friend who was himself circumcised in later life. But my concern is not with the prospect of the operation, but my wife's reaction to this modification.

I was an only child, and my rather staid parents never referred to the retraction of my foreskin. Consequently, I had never pulled it back until I was around 12 or 13 and watched other boys doing it. In fact I found it so excruciatingly sensitive and uncomfortable to have the glans open to the atmosphere that it was repeated only at infrequent intervals, and only for a few moments.

I demonstrated to my wife shortly after we were married. She appeared shocked and was so reactive that I have never repeated it in her presence. In fact our sex was performed infrequently and always with the foreskin over the glans in the natural position.

During service in the forces I was able to retract the skin with some difficulty (only by squeezing the glans when the penis was not erect can the skin slide back), which satisfied the doctor at the time.

Sex with my wife ceased during the late forties, since when I have masturbated for relief. Two years ago I decided, after looking at a sex magazine showing all the males with 'open' penises, to try again to retract my foreskin, and having done so I forced myself to leave it 'back' whilst I was in the bath, although extremely uncomfortable at the time.

I regularly retracted it for short but increasingly longer periods and also before going to sleep. At last I was able to keep it retracted all night and was quite excited to find one morning that I could pee whilst retracted. I began to keep it back for longer and longer periods during the day, and gradually the naked glans felt natural and normal. It is even possible for me to masturbate almost to orgasm without covering the glans, but I find the sensation so intense that I have never so far reached the conclusion which occurs with the skin covering the glans. I experienced a particular sense of pride and achievement on the first occasion on which I used a public toilet whilst 'wearing' my foreskin back in the presence of other males. Because it is necessary to 'manipulate' the penis preparatory to allowing the skin to come back over the glans, I must retract myself in private or at home before emerging as a 'skinback'.

After my experience with my wife so many years ago, and her current refusal to discuss or listen to anything to do with sex, I have not told her that I now wear my foreskin back. Nor has she been sufficiently interested to notice, even though it is, and has been for the past 18 months, always retracted. Whilst she is not interested nor participating in any sex with me, I am quite sure that any discussion on a circumcision operation would be met with a very strong reaction. And, of course, the possibility of having it done in a clandestine arrangement would require absence from home for a few days and inevitable questioning.

I don't suppose I actually need to have the operation. My foreskin, once retracted, stays back permanently and is now even more comfortable and 'free' than if drawn forward. My only justification for wishing to be circumcised is that I feel that I would be more masculine and complete (if that is the appropriate word) with a naturally and irrevocably uncovered glans, eliminating permanently any temptation in future to cover it again. I have a sense of freedom.

I have not given my name or address because I cannot risk my identity, nor the very personal disclosures being known to others. I hope my comments are of interest to you.

Anon

Do It Yourself

I was born in the late thirties when it was the done thing to have one's son circumcised at birth. Unfortunately, my parents decided not to have me done, in the erroneous belief that, like my father, my foreskin would be short and retract of its own accord as I got older. I would look at my friends with envy when I saw their well-exposed knobs in the changing room showers, wishing I too were like them. In fact, I remember being in a distinct minority being uncut, and being derided for having a baggy flap of skin at the end of my cock. I tried keeping the skin back with the aid of rubber bands, and even pierced the skin with a needle to tie it back. The latter method sadly was never successful as it became too painful after a while, and the former method with rubber bands always risked strangulation by cutting off the blood supply.

This therefore was the situation all through my childhood. At 11, one of my school friends, who often came home to play with me, on one occasion told me how he had been shown how to get a 'funny feeling', and offered to demonstrate. He got out his penis which I can picture to this day: a large knob with a protruding rim and a superbly circumcised shaft. There was no trace of a scar and the inner skin was retracted, it seemed almost to his balls. The shaft was thus very smooth and with little skin mobility. I had of course often seen it in the showers, but never before so erect or close-to, nor ever touched so lovely a tool before.

Thus from the age of 12 it became my goal to have a penis like his. There was little I could do about it however. To add insult to injury, my first girlfriend was not too polite about my long foreskin, as she had apparently had a previous boyfriend who was cut, and thought that that was how men should be. That romance didn't last too long, though I did lose my virginity with her. I remember how super-sensitive I was, and how quickly I came – to her annoyance. A second girlfriend was not so particular or experienced, but a third, a nurse, told me to “lose that awful foreskin” or her. I told her I couldn't possibly go to our old family G.P., so she said that she would do the job for me. I finally agreed, and after a lot of preparations we attacked the foreskin with a pair of sharp nail scissors. I was so excited by this time that I hardly felt the pain, and the ‘op’ was soon over. As I was frightened to have too much removed, she left enough when flaccid to cover the corona, but snipped a fair amount off the frenulum, leaving it just right. She was satisfied, and so was I at the time, but still envied the totally circumcised men I saw on the beach or in the changing rooms. I remember how terribly bare I felt and kept checking that my flies weren't undone. Some years went by and long after I had got married to a girl who was very pro-circumcision, I decided to rid myself of the surplus skin I still carried. This time I did the job alone and, like the first time, used scissors to remove the last remnants of skin. I was lucky again to find little bleeding, but without the use of stitches erections were painful, as there was now no loose skin on the shaft. I used surgical tape to hold the cuts together and they healed in 4-6 weeks, to leave a completely smooth shaft with eventually only a faint scar. Intercourse after each ‘op’ was an improvement on the uncut state. In particular, the second, full circumcision, allowed the most exquisite feelings in the vagina, and I am altogether happy in this state some 10 years hence.

I would be most interested in hearing from any other men who circumcised themselves as I would like to hear of their experiences.

W.W. – Surrey

Sticky Solution

In an issue of Forum some years back now, I remember reading in the letters section a suggestion that the use of toothpaste as a sensation enhancer during masturbation had proved most beneficial.

The writer didn't state his circumcision status or the brand of toothpaste employed. Perhaps readers would care to experiment and report back on results? My own use of Crest – paste, not gel – is not especially beneficial, since I was circumcised as a child.

I am also interested in information concerning the use of the urethral meatus as a masturbation accessory. I am able to insert the tip of a little finger as far as the first knuckle which greatly encourages the flow of mucous and ‘syrup’. A lifetime of practice has no doubt helped in this bonus activity.

Contacts welcome.

P.U. – Edinburgh

Anecdotes

A sensuous lady called Peggy
Was luscious, full-breasted and leggy.
To her man she said, "Soap is your one only hope – you'll never get in if you're smeggy."

Retraction was started with dread, with hardly a glimpse of the head.
Though his manner was slick,
Peggy grabbed his limp prick.
The laddie was hand-wanked instead!

What is the difference between an eating contest and phimosis?
One is a 'tuck-in' fight. The other...

Why are loose foreskins like bells?
They peel easily!

Why did a radical circumcision suit a miser?
It made him twice as tight!

Why does Father Christmas have a sore foreskin?
Because of being handled by Santa Claws!

Anthony – N. Devon

European Woman's View

I am a Belgian woman married to an Englishman, and you may be interested in a view from Europe on your subject. Firstly, I think most Europeans look on the English desire for circumcision with amazement, and another sign of English eccentricity. The man who wrote and said that continental women admired his circumcised penis on a nudist beach had to be mistaken from my experience. It is much more likely that they couldn't take their eyes off it, but were too polite to ask if he'd had some awful accident!

From what I have seen of the operation, I come to the conclusion that it is bound up with three things:- superstition, myth and neurosis. For superstition, I am one of those who do not differentiate between superstition and religion, and I cannot see how removing part of one's sexual organ can be related to the worship of God.

The myth includes virtually all those 'health' reasons given as an excuse for the operation. Cleanliness is no reason at all. People are only dirty by choice, and even the tightest foreskin can be cleaned with a little ingenuity. Those who give cleanliness as an excuse for having themselves circumcised are either of very low mentality, dirty themselves, or cannot think of a better excuse.

A further myth is the one that says that circumcision gives a woman more pleasure by prolonging intercourse. I am sure the operation lowers the intensity of feeling (and enjoyment) for a man, but nine times out of ten the cause for having a short duration is nervousness. I have had several uncircumcised lovers whose sensitivity was extremely high, but who could keep on going almost indefinitely because they did not suffer from nerves. From my experience, circumcised men are more likely to be nervous, and therefore of shorter duration.

In America circumcision is very widespread and goes to prove that they have a more neurotic society than we. You will find quite a lot of Americans who agree with this!

Which brings us to the real reason why so many Englishmen desire circumcision, and that is neurosis. It used to be looked on as a sort of exclusive social club, and those with foreskins were of low standing who could not join it unless they had the operation. What nonsense! How can having your foreskin cut off improve your social standing.

Happily this no longer applies in UK because later generations have conceded to common sense and decided to leave their foreskins alone like good Europeans. However, there are still a few neurotics around who feel they want to join this 'exclusive' club. The incidence will drop to zero as the circumcised generation dies off over the next ten years or so, after which there will be no fuel to feed this unfortunate neurosis.

Anne-Marie Roberts – Bruges

Anaesthetic

It is indeed wonderful to read that in the snipped society of the USA the use of local anaesthetic cream has finally been acknowledged as humane in the practice of neonatal circumcision. The EMLA cream, containing 2.5% lignocaine and 2.5% prilocaine, is an Astra product available from Astra Pharmaceuticals of Watford. Paradoxically enough, in UK literature it is not recommended for infants, or for the application on mucous membranes and wounds. EMLA is applied thickly, and held under an occlusive impermeable dressing for 1 to 2 hours for maximum effect. Wiped off before surgery, this should present a penis no different to the circumciser than one fully receptive to pain.

As injected anaesthetics distort tissues, and are discouraged for use on the infant penis, the cream is therefore an ideal alternative at very little cost (compared with that of circumcision). Ten 5 gram tubes with 25 occlusive dressings cost £19.50 in 1987. Perhaps infant male circumcision should be illegal without anaesthetic; even the ritual Jewish operation itself (Mohel malpractice indeed!).

Reading too, of the removal of the clitoral foreskin by a husband and boyfriend without anaesthetic, the EMLA cream would have removed any possibility of pain. It would have been more humane, though the legality would be in doubt. Female circumcision is prohibited by law in the U.K., though 'circumcision' is wrongly meant as clitoridectomy or infibulation (not just the removal of the prepuce, analogous to the male operation).

Circumcision may have an implication under the Sex Discrimination Act. Both sexes should have the freedom to have their glans permanently freed if they so desire for reasons of custom, cleanliness, sensitivity or sexuality. As for the infliction of the practice on infants, that is another matter, except as a surgical necessity, and with appropriate anaesthetic.

May I add a footnote to the controversial topic of circumcising the dead in Israel. The practice takes place in this country should a male baby be stillborn or die before the eighth day of life in the Orthodox Jewish Community. Quoting from the textbook for the training of mohelim, by Dr. Jacob Snowman:-

"Should a child die before it is circumcised, the foreskin should be amputated prior to burial. This is carried out with a cutting implement, usually at the cemetery. No blessings are to be said, but a name should be given to him."

I wonder if the freshly severed foreskin is buried with its owner or disposed of separately lest it have a contaminating effect.

Anthony – N. Devon

Spike Milligan

Here is a tiny excerpt from Spike Milligan's autobiography, sent by a member.

The foreword states that he was born in India in 1919, and this bit is during his much publicised war with Hitler, when he had a Jewish friend named Steve who he called 'The Yew'.

In the shower Steve noticed I'd been circumcised. "Why?" I didn't know. "To make it lighter?"

“You know, Milligan, if Jerry took you prisoner, that could have got you into a concentration camp.”

It was really something when your prick could get you sent to a concentration camp.

“Believe me, Spike,” says the Yew, “anyone that sends someone to a concentration camp is a prick.” Amen.

[Another name to put on the list.

D.A.]

Boyhood Games

Reading the letter by Anon in 6/93 about his friend Ivor’s tight foreskin reminds me of some of my own boyhood experiences.

